Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Oil Exploration (Merseyside)

1. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the present position in respect of onshore oil exploration in the Merseyside area.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): In the recent onshore licensing round I awarded four new petroleum exploration licences in the Merseyside area. These are in addition to the three exploration and three production licences already in existence.

Mr. Wareing: Can the Minister tell me the names of the constituencies in which these licences have been granted? Are they progressing well in terms of permissions from the landowners, occupiers and local authorities? Is he able to say when employment possibilities are likely to arise on Merseyside as a result of these developments?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The whole of the Merseyside area is covered by the existing and new licences. If the hon. Gentleman would like further information I shall be happy to provide it. I understand that exploration work is proceeding, but unless some discovery is made one cannot tell what activity may flow from the exploration.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: As further developments in Merseyside or elsewhere are likely to be affected by the continuing fall in oil prices, is my right hon. Friend aware that the industry is becoming increasingly anxious about the tax regime and especially about the ring fencing of oilfields? Has he had discussions with the Chancellor of the Exchequer about this urgent matter to ensure that further inducements exist for continued exploration and development?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am certainly aware of the problems of the falling oil price. There is no evidence that any existing activity or any developments recently approved or developments at an advanced stage of consideration by my Department have been inhibited by the current tax regime. If activity is hindered, I assure my hon. Friend that I and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will look carefully at it.

Coal Imports

2. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the latest available figures of imports of coal into the United Kingdom and from what sources.

8. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the countries from which the United Kingdom imports coal; and what proportion of United Kingdom enegy needs are met by coal imports.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): The latest available figures for imports of coal into the United Kingdom cover the period January to April 1986.

I shall publish the information in the Official Report. On a primary fuel input basis, 4 per cent. of United Kingdom energy needs were met by coal imports in 1985.

Mr. Lofthouse: Now that the Foreign Secretary is not going to South Africa, does the Secretary of State think that a good response from him would be to ban all imports of this blooded coal? Does he appreciate that the co .tinued import of coal is a kick in the teeth for the mining communities and the miners? The Secretary of State is aware that there is to be a rundown of miners' jobs. Will he assure the House that any miners made redundant after March 1987 will under a new scheme receive benefits equivalent to those that they receive now?

Mr. Peter Walker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the European leaders have agreed upon an approach to South Africa which after three months would include action on a number of materials, including coal. That is the right approach and I hope that it will have some influence on negotiations in the coming months. The hon. Gentleman asked about benefits for miners. The present scheme ends in March 1987, and if further redundancies are required it will be the responsibility of the Coal Board to decide what measures are needed.

Mr. Evans: Will the Secretary of State explain to the British people why, when we have massive coal reserves and over 4 million people unemployed, we need to import coal, especially from countries with regimes like that in Poland, which has no free trade union movement, or South Africa, which has no freedom? Surely this is one case where sanctions against South Africa would be of benefit to Britain and Britain's work force?

Mr. Walker: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point of view. Figures that I shall publish in the Official Report will show that in the past six months Britain imported far more coal from Poland than from South Africa. However, during the period of the last Labour Government pits were being closed and unemployment increased, and imports from South Africa and Poland continued throughout the whole of that period.

Sir Trevor Skeet: Is my right hon. Friend aware that a recently negotiated agreement between the Central Electricity Generating Board and the National Coal Board makes little provision for imports, the result of which is likely to be that the public will be deprived of the opportunity of cheap coal from countries other than South Africa, which would be greatly to their advantage?

Mr. Walker: On the other hand, the CEGB wants continuity of supply and our coal industry to continue to provide the volume of coal that is necessary to meet electricity demand. It is perfectly reasonable therefore for it to enter into long-term contracts to ensure that that supply continues to be available.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that were it not for the activities of the private sector in coal production, imports would be higher than they are? Given that the private sector is anxious to expand its operations, does it not make sense to strike off the restrictive shackles that have been placed upon it so that it can expand its output and thereby cut our import bill still further?

Mr. Walker: If we look at the totality of coal production, we must recognise that under the present system of nationalisation there is a very substantial coal industry in which this Government have invested heavily. It is providing very substantial yields of coal, with much better productivity figures. No Government can ignore those factors.

Mr. Mason: Is the Secretary of State aware that for every 1 million tonnes of coal imported 1,000 jobs are lost in the British coal industry and in supporting industries? Over 12 million tonnes of coal were imported last year, which means that 12,000 British jobs have been lost. Where does the Secretary of State's interest really lie? Does it lie with South Africa and those countries which export cheap coal to Britain, or does it lie with the British miner and the British coal industry? In view of continuing low-cost oil imports, 20,000 more jobs in the British coal industry are threatened. That is another reason why all coal imports should cease.

Mr. Walker: If the right hon. Gentleman really believes that last year's figures were so important for unemployment, I should point out to him that the reason for the enormous rise in imports was the disastrous strike led by Arthur Scargill, supported by the Labour party. The reason for the rise in unemployment is completely, in my view, to be laid at the feet of Arthur Scargill and nobody else. As for imports, the right hon. Gentleman also knows, as a former Cabinet Minister, that every Government of which he was a member closed pits and also imported coal.

Mr. Redmond: On redundancy payments, is the right hon. Gentleman saying that this Government will make finance available to the Coal Board if it wishes to continue to make the same kinds of payments?

Mr. Walker: We shall discuss, as would any Government, the financial requirements of the Coal Board in the years that lie ahead and the public expenditure that it requires. Because of his great interest in the coal industry, the hon. Gentleman knows that the scheme that has been operated by the Government was a temporary scheme, and it was announced that it was a temporary scheme to bring about the considerable transition in the coal industry that was necessary. When that major transition ends, it is perfectly reasonable that that responsibility should be returned to the Coal Board.

Mr. O'Brien: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the European Commission that is concerned with coal believes that imports into member states are necessary? If so, what will be the influence of the EEC's policy on the size and output of the British coal industry?

Mr. Walker: Imports over the past six months were about 4 per cent. of our coal requirements, and some of those imports were of specialist coals, some of which are not available here. Had we not had the disastrous strike, there would not have been such a rise in imports. I hope that now, if there is stability in the industry, we can reduce imports.

Mr. Orme: Is the Secretary of State aware that last week I met the president and general secretary of the South African National Union of Mineworkers, who impressed two points on me? The first was about the imprisonment and internment of trade unionists in South Africa, including members of the South African NUM. The second was their desire to see the imports of South African coal into Britain stopped. I note what the Secretary of State said about consideration by the EEC. That is insufficient.

Mr. Walker: I remind the right hon. Gentleman that during the whole period that he was a Minister, the regime in South Africa was just as intolerant to the position of the blacks, and imports from South Africa came in every year.

Following is the information:

Coal Imports January-April 1986

Energy Efficiency

3. Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of energy efficiency savings so far achieved by Government Departments; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): All Government Departments have been made aware of the need to establish and implement effective energy management practices during Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. Stewart: I recognise the valuable work that my hon. Friend has done during Energy Efficiency Year, but is there not still a shocking waste of energy in Government Departments and offices, particularly here in the offices in the Palace of Westminster?

Mr. Hardy: Hot air.

Mr. Stewart: Will my hon. Friend give me an assurance that he, as the Minister, will set an example for the rest of industry to follow?

Mr. Hunt: My Department's energy manager has already cut the consumption of electricity under his control by about 10 per cent. My hon. Friend is right to emphasise the considerable savings that can still be made. As to the Palace of Westminster, I hope that the hon. Member who shouted "Hot air" will realise that I am not an expert in these matters. I understand that there is a great deal of surplus heat in the Palace of Westminster and I know that the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee would greatly welcome any practical suggestions as to how best it could usefully be re-cycled.

Mr. Rowlands: In addition to savings in Government Departments, does the hon. Gentleman recall the Public Accounts Committee report, which said that huge savings could be made in the National Health Service which could be used for better patient care? How much progress has been made towards the targets that the PAC said should be set?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman has made a good point. He will be aware that I and my hon. Friend iat the Department of Health and Social Security launched a major initiative with all the regional health authorities, and he will be aware of the publication of the Encode, which has gone to all managers in the Health Service. I hope that we shall soon see those ambitious but, nevertheless, necessary targets being met.

Mr. Rost: Is my hon. Friend aware that the enormous savings in the Health Service, Defence Department and all other parts of the public sector will not be achieved until he persuades the Treasury to remove the stupid restriction that prevents private enterprise third party financed energy management companies from offering services to the public sector without it being added to the public sector borrowing requirement, even if the investment is financed from outside by the private sector?

Mr. Hunt: I shall convey my hon. Friend's views to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Coal Industry

4. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the latest productivity figures for British Coal; and if he will make a statement.

5. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Energy how the latest productivity figures for the coal industry compare with those in 1978-79; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: British Coal's average deep-mined revenue productivity for the week ending 21 June was 3·25 tonnes, the highest weekly figure achieved so far. This compares with an average of 2·24 tonnes during the financial year 1978-79. This further growth in productivity reflects a continuing effort by all concerned to reduce costs, which provides the industry with its only sure route to a viable future.

Mr. Leigh: Will my right hon. Friend congratulate the management and work force of British Coal on achieving the best productivity figures ever? In view of the progress being made by the industry towards achieving improvements in productivity, would it not be madness for Arthur Scargill to attempt to foment further industrial action? Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be the action of a madman, such as Arthur Scargill has proved himself to be, to put so callously and pointlessly at risk the future of the industry and its work force?

Mr. Walker: Alas, it is not the actions of Mr. Scargill that concern me, but just his words. Every time he makes one of those speeches, a number of industrialists who are contemplating converting to coal decide that while such speeches are being made they cannot take the risk. That is doing real damage to the industry.

Mr. Howarth: May I add my congratulations to the management of British Coal to those of my right hon. Friend? May I invite my right hon. Friend also to congratulate the western area of British Coal, which has achieved record productivity of 3·49 million tonnes per man shift, which is 9 per cent. up on the record of the preceding month? Does my right hon. Friend agree that if such progress continues throughout British Coal we shall see it breaking even by 31 March 1988?

Mr. Walker: Yes, Sir. I should like to see that target achieved. British Coal has the added problem of lower oil prices and the competition which has resulted from that, which means that it will achieve somewhat lower revenue than it anticipated. Certainly the improvements in productivity at last show after all these years some return on the enormous investment by British taxpayers in the industry.

Mr. Hardy: In response to those impressive figures, will the Secretary of State ensure that the importation of coal from dumping countries is deterred in Europe and prevented in Britain? Also, in response to that performance within the industry, will he advise the NCB to extricate itself immediately from its international arrangements which involve the promotion of and trading in South African coal?

Mr. Walker: The action on South African coal has been agreed by the European Community, and we must see the effect of that in the negotitations that will take place in the coming months. One of the great factors of the improved productivity is that it will genuinely eradicate the potentality of coal imports.

Mr. Douglas: Will the Secretary of State reflect on the productivity of the Castlehill mine in my constituency which is in existence only because two men who have been victimised by the NCB stayed underground to save the mine? Without them the high productivity there would not exist. Further, will he reflect on the deal between the South of Scotland Electricity Board and British Coal which was concluded last week and which reduced the coalburn to 3·6 million tonnes a year at a time when the SSEB is having a high oilburn and is promoting a high nuclear content in its operations?

Mr. Walker: It is a matter for negotiation. As the hon. Gentleman will know, the obligation placed on the electricity industry by a statue introduced by a Labour Government for the nationalisation of electricity makes it clear that the boards must provide the cheapest possible electricity.

Mr. Portillo: Is my right hon. Friend not also impressed by the productivity in the private sector mines, although they must pay royalties to the NCB on their production? Has the time not come to review the procedures for licensing private sector coal mines to put them on the same footing as the NCB?

Mr. Walker: No, Sir. If the NCB is put on the same footing, which would mean that for each highly productive pit it could charge one price and for the others it could charge a higher price, that would be absurd. Obviously the licensing system is constantly reviewed, but at present it is working satisfactorily.

Mr. Rogers: Will the Secretary of State join me in congratulating the miners of the south Wales coalfield on achieving all the productivity targets set for them during the past year as a result of their having, for the first time, their proper share of capital investment, especially in heavy duty face support development? In doing so, will he ask the director of the NCB in south Wales to stop moving the goal posts in setting targets over and above and beyond what they are at present achieving, which will result in even more closures, as the Secretary of State well knows?

Mr. Walker: I welcome the substantial improvement in productivity in south Wales. The problem for the NCB management is that, without its desiring it, the goal posts move because a sudden massive drop in the price of its major competitor affects it.

Mrs. Currie: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important to maintain these good productivity figures into the future? Is he yet able to make a statement about the proposed development at the Cadley Hill colliery in my constituency, which my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State visited on 20 June which, if agreed, will enable me to go on representing in the House efficient coal miners into the next century?

Mr. Walker: I know how much my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State enjoyed his visit to that coal mine, but obviously, as my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) knows, decisions on these matters are for the NCB.

Mr. Eadie: Yes, the miners deserve congratulations on their increased productivity, but is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a crisis of confidence is emerging in the mining industry? He will be aware that on Saturday the Fraser of Allender institute said that 4,000 mining jobs in Scotland would go west, with a total of 8,000 as a consequence. Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that such stories will affect productivity and that the message in the mining industry will be that the harder one works the more pit closures and redundancies there will be?

Mr. Walker: In giving his congratulations, and with his considerable knowledge of this industry, the hon. Gentleman should reflect that under "Plan for Coal" money was poured in for 10 years but productivity agreements were never implemented. Instead of achieving 4 per cent. productivity per annum outlined in "Plan for Coal", 4 per cent. was achieved over 10 years. Thank heavens, for the future of that industry, at long last improved productivity is taking place.

Energy Efficiency Year

6. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress so far of Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. David Hunt: Energy Efficiency Year continues to make a strong impact. The "Monergy" logo, and the slogan "Get More for Your Monergy" are well established, and over 800 "Monergy" events have already take place. To reinforce the strong tide of interest, we shall be running a major autumn campaign of television and press advertising to coincide with the start of the heating season.

Mr. Spencer: Does my hon. Friend agree that in Energy Efficiency Year it would be a great breakthrough if he were able to accept the proposals of the combined heat and power consortium in Leicester?

Mr. Hunt: I am very grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his constant lobbying and support for the consortium. Aware of the significance of this subject, I await with interest the consortium's report, which I understand is likely to be the first of the lead city consortia to complete work.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister acknowledge that the prospects for Energy Efficiency Year would be greatly improved if local authorities had more finance available for loft insulating grants? Is he aware, for instance, that the St. Helen's authority is already informing its citizens that it can accept no more applications for such grants because it has no money left?

Mr. Hunt: I am very surprised to hear that, and I shall follow up that case immediately. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the history of the homes insulation scheme is, sadly, one of underspend. Indeed, the arrangements made by the Department of the Environment this year were primarily laid down to ensure that no local authority would run out of money. I shall, of course, investigate the point that he has made.

Mr. Speller: Does my hon. Friend not agree that for commerce and industry, Energy Efficiency Year is, frankly, the flattest of flat pancakes?

Mr. Hunt: The targets and the potential for industry and commerce are so enormous that any assessment of progress so far must of necessity be something of an anticlimax. But we have already been able to identify the fact that industry and commerce have been able to make savings of £500 million as a result of my Department's programmes.

Electricity (Privatisation)

7. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether his Department has had any discussions on the privatisation of the electricity industry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): There have been no recent discussions on this subject. The Government have no present plans to privatise the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Deakins: Will the Minister confirm that the Government have no objection in principle to privatising the electricity supply industry, which has the largest holding of state assets in western Europe? Will he also confirm that the Government will seek to ensure that this is a manifesto commitment for the next general election?

Mr. Goodlad: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that undertaking.

Mr. Proctor: Will my hon. Friend take steps to privatise the electricity industry as soon as possible, in view of the fact that it is not sensible to have the gas industry in private ownership and the electricity industry in public ownership because of the unfairness of that situation to the electricity industry?

Mr. Goodlad: I note my hon. Friend's view, but as I said earlier, the Government have no present plans to privatise the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Bruce: The House might welcome that, but it is a less than complete assurance. Will the Minister acknowledge that there would be great anxiety about the privatisation of the electricity industry, as that would involve the privatisation of nuclear power, which he may have something to say about later? Will he also acknowledge that there is a great desire to decentralise electricity in the public sector, and will he undertake to give more discretion to regional boards and less control to the Central Electricity Generating Board?

Mr. Goodlad: The Government have already encouraged a more open market in electricity supply by removing the legislative and institutional constraints on private generation and establishing a framework for fair dealing between private generators and electricity boards.

British Gas

9. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the terms on which he expects shares in British Gas to be made available to the corporation's customers.

Mr. Peter Walker: As I announced on 18 June, we shall be making special arrangements for gas consumers and other small investors to purchase shares in British Gas. Domestic gas consumers who register their interest in advance will be guaranteed to receive a certain number of shares when they apply. Full details will be announced before the sale.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that upwards of 16 million households will be entitled to buy shares in British Gas under the privatisation proposals? Will he take steps to ensure that those shares are not confiscated by a possible future Labour Government, as the Labour party proposes to confiscate the shares of the 1·5 million shareholders in British Telecom by nationalisation under another name?

Mr. Walker: The 16 million customers of British Gas will, for the first time, have direct participation in the industry of which they are customers. As for the Labour party's plans, I must confess that I am torn between deploring the morality of the proposals and being delighted at the political advantage that they will give to the Conservative party.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: When does the Secretary of State expect British Gas to come on to the market?

Mr. Walker: This autumn.

Mr. Portillo: Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the privatisation of British Gas offers a remarkable opportunity to extend share ownership to the many millions of British Gas customers? Does he agree that it will be more successful than the privatisation of British Telecom? Will he ensure that the terms sufficiently reflect those interesting possibilities?

Mr. Walker: I am delighted at the possibility of large numbers of customers, employees, small investors and pension schemes having direct participation in the industry. I look forward to successful privatisation taking place this autumn.

Mr. Orme: Is the Secretary of State aware that his noble Friend has created some confusion over the proposed sale of the shares? Will he clear that up for the House? May we now have the details of how the shares will be launched, the number and at what time they will be made available to the public?

Mr. Walker: On the latter point, I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would declare his personal interest in the matter. We will let him have the details, and I will send him a special form as soon as possible. As for the House of Lords, my noble Friend is coducting matters with immense care. I do not think that there is any misunderstanding.

Gas Prices

10. Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to have a meeting with the chairman of British Gas to discuss gas prices.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Prices are a matter for the commercial judgment of the British Gas Corporation.

Mr. Hannam: With regard to industrial gas prices, when my right hon. Friend meets the chairman of British Gas, will he discuss different gas prices for consumers on interruptible contracts, who receive good, competitive price charging, compared with those on long-term firm contracts for gas supply, whose contracts are still subject to price increases far out of touch with the present energy position?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My hon. Friend is right. There has been a considerable drop in the price of interruptible gas. The price for the supply of firm gas by contract is a matter for each contract commercially negotiated by British Gas. I understand that some planned increases have been cancelled and in some cases there have been reductions.

Mr. Rogers: When the Minister meets the chairman of British Gas to discuss prices, will he ask him how they will be affected by the flotation of British Gas shares, especially as most will go to foreign investors and British Gas customers will own a very small percentage of the shares that will be sold?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman knows that privatisation of itself has no effect on the price of gas. As for the availability of shares, I simply ask him to await the details. A real opportunity will be given to many millions of people—who recently, for the first time, and under a Conservative Government, have enjoyed having shares in industry—as a result of this exciting and enterprising flotation.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the sterling work carried out by energy cost analysis companies, which have negotiated very reasonable prices for gas all over the country? Does he agree that there is now an opportunity to promote some of these private arrangements so that other major companies can benefit from a tariff analysis which is fair to them?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: For interruptible gas, many companies already enjoy very favourable tariffs from British Gas. I note what my hon. Friend said about the opportunities provided by consultancies and others. No doubt they will make their services available to those who find them useful.

Mr. Rowlands: As the Government plan to raid British Gas accounts to the tune of £2·5 billion on privatisation, to collect nearly £500 million in the gas levy and still leave British Gas with a large profit, instead of trying to benefit some gas consumers with some shares, why not benefit all gas consumers by reducing gas prices?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: We are trying to give the British public, for the first time, a genuine share in the ownership of one of our greatest industries. Many people outside now realise how the hon. Gentleman and the Labour party would deny them an opportunity of which I know many people will avail themselves.

British Gas

11. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the British Gas Corporation to discuss the terms of the privatisation of the corporation.

Mr. Peter Walker: I regularly meet the chairman of the British Gas Corporation.

Mr. Sackville: Does my right hon. Friend agree about the importance of reaching a good and effective code of practice for the elderly and disabled?

Mr. Walker: Yes, Sir, and that will be done.

Mr. Douglas: When the Secretary of State meets the chairman, will he be kind enough to explain to him why it is wrong for the Gas Corporation to have drilling and exploration activities when it is in the public sector and right for it to have drilling and exploration activities when it is in the private sector.

Mr. Walker: There is no need to explain it. He is delighted about going into the private sector, for that reason.

Sir Dudley Smith: When my right hon. Friend sees the chairman, will he tell him that a fair minority of my constituents look forward to privatisation and even now would be prepared to pay the going rate for gas if only they could get connected to it? Is he aware that they are increasingly irritated by the splendid television advertising of the virtues of gas? Is it not a scandal that they are asked to pay prohibitive connection charges?

Mr. Walker: The problem with connection is that the cost of linking places to gas, especially in rural areas such as my hon. Friend represents, has been difficult. Under the process of nationalisation, there has been a clear basis according to which British Gas has had a statutory duty to connect potential consumers. That basis will continue unchanged after privatisation. The difference is that, after privatisation, if other groups wish to take on areas which British Gas has not taken on, they will be free to do so.

Mr. Bruce: When the right hon. Gentleman meets the chairman of British Gas, will he explain that, although British Gas has got away lightly in the Gas Bill in terms of the lack of effective regulatory control, if it abuses its monopoly in the private sector, a future Government, which might be a Conservative Government, will have no hesitation in imposing stronger regulators?

Mr. Walker: In view of the policies and differences in the alliance at the moment, I do not imagine that the hon. Gentleman will have any influence on any future Government.

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

13. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he remains satisfied that the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate has the staff and the resources to fulfil the responsibilities in respect of which it reports to him to appropriate standards of competence and expedition.

Mr. Goodlad: The Nuclear Installations Inspectorate is able to meet its essential commitments. The Health and Safety Executive is now seeking to recruit over 20 per cent. more well qualified inspectors to deal with further work.

Mr. Hardy: Is the Under-Secretary of State aware that I recall his categorical and emphatic response to a question that I asked on 14 April, when he assured me that there were no deficiencies in the staffing and resources of the inspectorate? Does he accept that that answer was an extremely grave example of misleading the House on a matter of great importance? Can we be absolutely sure that the Government's responses to our questions will be accurate in future, especially when we are dealing with a matter of such importance and concern?

Mr. Goodlad: There were and are no deficiencies in the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate. As the hon. Gentleman knows, matters about the strength and recruitment of nuclear inspectors are for my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General. As I said to the House, the Health and Safety Excutive is to start a recruitment exercise this month to recruit up to a maximum of 20 more inspectors. In addition, discussions on the pay of nuclear inspectors are going forward.

Mr. Richard Page: I thank my hon. Friend for that encouraging reply. Is it not true that the supply of energy has a price? Every year in the coal mining industry tens of people are killed, 400 are injured and thousands suffer from lung-related diseases, and in addition we have problems with acid rain. Of course, that is an improved safety record compared with a few years ago. Therefore, would my hon. Friend like to compare that with the safety record of our nuclear industry? Would we not need a Chernobyl incident every three or four years if we were trying to match the safety record of the coal industry?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is right. The safety record of the nuclear industry compares favourably with other forms of electricity generation.

THE ARTS

Merseyside

44. Mr. Wareing asked the Minister for the Arts what recent discussions he has had with the Arts Council about funding of the arts on Merseyside; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): I have discussed the Merseyside situation with the chairman of the Arts Council, and my officials have been in constant touch with officers of the Arts Council and the Merseyside Arts Association. I am very pleased that a satisfactory settlement has been reached, which secures the future of all the major arts organisations on Merseyside.

Mr. Wareing: Bearing in mind that it took eight months of intense negotiation to reach a settlement for the performing arts, I do not think that the people on Merseyside can be as glad about the situation as the Minister's answer suggests that he is. Is he resisting the attempts of the Treasury to cut the Arts Council's budget? Does he realise that not only the voluntary sector on Merseyside will be at stake, but that institutions such as the Philharmonic Hall could still be threatened with closure next year if the budget is cut and the Government's contribution is any less than it was this year?

Mr. Luce: The people who live on Merseyside have every reason to be pleased that there is now a conclusion to the long negotiations. I am glad that the Arts Council, which contributed over £1 million, and the local authorities are playing a positive part in that settlement. It is the last of the areas to reach a settlement. I believe that there is a positive long-term future for all the major arts bodies on Merseyside.

Mr. Ottaway: When my right hon. Friend was considering Arts Council funding for Merseyside, was he aware of the large sums being made by Sir Peter Hall and Trevor Nunn, which could well be used on Merseyside and in the east midlands?

Mr. Luce: I note what my hon. Friend has said. As I have already made plain, as has the chairman of the Arts Council, the question of the guidelines for the terms and conditions of directors of organisations, such as the National theatre and the Royal Shakespeare company, have been referred to the Cork inquiry, which is looking into the future of subsidised theatre.

Mr. Alton: I thank the Minister for the personal help he has given this year in securing funding for many of the arts institutions on Merseyside. Has he had a chance to consider the representations made to him about the "Act Now" venture, which he saw earlier this summer, and will he be able to provide any funding for that in the future? Will he also comment on business sponsorship for the arts on Merseyside and how successful that can be?

Mr. Luce: I have already had a meeting with representatives of those who have been behind the "Act Now" venture, and I have great admiration for the work that they have done. I am considering the points that they made to me and I hope to have a meeting with them in Plymouth next week during meetings of the Council of Regional Arts Associations.

On sponsorship, the Digital Equipment Company has come in with support to the tune of just under £400,000, supplemented by extra sponsorship and awards from the Government, which makes a total of £500,000 for dance and ballet throughout the country, not just in London. That is a supremely good example of what businesses can do to help the arts. I hope that businesses on Merseyside will play their part in this.

Parthenon Marbles

45. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Minister for the Arts what recent representations he has received from his Greek counterpart on the future of the Parthenon marbles.

Mr. Luce: There have been no formal representations from the Greek Government on the future of the Parthenon marbles since Her Majesty's Government's reply to the request for their return through UNESCO in October 1985.

Mr. Atkinson: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Parthenon marbles are housed in nine museums in six countries? Does he agree that the Greek representations would be a little more credible, and the Labour party's response a little less pathetic, if similar requests were made to the Governments of all six countries in which the marbles are housed?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend is right, to the extent that the British museum possesses only about 50 per cent. of all the Parthenon sculptures. Apart from some in Greece, the rest of them — at least nine — are placed in other European centres. My hon. Friend is right on that. However, I must also ask whether the Opposition have considered the precedent that would be set if the marbles were returned. What would be left of the British national collections in many areas?

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that if the marbles were to be returned to the Parthenon that would be one matter; but, as that is not practicable, to move them out of one museum and put them into another does not make much sense? Is the right hon. Gentleman further aware that if we were to pursue that line of cultural apartheid many works of art might leave our shores, and all that we would get in return would be a few statues of Queen Victoria and possibly old London bridge?

Mr. Luce: The right hon. Gentleman puts the point most effectively. That would set a precedent, which would lead to a major reduction in our great national collections, in which all the objects, including the Elgin marbles, have been acquired legally. The right hon. Gentleman should also put that question to his hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), who appears to be committed to the return of the Elgin marbles.

Mr. Jessel: As it is clear that the British museum has looked after the Elgin marbles very well for 150 years, can my right hon. Friend say what sort of care was given to them by the locals when the marbles were in Greece?

Mr. Luce: It would not be right for me to comment on that in detail, but I can say that the museum looks after the marbles magnificently. It has an excellent conservation service. Moreover, what is really important is that they were acquired legally, and it would require an Act of Parliament to change the position to compel the trustees to return them. I do not believe that that would be the wish of this Parliament.

Mr. Buchan: Rather a lot of rubbish has been talked, and it will be difficult to deal with all the rubbish in a short reply. May I point out, in the form of a question as a reply to the Minister, that when it is argued that the marbles were legally acquired, in fact they were sold by an occupying country? In other words, would the Minister say that the pictures that were removed by the Third Reich from Holland, Belgium and France, which, among other things, had been acquired by Goering, had been legally acquired? We said that they should have gone back to the countries of origin. In the same way, we believe that the marbles properly belong to Greece and that more British people will see them in Athens than in London. We unswervingly adhere to the proposition that they should be returned.

Mr. Luce: It is firmly established that the Elgin marbles were legally acquired under the sovereignty of the Ottoman empire as it was at that time. In 1816 the British Parliament passed an Act of Parliament that gave the authority to the British museum to retain the Elgin marbles.

Public Libraries (Loan Charges)

46. Mr. Murphy asked the Minister for the Arts if he has any plans to introduce legislation to require local authorities to introduce charges for the loan of books from public libraries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I have no such plans. The Government intend to maintain the present arrangements for free lending of books and other basic library services for individuals, but I encourage library authorities to develop other sources of revenue.

Mr. Murphy: I appreciate my right hon. Friend's support for the library service. Does he agree that the opportunity might be given to libraries to charge for fiction loans so that the extra resources can be used within the library service in the same way as charging for records already takes place?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend's point is perfectly legitimate. I know that other countries, including New Zealand, have a distinction between fiction and non-fiction. I have come to the view that, on educational grounds, it is difficult to draw a distinction between fiction and non-fiction. Therefore, it is best to retain the great traditions of a free lending service. It is possible for libraries to make charges in other areas, and a number of libraries do so with a great deal of enterprise.

Mr. Freud: I thank the Minister for his reply and welcome what he said. Will he steadily remember the importance of free access to books, whether fiction or non-fiction, for those studying.

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I have already made it plain that I intend to maintain that service. At the same time, I reinforce the view that I think there is scope for libraries to raise revenue in other ways, and they should be encouraged to do just that.

Mr. Buchan: The Minister has taken something of the sabre away from his answer. We want a firm response that in no circumstances will libraries be permitted to charge for the loan of books. The Government are trying to do that with museums. I believe that they are also trying to do it in other aspects of libraries. We want a clear and unequivocal statement that in no circumstances will that happen.

Mr. Luce: It would be good news if the hon. Gentleman would listen to my answers sometimes. I have made it plain that we have no intention of changing any of the existing plans to maintain a free basic library service.

CIVIL SERVICE

Unions (Meetings)

56. Mr. Soley asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met representatives of the Civil Service unions; and what was discussed.

The Minister for the Civil Service (Mr. Richard Luce): I have had no formal meetings with the Civil Service unions, but I did meet them informally on 25 March, and I attended the dinner of the First Division Association on 14 May. Topics of mutual interest were discussed informally.

Mr. Soley: When the Minister next meets the unions, will he raise with them the future of the Crown Suppliers and confirm the decision of the review staff that to privatise the Crown Suppliers would be against the public interest? Will he assure the House that he respects that decision by his own review team? Will he publish the supplementary report by the central purchasing unit that seems to be causing Ministers some embarrassment and is at the moment hidden from public view?

Mr. Luce: I shall look at the latter point that the hon. Gentleman raised. I am not absolutely clear that his first point is within my remit. I shall look into the matter and let the hon. Gentleman know.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Next time the Minister meets the trade unions, will he consider with them the damage that has been done by the Government's actions over GCHQ to industrial relations, to GCHQ itself and to the position of staff at GCHQ? In the light of all that, will the Minister reverse his decision and restore trade union rights at Cheltenham?

Mr. Luce: The position at GCHQ has been made clear repeatedly by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, and I have nothing further to add.

Mr. Leigh: In the light of the election of a Militant supporter to the general secretaryship of the CPSA, will my right hon. Friend reflect on the sadness of the fact that he and his colleagues on the Treasury Bench did not accept the amendment put forward by myself and other colleagues of his in favour of secret postal ballots?

Mr. Luce: I note my hon. Friend's views. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made plain last week, the election of officers of a trade union is entirely a matter for the membership itself. We have a long tradition of impartiality, professionalism and loyalty in the Civil Service. I hope and believe that that tradition will continue.

Mr. Terry Davis: Does the Minister think that it would be a good idea, when he next meets representatives of Civil Service unions, to discuss the need for more training for equal opportunities officers?

Mr. Luce: There are designated officers in each Government Department who look after the problems of equal opportunities. I am satisfied that that is working well.

Employment Qualifications

57. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Minister for the Civil Service if, pursuant to his answer of 16 June, Official Report, column 743, to the hon. Member for Leicester, East, he will list the groups regarded as subversive for the purpose of prohibition on employment on work vital to the security of the state.

Mr. Luce: No, Sir.

Mr. Bruinvels: Will my right hon. Friend include members of the Militant Tendency and its supporters who, I believe, are subversive? Does he recall that it was Militant that organised the great dispute at the DHSS office in Newcastle, costing the taxpayer £170 million? Does my right hon. Friend realise that John Macreadie's election is a danger to this nation's security, is anti-democratic and involves an organisation that seeks to undermine our valid Parliament? Surely something should be done urgently to purge Militant from the Civil Service.

Mr. Luce: I understand what my hon. Friend says, but I must point out that the general secretaries of these unions are union officials, not civil servants. Therefore, they have no more access to the Civil Service than an ordinary visitor, and the ordinary security precautions prevail. I repeat what I have said before to my hon. Friend:

"No one is precluded from employment in the Civil Service because of membership of a particular organisation. However, no one may be employed on work vital to the security of the state who is or has recently been a member of a Communist or Fascist organisation or of a subversive group whose aims are to undermine or overthrow parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means." —[Official Report, 16 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 743.]

Mr. Soley: Is there not a case for looking again at Lord Denning's wise judgment, that "subversion" should be defined as undermining the state by unlawful means? That would enable people, including the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), to give evidence to the police, or else deal with the matter in the normal way.

Mr. Luce: The criterion is well established. It was established in 1975 by the former Labour Government, and I am content to stick to that.

Sir Anthony Grant: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the worrying aspect of this infiltration is that, if it increases, there will be an increased tendency for Ministers, whatever their party, to bring into government their political nominees, and we shall thereby lose the benefits, which we have had for many years, of an impartial Civil Service?

Mr. Luce: I strongly reinforce my hon. Friend's comments on the need for an impartial Civil Service. The heart of the stability of our system is that we should have an impartial Civil Service which is loyal to any elected Government. We are entitled to that, and I believe that we have a Civil Service which, broadly speaking, is impartial, loyal, dedicated and professional.

Dr. MacDonald: Is the Minister aware that, despite his statements about the need for an impartial Civil Service and the fact that that is what we have—I entirely support those sentiments—the Government have worsened relationships between the Civil Service and the trade unions by their ban on trade union membership at GCHQ? Will he confirm, or deny, today's press reports that the director of GCHQ, Sir Peter Marychurch, has been asked to stay on until June 1988, one year after he is due to retire? Does he agree that the Government are perhaps hoping thereby to ensure that management at GCHQ is able to persuade an incoming Government to maintain the trade union ban? Will he take on board the fact that the Labour party, when it takes office after the next general election, will do nothing whatsoever of the kind and that it will reverse the Government's decision and allow trade union membership to continue at GCHQ?

Mr. Luce: I have already said on several occasions that the question of GCHQ is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary. It is wrong to take the view that the Government have not taken account of conditions in the Civil Service. The latest pay settlement shows that we are taking fully into account movements in the pay sector outside the Civil Service.

Mr. Gow: Will my right hon. Friend reconsider his earlier answer, when he said that the conduct of elections of trade union officials is a matter for the trade union? Does he agree that there is a wider and legitimate national interest in securing that elections for office in trade unions are conducted in every respect with scrupulous fairness and integrity?

Mr. Luce: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

Permanent and Deputy Secretaries

58. Mr. Wainwright asked the Minister for the Civil Service how many permanent secretaries and deputy secretaries at the present time are members qualified by examination of a United Kingdom chartered professional body.

Mr. Luce: This is not uncommon. Detailed records are not held centrally.

Mr. Wainwright: Is the Minister aware that my question was about the number of people in top jobs in the Civil Service who have professional qualifications? Will he answer it?

Mr. Luce: We do not have a specific record, but, if it is any help to the hon. Gentleman, roughly one in six of all those who are permanent secretaries or deputy secretaries have professional qualifications.

Early Retirement

59. Mr. Watts asked the Minister for the Civil Service what are the cost implications of negotiations to facilitate early retirement from the Civil Service.

Mr. Luce: The negotiations are intended to secure more flexible early retirement arrangements within the Civil Service. The intention is that the average cost of early retirement will not increase.

Mr. Watts: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that civil servants will not be able to retire on full pensions at the age of 50, as has been reported in recent press articles?

Mr. Luce: I can confirm that there has been inaccurate press reporting of the matter. The proposal, which is part of a comprehensive package which is still being discussed, is that civil servants should be given the right to retire on actuarially reduced pensions at no extra cost to the Exchequer.

Non-departmental Public Bodies

60. Mr. Dickens asked the Minister for the Civil Service how many non-departmental public bodies have been (a) abolished or (b) reformed since May 1979.

Mr. Luce: Between 1979 and 1985 a total of 756 non-departmental public bodies were abolished, rationalised or substantially reduced. During that period 242 new bodies were set up, resulting in a net reduction of 514.

Mr. Dickens: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government's quango hunt has not run out of steam?

Mr. Luce: I can confirm that. In the past year, in which there has been a review of the number of quangos, there has been a continuing net reduction.

Mr. Tony Banks: Does the Minister believe that when non-departmental bodies are set up by the Government, particularly when they replace democratically elected bodies — I am thinking specifically of the residuary bodies that were set up to replace the democratically elected Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils — Ministers should have the guts to answer questions about the activities of those non-departmental bodies?

Mr. Luce: I think that we are referring here to transitional bodies. The criterion whether a new quango should be set up is whether it can be proved to be the most cost-effective means of fulfilling Government policy.

South Africa

3.31 pm

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether it remains his intention to visit South Africa, and if so what are his plans.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I intend to make an early start on the mission entrusted to me at the recent European Council meeting in The Hague. I accordingly proposed last week to the Governments of Zambia, Zimbabwe and South Africa that I should visit them in the period 9 to 11 July on the first stage of the mission. The Zambian authorities have confirmed that a visit this week is convenient. The Zimbabwean authorities have given a similar indication, but we are still waiting for confirmation. The South African Government have made it clear that they are ready to receive me, but have proposed alternative dates. These are now under consideration. I shall therefore proceed with the visit to Lusaka and Harare, leaving from Strasbourg tomorrow evening, and plan to visit South Africa later in the month. Further visits to and within the region are, of course, not excluded.

Mr. Healey: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his statement. Does he agree that, following the refusal of black leaders in South Africa to see him, the humiliating snub from President Botha confirms all his initial doubts about the wisdom of his mission? Will he use this example to persuade the Prime Minister that she is not always right and that the Foreign Office is not always wrong?

The Opposition welcome the Foreign Secretary's visit to Zambia and Zimbabwe this week. The Government have left a lot of fences to be mended in those countries and there is a real risk of the Commonwealth breaking up unless he takes advantage of his mission to take more notice of the views expressed by those countries than the Government have taken so far.

Does the postponement of the Foreign Secretary's visit to South Africa mean that he intends to meet the conditions set for his visit to President Botha and, if so, what are those conditions? Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman assure the House that he is not seeking to delay matters until after the Commonwealth summit?

Does the Foreign Secretary accept the view expressed by President Mitterrand and the Prime Minister of the Netherlands and Denmark that the Government are committed to sanctions if his mission fails and does not secure the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and the unbanning of the African National Congress? Incidentally, will the Foreign Secretary take the opportunity, while he is in Lusaka, to visit the ANC, as emissaries of President Reagan have been doing over the past few days?

Finally, do the views expressed by the Prime Minister to Mr. Malcolm Rutherford and set out in last Friday's Financial Times now represent Her Majesty's Government's policy, in particular, that the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela will depend, as the article says, on the threat of sanctions and that the Government are prepared to go to the Security Council for mandatory sanctions if his mission fails?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I accept no responsibility for answering the right hon. Gentleman's more fanciful inquiries based on newspaper articles, for which neither my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister nor I have any responsibility. Nor do I intend to respond, in the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman put it, to suggestions of snubs or anything of that kind.

The position—I should like the right hon. Gentleman to understand this—is that I have been entrusted by the Community with a mission of some importance and outstanding difficulty. I intend to pursue it with patience and determination to see, so far as I can, all those whom I ought to see in discharge of the objective of trying to promote an opportunity for dialogue to take place.

I am not yet able to say when the mission will come to a conclusion. I intend to pursue it patiently and as far as I can.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House in her report on the meeting at The Hague, certain measures have been taken in the past against South Africa and certain other contingencies are being studied in the terms set out in The Hague communiqué.

If it turns out to be convenient and possible, I shall certainly be prepared to consider an opportunity of meeting representatives of the ANC, because it is important to urge them as well as others of the need, above all, to turn away from violence in southern Africa and try instead to go down the path of dialogue, negotiation and conciliation.

With regard to broken fences in South Africa, I shall try my best to repair those which the right hon. Gentleman has destroyed.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the good will and good wishes of every sensible person in Britain and in Europe will go with him in his attempts to bring an increasingly tragic state of affairs in southern Africa to as speedy an end as possible?

Will he also accept that many Conservative Members, I hope all, believe that his visit is necessary in order to counterbalance the impression created by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), the Opposition spokesman on foreign affairs, and many other Members of the House?

Thirdly, will he accept that many people in the House, and most people in the country, will welcome his readiness to meet the ANC when he visits Lusaka?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for each of his three comments. I appreciate that on almost every aspect of this case it is not easy to do anything that commands universal assent. Subject to that, I am most grateful for his support.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Is the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary aware that we on these Benches wish his series of missions all success and hope that he will be able to talk to all those whom he wishes to see, but does he recognise that his chances of doing that will be greater if he stresses that he is going as President of the Council of Ministers of the European Community, and that as such he will not be handicapped by the public foot-dragging on sanctions of the Prime Minister? Will he also make it clear to the South African Government that the question is not whether white minority rule changes, but when and how, and that most of us would prefer it to be sooner and peacefully, rather than later and violently?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman made some observations for which I am grateful, but he spoilt his intervention by a rather graceless reference to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. The important point that he makes, which I want to underline, is the extent to which one must try to build on positions that are common as far as possible. President Botha has said that apartheid is an outmoded system and that he looks forward to a system that will be without domination by any race. All those things are pointers in the right direction and will help me in the difficult search for a way to dialogue.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): Are not these matters rather too serious for the juvenile debating points that are all that the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) has in his armoury? Will my right hon. and learned Friend make it clear that he goes with the support not only of this Government but of that of the 11 other almost most important Governments in the world?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for underlining that point. It is important for it to be understood, and I think it is, that I am going as the Foreign Minister and the current President of the European Council of Ministers, and that I am supported by the other 11 Governments.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): When the Foreign Secretary eventually visits South Africa, will he accept that the release of Nelson Mandela, long overdue as it is and universally welcomed as it will be, will not in itself be enough? Does the Foreign Secretary recall that in an interview with a British newspaper last year Nelson Mandela said that his own freedom and the freedom of his fellow citizens are indivisible?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman has made an important point and it is in line with the point made in the statement by the European Council at the Hague, which said:

"This dialogue cannot take place as long as recognised leaders of the Black community are detained and their organisations are proscribed."

It is plain that a further amplification of the scope for democratic dealogue is important. Most people recognise that the prospect of the release of Nelson Mandela is far and away the most important key, if there can be a key.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the tone of the questions by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) and what he has been saying in the media and elsewhere make it doubly clear that his principal objective is to try to sabotage the Foreign Secretary's mission before it starts? That is sheer mischief making. On this occasion, is it not right that every responsible hon. Member who wishes not to jeopardise the prospects of the success of this mission should not press my right hon. and learned Friend too hard? Mr. Speaker, these exchanges need not be prolonged indefinitely.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As far as I can, I acknowledge the force of the points made by my hon. Friend. I hope that the wisdom that exudes from his present important position will penetrate at Leeds, East.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does the Foreign Secretary realise what a farce this has become and that he was right in the first place to have many reservations about his trip to South Africa? When will he persuade the Prime Minister that there is no effective alternative to sanctions against the apartheid regime and that trips to South Africa or anywhere else are no substitute for such action? The Foreign Secretary may know that such action was advocated last night by his Minister of State on a television programme.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I wish that this problem could be resolved as easily as the hon. Gentleman so readily implies. He knows, or he ought to know, that it is far too superficial to argue that this long-standing and difficult problem can be resolved by the mounting of comprehensive sanctions against South Africa. The position set out last week by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is the position adopted by my hon. Friend and by me. Over the years certain measures have been taken against South Africa. Certain contingency plans outlined in The Hague communiqué are being made.

"We do not think that threatening further sanctions immediately or automatically will help to bring about the negotiations that we desire". [Official Report, 1 July 1986; Vol. 100, c. 822.]

That was said by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, and it represents the position of the Government.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Does my right hon. and learned Friend realise that his mission is bound to get the good will and support of all people of wisdom and common sense in every European country, but particularly in Britain, in view of his position as President of the Council of Ministers? Over the weekend there was an outburst by the South African Foreign Minister against sanctions. Does my right hon. and learned Friend draw an optimistic, or pessimistic, conclusion from that stance, which appears to be a change of line on the part of the South African Government? It is not a wish not to have sanctions imposed. They are defiantly saying, "Come and get us, we do not care."

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the first part of his question. As for the second part of it, it is tempting in circumstances of this kind to feel obliged to comment on almost every statement that is reported in the newspapers or elsewhere, but I do not think that that is helpful, even though I understand why my hon. Friend has made that point.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): The right hon. and learned Gentleman has stressed that he is going to South Africa to represent the EEC as well as this country. Will he keep in mind the circumstances that give rise to his visit – that sanctions are wanted immediately, but that he and the Prime Minister want sanctions, if they are to be imposed at all, to be postponed? Will he keep in mind that the bulk of his fellow Ministers in the Community favour sanctions, not because they or we believe that sanctions are the only solution, but because they are a necessary solution to bring home to the South African white regime that it must come to terms and an agreement on the basis eventually of one man, one vote?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall bear in mind my own assessment of the views formed and the advice given by the other members of the Council of Ministers. I shall certainly bear in mind that the Heads of Government of a number of other countries took the same view as Britain and that many of those who considered the matter carefully were increasingly impressed with the need to adopt a patient and cautious approach to this matter. That is why the conclusion set out in the communiqué was unanimous.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Would not sanctions, as called for by the Opposition, have a catastrophic effect upon some of those other countries that my right hon. and learned Friend is about to visit, with our goodwill? Does it not also show a misunderstanding of the South African Government and the Afrikaners generally to suppose that sanctions will bring about any desirable effect? It is not important to encourage as well as to warn?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There is real force in both of my hon. Friend's points, and I endorse the last part of his question.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): If Britain's Foreign Secretary, who is President of the EEC Council of Ministers, has not been snubbed and humiliated by the South African Government, will he tell the House the date of his rearranged visit to South Africa and whether it will take place before the Commonwealth summit? Will he also make it a condition of his rearranged visit to South Africa that even if he does not see the President and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of South Africa, he must see Nelson Mandela?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall tell the House of the date, or dates, of my further visits when those are clear. I told the House in my original statement that they are still the subject of further discussion. Those whom I shall hope to see certainly include all those who were mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that he goes to South Africa with the total goodwill not only of this House but of the whole of Europe? Will he also explain to those who are criticising his mission that this country started this century with nearly 500,000 men-at-arms against the Afrikaners, that 22,000 perished in South Africa at the beginning of this century and that our track record in opposing the Boers is impeccable?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am always grateful to my hon. Friend for the depth and breadth of his historical analysis, and I shall bear in mind what he said, but I shall also try to bear in mind more recent events than that.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): In view of the Foreign Secretary's understandable request for patience and time, has he seen the announcement in this morning's edition of The Guardian, which reminds us that more or less the same thing was said in 1963, 25 years ago? Does he have in mind a shorter time span than 25 years?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no doubt that the longer the unresolved policy of apartheid has continued in South Africa, the harder has become the task of its removal, but in making that kind of assessment one should take account of the steps that have been taken in the last year or two. I know that it is fashionable to discount them completely. They should not be so discounted. We have to try to start from where we now are and move as quickly as possible towards a solution that is founded on dialogue, not on violence.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to bear in mind that this is private Members' day and that this is a private notice question. I shall call two more hon. Members, one from each side of the House.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): Would my right hon. and learned Friend's task be made any easier if the buccaneering tendencies of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) could be restrained, as he is increasingly behaving like the Captain Morgan of foreign policy?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am always content to accept my hon. Friend's judgment on the performance of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey).

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Will the Foreign Secretary's bargaining position be strengthened, or weakened, if it is clear that the European Community will take further action should his mission fail?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The position of the European Community is clearly stated in the communiqué to which I have referred the House. It is clearly to the effect that further measures that might be needed are now the subject of contingency planning, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House last week.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have endeavoured today to give priority to those hon. Members who were not called on previous exchanges, and I hope the House will think that that is fair.

Future of Manufacturing Industry

3.51 pm

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): I beg to move,

That this House agrees that manufacturing industry has a central part to play in the future prosperity of the United Kingdom, and, that, in order to succeed in a fiercely competitive world, it must use the most modern manufacturing methods, and market its products with skill; notes further, that the importance of manufacturing must be recognised by society generally and by schools and colleges in particular, so that industry can surmount the present shortage of skills; and believes finally that success in manufacturing can only be won in any enterprise through the united efforts of all the workforce.

I feel very fortunate in having won the ballot for a motion today. When I became a Member of Parliament I was told that the chances of any private Member winning the ballot for a private Member's motion during his time in Parliament were so remote that if he did so he could well become a statistic.

I want to debate the future of manufacturing industry, because I know that our success in manufacturing is central to our future prosperity. Some say that we can earn our wealth in other ways and give the impression that the decline in manufacturing is inevitable, and even tolerable, and that service industries, financial earnings, tourism and raw materials can plug the gap. Sadly, they are badly wrong. Although we need a balanced economy and services have a great role to play, manufacturing industry is the engine of our prosperity and generates that essential spark that gives vitality to the rest of our economy.

The Italians were the first bankers in Europe just because they were at the hub of medieval commerce. Insurance and the vast network of wealth that spread from it were born in this country because of our growing commercial dominance, and our tremendous success in the service industries flourished in the wake of our manufacturing prowess in Victorian times. In the same progression we can be sure that Japan, with its present industrial strength, will be the centre for services in the next century. If we cannot reverse the trend in our manufacturing decline, our services will sink in tandem.

To resuscitate and expand manufacturing is a national priority. It is our lifeline to the future. Right now, manufacturing supports one quarter of all our jobs, that is, 5·5 million people. It creates one quarter of our annual wealth and still contributes nearly half of our overseas earnings. The picture and history are grim. This is a story of decline over many years, and its statistics are felt in every household and high street in Britain.

In 1964 we made 14 per cent. of world manufactures, but the figure for 1986 is half that. Our balance of trade in many key sectors, such as motor vehicles and electrical and electronic engineering, has turned from surplus to deficit, and we all know the sad story of our once proud motor bike industry. However, we have a duty also to praise what has gone right. In the past five years huge efforts have been made to reverse the trend. Our steel industry has been saved from extinction and is now one of the most efficient in Europe. Our motor industry has struggled to overcome the despair of the 1970s, and what we do best—our Jaguars and Rolls-Royces—has kept the name of British car making alive in the world. Since 1982 productivity in manufacturing has grown by one quarter.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my hon. Friend think that there is cause for concern in the Bank of England's bulletin for June 1986, issued today, which states that our labour unit costs rose by only 0·2 per cent. in 1983, but that in 1985 by rose by 3·1 per cent., thus making our competitive position that much more difficult?

Mr. Carlisle: My hon. Friend is right. We cannot regain our position in the world unless we are truly competitive. However, there are outstanding individual successes.

In my constituency of Lincoln, Ruston Gas Turbines is at the forefront of turbine technology. In the past eight years its output has nearly trebled, 90 per cent. of which is for export. During that period it has created a new business in its control equipment department, which now employs 120 people and designs sophisticated controls for turbines. It has invested heavily in plant and technology, and needs people of great skill to hold its own. Although its production has trebled the number of people employed has remained roughly the same, about 2,500. The lesson is clear: to sustain employment in manufacturing in an age of technology a business must be both competitive and expand its sales. There are successes, but we have still not reversed the general historic trend of decline, and we must do that.

In this debate we should all accept that for manufacturing to flourish we need a stable, healthy economy and that, as exporters, we need markets for our products. The Labour party's extravagant plans for a ruinous binge of spending offer no comfort, and its trade policy, which yearns for protection, is not a policy but a mirage of a policy which offers no future for industry.

A crucial task of any Government is to face reality, insist that trade should be fair, fight for an open trading system, which in the end, as a trading nation, we need. It must analyse the reasons for the decline in manufacturing and construct a policy for success.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on winning the ballot, but before he turns his arrows to Labour party policy, would it not be wise to deal with the way in which British manufacturing industry has been decimated in the past seven years and the fact that mass unemployment has returned to areas such as the west midlands which was once the most prosperous area in the United Kingdom, but where unemployment is now higher than the national average? Moreover, in parts of the west midlands, such as in my constituency, during the past three years unemployment has been running at about 17 per cent. or more.

Mr. Carlisle: As usual, the hon. Gentleman exaggerates his case. I was arguing that manufacturing has no chance unless the economy in which it functions is stable and has some hope for the future. We all know that under the Labour party's plans the economic structure within which industry would operate would indeed be dicey.

All the recent studies of manufacturing, including the Finniston report on engineering and the House of Lords report on trade, point to a kind of cultural weakness in Britain. In Germany the engineer is revered. Here he has no particular status. His pay is too low, and that of the banker, whose very existence depends on him, is too high. That cultural failing is now recognised in this country, and it must be a major strand of Government policy that such a failing should be reversed from the earliest age in education.

In truth, there is no career finer, more constructive or more valuable for this country than one of making products that one's fellow humans want and need. It is not enough to say that—we must act on it. Much depends on the quality of education and the relevance of our training. We are facing a famine of people with the right skills, and it is a terrible paradox that even at a time of unemployment there are growing skill shortages.

In 1980 Finniston said:

"We genuinely fear a chronic shortage of engineers over the last decade of the century unless in the meantime there is a major increase in the proportion of young people opting for an engineering career".

We now produce 9,000 engineers a year, but if we trained them in the same ratio as Japan, we would have between 30,000 and 40,000 new engineers each year. Our industries spend about 0·15 per cent. of their sales turnover on adult training, but overseas the figure is often between 2 and 3 per cent.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): The hon. Gentleman is clearly referring to professional engineers rather than to engineers who are apprentices. Is he aware that in certain parts of the country apprenticed engineers have finished their apprenticeships but have no hope whatever of employment—for example, on the north-east coast and on Merseyside? Incidentally, even if they manage to get the odd job, they can find nowhere to live.

Mr. Carlisle: I was referring to professional engineers coming out of our colleges of higher education and universities, but I accept the hon. Gentleman's point. There is also a great need for highly skilled engineering workers. Our training must also be directed towards that section, because there is a genuine need. However, the solution is complex and it must grow from a partnership between the Government and industry. Each must do more.

Much has already been done. For example, one welcomes the growth of the TVEI programme in schools, the expenditure of £43 million on the engineering and technology programme to create an additional 5,000 graduates, and the effort of industry in the Information Technology Skills Agency, but we cannot be complacent. We must increase our efforts. We must ensure an adequate supply of mathematics and physics teachers, even though the measures required do not fit snugly into accepted educational thinking. Schools must have strong and working links with local industry. Local colleges of technology must have the necessary facilities, and training relevant to local industry. In higher education, we must reinforce the recent trend to give better support to science and engineering.

Industry must also shoulder its share of responsibility for training. We should aim to make matters more favourable for those companies which do train than for those which do not. We should also insist that in their annual reports companies explain what they are doing about training.

Just as six years ago the Finniston report called for a transformation in training, so recently the Coopers and Lybrand report on training was entitled "A challenge to complacency". On all sides the message is clear—without the skills we cannot succeed. But even if we magically acquire a legion of highly skilled workers, only one fraction of the problem would be solved. It is like a car with one wheel. We must also have good management, rigorous and skilful marketing and investment in new technology.

In the last five years the Government's general industrial support for new technology in industry has more than doubled, after allowing for inflation, but I still believe that we can—and must—refine and extend this, not merely to sustain industry, but to act as a spur and a support in the harsh world of new development. Clearly targeted support is more productive than general regional subsidy.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Does my hon. Friend consider that employment in both our constituencies has been helped by the fact that Scunthorpe, with development area status, is siphoning off employers?

Mr. Carlisle: Clearly the proximity of a development area acts as a blight on the regions next door. One of the problems is that four years ago the development areas were more clearly defined. My hon. Friend speaks of a real problem from which we suffer in Lincolnshire.

Management also has a key role to play in the crucial area of human relations in industry. Marks and Spencer always talks about human relations in industry, not just about industrial relations. That is a major reason for its success. However, as a nation we have for too long been locked in an abyss of industrial relations, and we must break out of it before we are left with no relations at all.

Teamwork and involvement are vital. More manufacturers should adopt the use of quality circles, and more still should embrace profit sharing. Only some 550 companies have profit-sharing schemes under the Finance Act 1978, despite the added incentives that our Government have given. It is crucial for good human relations in industry that all the work-force should share in the success of their company, just as they must share the burden of difficulty and failure. Teamwork involves unity of purpose between management and unions for the benefit of both business and work-force. We must add to the incentives for profit sharing and ensure a major and rapid spread of these schemes.

I dare say that there is not a Member of Parliament who at some time in his or her constituency has not witnessed an example of the perilously high cost of these failures of human relations in industry. In my own constituency we are at a critical moment. We have a business called Clayton-Dewandre, which employs 700 people. It is a company of skill and good technology and is a major supplier of braking systems to the British truck industry. Yet that company faces disaster because for more than 20 years there has been a poverty of good human relations. Unless an agreement can be reached very soon to enable the business to face competition, that company will leave Lincoln to manufacture elsewhere, either in the United Kingdom or in Germany.

I am not here to apportion blame, but this is a desperately serious matter both for the people who work in the business and for the city. The root cause of the crisis is not lack of skill, but lack of unity, lack of teamwork and a lack of involvement in the business stretching back more than 20 years, the effect of which has bred distrust and a cynical view of the future. I appeal to all in that business to get together once again to keep it in Lincoln. Events here sadly show just how hard we must work to involve all in the success of their business.

[Mr. Carlisle]

I feel deeply that as a country we have much to do to rebuild and sustain our manufacturing industry. We must radically change our cultural and psychological attitudes towards manufacturing. We need urgent action in education and training. Management must become more receptive, creative and professional.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Carlisle: No, I am sorry. Human relations in industry must become human, otherwise there will be no relations and no industry. I believe that the Government understand the problem and are seeking to redress it through a series of measures. I also believe that the Opposition recognise the problem, but they wish to implement policies which would remove us further and fatally from the world market place. The cost of that to the taxpayer would be intolerable, and the cost to the nation and its future incalculable.

Any Government can create only the framework. Without a true marriage with industry, we are doomed to even further decline. There is no greater challenge that faces this country, and therefore no greater challenge that faces this House. I hope that in this debate we can add our weight to the urgency and give an impetus to success.

4.10 pm

Mr. Roy Jenkins (Glasgow, Hillhead): The hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) opened this debate with a reflective and interesting speech. The debate is certainly on an important subject and I congratulate the hon. Member for Lincoln on choosing this topic and I believe that we should have a worthwhile discussion on the matter.

Several fallacies have been accepted too freely recently about the position of our manufacturing industry in the balance of our economy. The biggest fallacy is the view that salvation lies in services, and only in services. The corollary to that is that it is inevitable and desirable that over the past two decades there has been a reduction of nearly 3 million in employment in manufacturing industry. That is a massive reduction and represents nearly 40 per cent. of the total in manufacturing industry over that time.

I do not believe that that should have been the case. That has been precipitate and dangerous and it has not been associated with an increase in productivity which has led to our maintaining our relative manufacturing position.

Between 1975 and 1984, Japan increased manufacturing output by 61 per cent.; the United States by 41 per cent.; West Germany by 16 per cent.; Italy by 22 per cent. and our manufacturing output actually fell by 4·5 per cent..

We already have the largest service sector of any large developed economy with the exception of the United States. One might say that that is fine. The United States is the richest economy in the world and has the largest service sector. As a natural development from that, we, as the second richest economy, should have the second largest service sector. Unfortunately, there is a snag in that logic: we are very far from being the second richest economy in the world. All the other advanced economies of comparable size have a substantially smaller service sector and a substantially bigger manufacturing sector than we have. That is especially so in Germany and Japan, and less substantially so in France and Italy.

Mr. Dykes: I agree with the right hon. Member. Does he agree that although the motion proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) is in every way excellent and effective, as he said, it is surprising that amidst all the references to the need for a much higher investment ratio and new public and private assets in this country, especially for high technology, the United Kingdom invests less than any of the other advanced OECD countries?

Mr. Jenkins: I do not wish to be committed to the terms of the hon. Gentleman's motion. He has opened the subject up by his motion, but I do not think that it contains a complete catalogue of recipes for our present ills in this respect.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jenkins: No, I should like to make some progress.

It is impossible to sustain the belief that a large service sector is the symbol of success. In our case it is the reverse. We have already gone too far in that direction, although some movement in that direction was clearly inevitable and even desirable.

It is important to bear in mind that services are difficult to export. Some are almost unexportable. They can only be performed or consumed on the spot. Even when they can be exported, they are mostly operating – regrettably in many ways – in much more protected markets than goods. I hope that we can make progress to change that position, especially in the European Community. It would be a mistake to count Lord Cockfield's chickens before they are hatched. There is no doubt that services operate in a more protected market than does manufacturing industry.

The position is that 64 per cent. of our labour force is employed in services, which produces only one quarter of our overseas trading income. A little more than 20 per cent. still employed in manufacturing industry must produce the rest. That is a good reason why we should cherish that 20 per cent.

Mr. Fallon: The right hon. Gentleman has correctly concentrated on the large size of the service sector in the British economy. Does he accept that one reason why it is so large is that public sector service employment is included in that definition?

Mr. Jenkins: That is a factor, but it is by no means the only factor, and nor are we the only country with large public sector employment. For instance, Italy has a lower proportion in the service sector but has just as large a proportion of its population in public service employment as we have. The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) has made a valid point, but it does not explain the whole position.

Another fallacy about the balance of industry is that unemployment is essentially technological and therefore inevitable and incurable. I do not accept that, for several reasons. First, it is difficult to reconcile that proposition with the fact that both Japan and the United States – the two countries furthest into advanced technology – have the lowest rates of unemployment. Their rates are very significantly lower than ours. I also do not believe that that proposition has historical validity. The revolution of information technology has not had a greater effect on labour than the vast reductions in the numbers of those working on the land and in domestic services which were features of our changing employment demography over the past 100 years.

The devastating weakness of manufacturing employment and prospects in this country has been caused by a combination of four factors. First, in the past decade and a quarter from 1973 the whole industrialised world, with certain exceptions — the United States in 1983-84 and some of the countries of the Pacific basin—has found it much more difficult to maintain rapid and sustained growth than previously.

Secondly, the United Kingdom was less competitive in manufacturing industry than most other countries, and we still are after seven years of this Conservative Government.

Thirdly, we pursued a remarkably foolish exchange rate policy in 1980 and 1985 which was a very vulnerable period. That has had a permanent effect on manufacturing industry from which we have not nearly recovered. In fact, we are not pursuing a very wise exchange rate policy now, even though it is not as foolish as the policy to which I have referred.

The fourth point is related to demography. This has continued for longer than was expected 10 years ago and has continued to work against us in the sense that more people are seeking to come on to the labour market than come off it. That position should change by the early 1990s.

As a result of these factors we have suffered unnecessary and dangerous de-industrialisation. It is worth remembering as a sombre fact, in view of the other difficulties in the world, that in this country we have effectively twice the male unemployment rate of America, Japan, France, Germany or Italy. That is a pretty devastating criticism of the state of our industry.

One of the dangers of precipitate and excessive closing down of industry is that it is extremely difficult to reverse. Almost by its very nature it is an irreversible process. It is a new thing to look at the 1930s favourably, but it is instructive to consider the precedent of that decade. At the beginning of the decade, unemployment was at about the present level. It was somewhat worse in reality for a short time in relation to the size of the economy then — from 1931 to 1933.

An unemployed man in 1931 suffered far greater absolute poverty than does an unemployed man today, but his prospects of getting a job rapidly became considerably better than has happened in the 1980s. By 1935, unemployment was down to just below 2 million and, by 1937, it was down to 1·5 million.

Perhaps even more important was the fact that the capacity of basic industries was not then permanently destroyed. They had a very bad time in the first part of the decade. That was symbolised, perhaps, by the famous example of work on the Queen Mary at the John Brown yard at Clydebank, which was suspended for two and a half years because the Cunard company ran out of money. Work was started again with Government subsidies. The important difference was that the yard was not dismantled or closed. Steelworks, coal mines, heavy engineering plant and even textile mills survived and were available. They were called back into service, sometimes in a slightly different form, first with rearmament and then when the war brought rapidly soaring demand.

I have come increasingly to the view that the Government stand back too much from industry. In my experience, they do so more than any other Government in the European Community. They do so more than the United States Government. We have to remember the vast US defence involvement in industry. They certainly stand back more than do the Japanese Government. To some extent, the motive is the feeling that we have had an uncompetitive and rather complacent industry which must be exposed to the full blasts of competition, and if that means contracts, even Government contracts, going overseas, we should shrug our shoulders and say that the wind should be stimulating.

That process has been carried much further in Britain than in any other comparable rival country. I am resolutely opposed to protectionism. I am sure that it diminishes the employment and wealth-creating capacity of the world as a whole. That would be the result of plunging back into that policy. I also believe, however, that this totally arm's-length approach in the relationship between Government and industry is something that no other comparable Government contemplate to the extent that we do. It is not producing good results for British industry and it is a recipe for a further decline in Britain's position in the Western world. The Government should examine it carefully and reverse it in several important respects.

Mr. Cecil Parkinson (Hertsmere): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) on his choice of subject. It is good that Parliament should debate such an important subject in the unacrimonious atmosphere of a private Members' day. Whichever party is in power, the manufacturing sector will remain vital. I do not regard today as a chance to score points. Rather, it is a chance to discuss a vital subject.

I am pleased to join the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) in saying that what is sometimes presented as a choice, but is not, between Britain being a manufacturing or a service country is utterly spurious. We must succeed in both.

I should like to pick up a point that the right hon. Gentleman made. He talked about our exchange rate policy in 1980-81. I was the Minister for Trade at the time and saw many industrialists who said that if the exchange rate was at $2 to the pound we could sweep the world. During that period the Government never charged the rate of interest that matched the rate of inflation. We never had a real rate of interest paid to savers. The Government did not offer a real rate of interest — they offered one substantially below the rate of inflation.

The Government had recently been elected on a sound money platform, following a Government who, until they were stopped by the International Monetary Fund, had followed a very unsound money policy. The world's money markets put a substantial value on sterling. The Government were committed to trying to protect sterling's value, and they were prepared to charge the borrower a higher rate of interest than had been charged before, but never a real rate. People who argue about our exchange rate policy in 1980-81 are saying that the Government should have perpetrated an even bigger cheat on the saver by having a rate of interest which was even further below the rate of inflation.

[Mr. Cecil Parkinson]

People such as the right hon. Member for Hillhead are arguing that we should have continued to rob the saver so that we could support the borrower. Put in those terms, it is clear that such a view is not nearly as noble as saying in a rather sweeping way that the Government got their exchange rate policy wrong. I do not think that they did get it wrong. They were seen by the the financial markets as prepared to follow sensible policies and to charge a rate of interest which began to approach, but never got very near to, the rate of inflation. I do not accept the rather dismissive argument that everything can be traced back to the Government's exchange rate policy.

Nor do I accept the statements that are now made so often that they are almost accepted as true that Britain's manufacturing industry is in terminal decline. The facts do not support that thesis. Industrial production last year was clearly recovering dramatically from the low point of 1981. I know that Opposition Members say that 1981 was an all-time low, but if manufacturing was still in decline, the figures would continue to fall. We have reversed that trend. Manufacturing production is growing substantially. To the dismay of our opponents, it should achieve all-time record levels next year.

There is nothing to be complacent about, but the statement that our industry is still in decline is not borne out by any test which any fair-minded person would care to apply. Production has bounced back substantially and is continuing to rise. For the first time, exports of manufactured goods reached a value of £52 billion last year – £1 billion a week. Industry invested nearly £7 billion last year and nearly 6 million people were employed in manufacturing. If we constantly talk about our industry having no prospects, and if we write it off, we will help to produce just what we complain of. Who buys his car or anything else from a business which is about to close down and has no future? For us to dismiss the efforts of the 6 million-plus workers in our manufacturing sector as people who are somehow misguidedly dedicating their lives to trying to breathe life into a corpse is not only to mislead the world and the British public, but to cause damage where we need help and support.

Mr. Dykes: I am sure that we would all agree with that. However, does my right hon. Friend agree that the £7 billion figure that he gave is less than 2·5 per cent. of gross domestic product, the lowest figure of any advanced Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development investing country?

Mr. Parkinson: That may be the case. However, my point is that to dismiss our manufacturing sector as something that people are not interested in and has no future is to mislead the country and the House. The market was prepared to invest £7 billion in its future in 1985. Perhaps we should be investing more, but £7 billion is a substantial sum of money, and it is put up by people who believe that they are investing in something that has a real future, and so do I.

Let us take the anecdotal evidence. For instance, a constituent came to see me on Saturday who is a director of MFI. He told me that in 1976 MFI imported 60 per cent. of everything it sold. That figure is now down to below 25 per cent. MFI is in fact using more and more British goods because they are excellent value.

Goodness knows, as Minister for Trade I took part in many debates about the textile industry. Last year textile production was near to an all-time record high and textile exports were at an all-time record high. This year the British engineering industry will invest £850 million in computers and software, and a recent survey suggests that outside Japan the British engineering industry makes more use of high technology and engineering computers than any other engineering industry in the world. British industry was in decline for a time, but the decline has been arrested, and the climb back has begun in real earnest. There is a very good prospect for Britain in an area which, far too often, we talk about dismissively.

If we apply the wrong tests to the statistics that emerge, we can turn success into failure and failure into success. For example, I heard the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) making an interesting speech about the steel industry. He said that we should look at the good old days when steel employed 250,000 people and it now employs only 100,000. To him that was proof that our steel industry was in a state of decline. However, when the steel industry employed 250,000 people it was losing nearly £3 million a day. We had a steel capacity which we simply could not use and which nobody wanted. Therefore, we had 250,000 insecure jobs. We have moved from that position to having the best and most efficient steel industry in Europe producing as much steel with 100,000 people as it used to produce with 250,000. With 250,000 employees losing £3 million a day it is a national asset by the test of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield; with 100,000 employees producing steel at a very competitive price it is a national problem. That is absolutely wrong.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The right hon. Gentleman is making an interesting point about steel. Is he aware that an even more competitive steel industry in Japan, faced with a similar fall in orders and intense competition from Korea and other new producers, is maintaining its employment and diversifying in order to maintain a policy of lifelong employment? Does he not think that that kind of policy is more relevant in this country today?

Mr. Parkinson: It depends where one starts from. I shall give an example from a different industry in Japan, the motor industry. In 1978 the motor industry in Japan was producing 65 vehicles per employee on average, and we were producing in our worst company, five and a half. At that level of productivity one can start to think in terms of lifelong employment, because one starts at a high level of productivity. However, if one has an industry which is losing substantial sums of money and is unproductive, it is unrealistic to talk of ensuring lifelong employment. The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), who studies these things carefully, must realise that.

First, I am saying that it is wrong to talk as though British industry is still in decline. It is starting to recover. It is wrong to draw the wrong conclusions from the available statistics. Industry does not exist to create jobs; it exists to create products. The industries which are efficient at creating viable products produce the best insurance of long-term employment.

Secondly, we continually draw attention to the fact that we have a huge and growing deficit on manufactures. That is true, but the conclusion we draw from that is the wrong one. We say that we need more Government demand injected into our economy. The bigger the level of our imports, the more evidence there is that there are customers here who want to buy. The argument that a deficit on manufactures is somehow evidence of a need for further demand to be injected into the economy by the Government again seems to be drawing totally the wrong conclusion from the facts that stare us in the face.

It was interesting to read in The Times today that a survey of British management said that the first priority for a better industrial performance was to improve the product. I thought immediately of Jaguar. Jaguar is now a highly profitable company selling the same range of motor cars as it was selling six or seven years ago. It has moved from being a disaster to a success because it has improved the quality of its performance. The product is the same, the range has not changed, but the prospects for those in the company and for this country, as the country in which Jaguar is based, have changed. The reason is that the quality of the product has improved out of all recognition.

Far too often in the House, especially in our economic debates, we have arguments about whether an extra £1 billion or £2 billion of Government-injected demand would turn the economy round. If it was as simple as that I might be tempted to join the argument for reflation. However, I hasten to tell the House that I will not, because I think that it is distracting us from the fundamental problem, which is how does this country compete for the business which is there? At home there is a great demand for the whole range of manufactured goods. World trade in manufactures is expanding. The customers are there overseas as well, and the real question which the House, the Government and British industry have to address is how we get a bigger share of the business which is there rather than how we generate artificial demand.

I do not underestimate the difficulties of trade union leaders at a time of high unemployment having to persuade their members that the way forward may be to reduce employment in industries because with new technology and a whole host of advances we can produce more with less people. I recognise the enormous difficulties that that presents for trade union leaders. I believe that we should pay tribute to the many trade union leaders and members who have co-operated with management in improving productivity in British industry.

I end as I began. I believe that if we continue to talk down our prospects as a manufacturing country, and if we continue to talk about our decline as if it were terminal, we must not be surprised if people start to believe us and if we produce the results that we do not want. This country has bright prospects. Way into the foreseeable future, we shall have a very important manufacturing sector. We have a strong service sector. We are prolific earners of invisible earnings. We have substantial overseas investments. Although we talk about it as if it is a problem, we still have energy self-sufficiency.

This country has a very bright future to add to its glittering past, but we shall need, as a country, and especially within industry, to produce that cohesion, that co-operative attitude that is the source of the success of all our major rivals. The question for Britain is: how do we compete? One of the answers – such an obvious one – is: working better together. Britain's future as a manufacturer stretches ahead of her. She has a fine past, but a very promising and exciting future.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) on introducing this debate. I worked in the manufacturing industry from the time I left school at the age of 14 until I arrived in this place in 1979. I am one of the small band of Members of Parliament who has not only seen but worn a pair of overalls.

The right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) said that union leaders had to be told that we had to have fewer men and more efficiency. But let me talk about the American motor car industry some time ago, when General Motors had just modernised one of its factories. The general secretary of the Automobile Workers Union was invited to come along and see the new automated factory. He was taken round the factory and shown the robots that were doing all the work that was previously done by members of his union. He was taken upstairs for a drink, after he had been shown round. He was told, "There you are. You have seen the factory. You will not be able to get any of those robots into your union." The general secretary of the union said to the manager of General Motors, "Nor will you be able to sell them any of your cars." The point is that if there are no workers, what is the company to do with the manufactured goods unless it gives them away or gives people the money with which to buy them?

I should like to talk about the north-east. In spite of what has been said by some Conservative Members, we see it as a danger that this country's manufacturing base is being eroded. A survey of the north-east, carried out in the 1970s, showed that 28 per cent. of male employment in the region relied on heavy manufacturing industry. What has happened over the past 10 years – not just the past seven years – in the steel industry, for example? The number of people employed in the north-east has dropped from 22,000 to 7,600. There has been a loss of jobs of almost 21,000 in the north-east, an area that has had high unemployment for a considerable time.

In an intervention, it was said that Scunthorpe had got something at the expense of Lincoln. I should like to tell the House that Scunthorpe has just got a new steel plant at the expense of Jarrow and Warrington. British Steel has closed its Jarrow and Warrington plants. A private company called Caparo Ltd. has decided to open a plant in Scunthorpe. I met the manager of Caparo and suggested that the company should try and do something in Jarrow. The workers and management in Jarrow were even prepared to carry out a buyout of the plant in Jarrow because it was economical. British Steel wanted nothing to do with that. The problem was not that the plant could not compete, but that there was such a thing as an EEC quota, and we could produce only a certain quantity of steel. When one talks about free competition and producing things economically, one has to take those things into consideration.

Therefore, there has been deterioration in the steel industry over several years. We have lost 21,000 jobs. The number employed in the coalmining industry has fallen from 35,000 to 18,000. It is said that we cannot keep uneconomic pits open. Uneconomic pits have been closed in Durham and Northumberland. Incidentally, it has never once been suggested that we should close uneconomic farms. They are still kept going with Government subsidies.

[Mr. Don Dixon]

The number of people employed in shipbuilding and ship repairing in the north-east has dropped from 31,000 to 10,000 – a loss of 21,000 jobs. That does not take into account the 2,600 job losses announced recently by British Shipbuilders or the 825 announced by Swan Hunter.

We talk about training for the future. Swan Hunter has decided to take on no apprentices this year, in spite of a request by the trade union. How shall we build boats in the future? If we have another Falklands dispute how will the Prime Minister get together another task force to go to the Falklands? There will be no one to build or repair the ships unless we have apprentices.

People talk about competition in the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry. A tender was put out recently. If the men in the shipbuilding industry had decided to work for nothing, they could not have undercut the price that the Koreans offered. So, how do we tell the workers in the shipbuilding industry that they should be more competitive? The industry is not competitive because for years there was no investment when shipbuilding was in private hands. It is no good the right hon. Member for Hertsmere shaking his head. I worked in the industry when it was in private hands, and when we had the Patten report in 1962, the Geddes report in 1966 and the Booz Allen report in 1972. Every one of those reports talked about the lack of investment in the British shipbuilding industry, so we do not need lessons about investment. The British shipbuilding industry is in the state that it is today because of lack of investment. While other countries were investing, the private builders in this country would not put a penny into the industry. They were prepared to pay 27 per cent. dividends. When I worked in Hawthorne Leslie, that is what the company paid to its shareholders.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) referred to the Queen Mary being repaired on Clydebank before the war. What he said is perfectly true. The workers in Clydebank were lucky. Because of over-capacity, an organisation called British Shipbuilding Security Ltd., which was a firm of merchant bankers, ship owners and shipbuilders, decided not to let ships lie up and rust in the dock, but to close down yards and put on a 40-year embargo. It came to Jarrow, Palmer's yard in Jarrow was one of the best enterprises in the world. The ships came in as iron ore and went out as complete ships. The workers used to roll their own steel, make their own bolts and rivets and put the ships together. They sailed up the Tyne as a complete entity.

In 1934 British Shipbuilding Security Ltd. came along and decided, because of over-capacity, that there had to be rationalisation. Palmer's yard was closed and a 40-year embargo was imposed. The company was embarrassed five years later when the second world war broke out and ships needed to be built and repaired. People who had been trained in the shipbuilding industry were needed to build the ships. They were needed very much. At that time if people worked less than the 47-hour week they were fined by a tribunal. That is how important the shipbuilding industry was when the war started. That is one of the reasons why we should be protecting our industrial base, which is rapidly becoming eroded. Unless the Government are prepared to take some action, we shall have no shipbuilding or ship repairing industry in this country. It will be like the motor cycle industry, which disappeared.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): The hon. Gentleman is making much of lack of investment in the shipbuilding industry over many years. As I understand it, he is talking about a yard which closed 50 years ago. I suspect that may not be relevant to today's position. What proportion of blame would the hon. Gentleman ascribe to trade union demarcation disputes and the dreadful industrial relations which have pervaded shipbuilding for far too long?

Mr. Dixon: I shall explain the question of demarcation to the hon. Gentleman. I do not want to take up too much time. Many hon. Gentlemen think that demarcation was introduced by trade unions, trade union officials or work men. Demarcation in any industry arises as a result of management practice. I was a shop steward in the shipbuilding industry for almost 30 years. Demarcation occurred when the management decided, in view of past practice, that a particular trade was the best one to do a particular job. Demarcation disputes occur only when there is unemployment. There are no demarcation disputes when there is full employment. If a person who had served his time in a particular trade for five years and had worked on a previous ship found that some of his colleagues were out of work and the management had given the job to another trade, because it was more experienced, a demarcation dispute occurred. I agree that there were too many demarcation disputes.

Industrial relations in the shipbuilding industry were like a jungle. There was no such thing as industrial relations. The management did not care about trade unions. When I worked in the industry, we used to hold bits of steel on plates for the welders and the management refused to provide us with industrial gloves to protect our hands. Every night we used to go home with septic burns on our hands. We had to go to a tribunal in York so that we could get gloves for men who had to hold red-hot plates. That is what industrial relations were like in the shipbuilding industry. They did not exist. Management was interested only in profit. There were no industrial relations under private management.

I could speak for a considerable time on the shipbuilding industry. Listening to some Conservative Members, I think that a lesson on shipbuilding would be appropriate. Some Conservative Members know more about lying on a deck chair on the poop deck than building a ship. One of the problems in this House is that when we have debates on unemployment, views are put forward which would be more appropriately debated in universities than in the House of Commons whose Members are supposed to represent the unemployed.

A firm called N. E. I. Reyrolds in my constituency used to employ 13,000 people. It had over 2,000 apprentices. In fact, it had more apprentices a few years ago than it has bodies on the premises now. The firm is trying to compete overseas and it is trying to obtain orders. One of the problems is that there is no refurbishment or replacement of power stations. The Government should say to the CEGB, "Let us have a sensible programme for refurbishing and replacing power stations, so that we can keep our power industry." Otherwise, there will be no jobs left in that firm.

As well as expanding and improving manufacturing industry, we want a decent regional policy. We have virtually no regional policy. Since the Conservative party came to office in 1979, regional policies have been cut. It is no good the chairman of the Tory party telling people that they should get on their bikes and look for work. If they do, what will happen to the areas which young and active people have left? When people leave an area to look for work elsewhere, they do not take the community centres, old people's homes and hospitals with them. A disproportionate number of old people are left. The Government should have a regional policy and they should put the work where the people are. Unless they do that, we will not solve the housing, schools and hospital problems. If people move from one area to another to look for work, vacant houses wil be left. We require not only a boost in manufacturing industry, but a decent and sensible regional policy from the Government.

I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to intervene briefly and make those few comments.

Mr. David Knox (Staffordshire, Moorlands): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) on his good fortune in the ballot, and, perhaps even more, on his choice of subject this afternoon. I do not think that the House discusses manufacturing industry nearly enough. Like the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), before my election to this House I spent my working life in industry. I have a strong belief in the central importance of manufacturing industry to this country's economic prosperity. I reject absolutely the view expressed in some quarters that manufacturing industry no longer matters and that we should concentrate all our efforts on the service sector. I can think of nothing more damaging to the British economy than a further acceleration in the decline of our manufacturing base. Let there be no doubt that there has been a decline over the past 12 years.

A brief look at the statistics will show, first, that, although the number employed in manufacturing industry fluctuated a little, between 1960 and 1973 employment was fairly stable. Since 1973, employment has fallen by almost one third. Secondly, subject to minor fluctuations, manufacturing output rose steadily from the end of the war to 1973. Between 1973 and 1975, it fell back steeply. Between 1976 and 1978, it rose a little. Between 1979 and 1982, it fell back steeply. Since then, it has risen a little. The position today is that manufacturing output is not only lower than it was in 1979, it is still lower than it was in 1973.

Thirdly, until 1983, the balance of trade in manufactured goods showed a comfortable surplus. Since then, it has shown a deficit which, as output from the North Sea oil starts to decline, is worrying in the long-term. Fourthly, following disastrously low investment in manufacturing industry, in 1981, 1982 and 1983, there has been a welcome increase in the past two years. Nevertheless, investment in manufacturing industry in 1984 and 1985 was still lower than in any year since 1963, except for the 1981-83 period. The figures show all too clearly the decline in manufacturing industry in recent years.

I accept that a decline in the numbers employed in manufacturing is a feature of modern advanced economies, but a fall in output is not. I find that the decline of almost one third in the numbers employed and the fall in actual output over the past 12 years alarming. I find the deficit in the balance of manufacturing trade and the low level of investment equally alarming. For reasons already given by my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle), a strong manufacturing base is essential to this country, if only because the export potential of the manufacturing sector is so much greater than that of the service sector – a point made by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins).

Why have things gone wrong? The blame should not be attributed to one source. It is true that in recent years the conduct of management and of the trade unions has left something to be desired, but so, too, has the conduct of successive Governments. I should like to concentrate on the latter. During the past 12 years, under Labour and Conservative Governments alike, economic policy has not contributed to the expansion of manufacturing industry and, indeed, at times has seemed to discriminate against the expansion of the most efficient and modern parts of the manufacturing sector.

Over this period, Government economic policy has involved a continuing policy of demand deflation, with total effective demand in the economy as a whole being held below the economy's supply potential. Some of the reasons for that have been quite respectable, but the result has been to stifle the expansion of domestic demand for the products of manufacturing industry, especially for new products and the products of capital-intensive industries. Consequently, unit costs have been higher than those of some of our competitors and sales at home and abroad have suffered to the detriment of the British manufacturing sector. In addition, successive Governments have pursued high interest rate policies, largely to maintain the strength of sterling. At home, the effect has been to place a heavy burden of those who borrowed money to invest and to benefit those who put profits into fixed interest securities. That is hardly the way to encourage efficiency in the manufacturing sector.

In recent years, one of the most damaging aspects of Government policy on the manufacturing sector has been the exchange rate policy. First, for most of the time during the past 12 years, and especially in the early 1980s, sterling has been at a much too high rate in relation to other currencies. The result has been to make British manufactured goods uncompetitive at home and abroad, to encourage imports and to discourage British exports. Secondly, there have been frequent and sometimes violent changes in exchange rates. This is a particular problem for those manufacturers whose primary functions are to design, manufacture and sell products but who rarely have an interest in finance and the financial implications of exchange rate variations.

My final point on the deficiencies of Government is the lack of an industrial strategy. I am not one of those who believe in detailed economic planning – so beloved of the Labour party in opposition and scorned by it in government – but there is much evidence that the industrial strategies adopted by the Governments of countries such as Japan and France enable their manufacturing sectors to perform better than does the British manufacturing sector. In the modern world I believe that we suffer because the Government have no manufacturing and industrial strategy.

We all want British manufacturing industry to expand and prosper. My hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln and others who have spoken in the debate have outlined the measures that they believe industry must take. I agree with many of their points but, against my criticisms of the policies of successive Governments. I should like to suggest what the Government might do to help our manufacturing industry in the years ahead.

First, the level of total effective demand in the economy as a whole should be brought more into line with the supply potential of the ecomomy. This should be done by increasing public expenditure and by reducing taxation. Not all the extra demand will go into the manufacturing sector, but quite a lot will. Such an increase in domestic demand would enable unit costs to be reduced, would lead to an increase in the demand for British exports and would encourage investment in manufacturing industry.

Mr. Dykes: I apologise for interrupting my hon. Friend's excellent and compelling speech, with which I agree. Does he agree that the urgent need to increase public spending is even more important on capital account than on current account? Does he agree that on capital account once again there has been inadequate investment, which has been cut back much more easily, drastically and quickly than current account spending, which has increased because the rest of the economy remained truncated?

Mr. Knox: I agree with my hon. Friend. The emphasis should be on the capital side but, given the amount of slack in the economy, I see no reason why there should not be an increase in current expenditure as well.

I come to the second point to which the Government should pay attention — interest rates. They must be reduced below their present excessively high level. This would encourage investment by reducing the cost of borrowing money. It would have the added advantage of not giving support to sterling at an absurdly high level, which would be beneficial to manufacturing industry as well.

Thirdly, I believe that Britain should join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. That would bring exchange rate stability for about 60 per cent. of the country's trade and would remove the unnecessary uncertainty in Europe for our manufacturing sector — a point which is made to me repeatedly when I visit manufacturing firms in my constituency.

Finally, the Government should embark on widespread consultation with industry and the trade unions, perhaps through the National Ecomomic Development Council, with a view to developing an industrial strategy. This would show everyone the direction in which the Government believe the manufacturing sector should be moving. It would enable British manufacturing industry to move forward more confidently and effectively in the years ahead.

5.6 pm

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): It is clear that the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson), who used to be a member of the Government, is still wearing his Government blinkers. To state the facts is not to talk the country down.

We are indebted to the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) for choosing this topic. A minority of 3 million to 4 million unemployed is simply not good enough. It is not good enough to point to the 6 million people in work in manufacturing industry when there are such numbers out of work. What does it take to make the Government realise, as the motion states, "that manufacturing industry has a central part to play in the future prosperity of the United Kingdom"?

I suppose that it is understandable for the Government to brush aside Opposition protests as something to be expected from an Opposition, but a few days ago the West Midlands Engineering Employers Association met a group of Conservative Members of Parliament and left them in no doubt about the urgent need to halt the decline in that area. Perhaps the most pertinent point made by the association's chief executive was his comment: "If you do not want to lose votes, you must change your policies." He went further, and said, "You must stop pussyfooting around and do something to help ailing West Midlands industries." His feelings were underlined last week by a report by the West Midlands chamber of commerce and industry, which found a marked reversal of fortunes among the 435 firms which were sent a questionnaire. Orders at home and abroad are down, with little sign of new investment to create jobs.

Recently, several hundred people lost their jobs at GEC in Coventry. Last week, several hundred people at a Nuneaton factory lost their jobs. This week, Coventry Climax Forklift Trucks announced that another 90 jobs would go. Former busy factories in my constituency now stand silent and derelict, and in some areas of the west midlands unemployment is nearly 40 per cent. It is futile for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to imagine that service industries can take the place of manufacturing. Services must service something. Leaner and fitter has led to anorexia. The Government have said that they cannot create jobs. That is as may be, but they can do much to make trade fair. They can do something about unfair tariffs and special taxes, such as the 10 per cent. tax on cars.

Foreign Governments assist their industries by their purchasing policies. They do not place orders overseas for basic items of equipment needed in that country. They help industry by various means: in research and development, in energy costs, and, as has been mentioned, in the reduction of interest rates. The Government could do many things. It is ironic that companies say that there is a skills shortage. It would be negative of me to say that one of the first casualties in any recession is training, but it is painfully obvious that our competitors such as West Germany do not follow that course.

In appealing to the Government to revise their policies, there is considerable scope for improvement in industry's attitude to training. It cannot always expect to obtain its skilled labour by poaching. Increased wages, which is another favourite dolly shy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is not the reason for industrial decline in the west midlands, which has gone from the top to the bottom of the wages league, despite huge increases in productivity of about 30 per cent. in companies such as British Leyland and Peugeot. They rightly boast of that increase in productivity.

Manufacturing industry is the bedrock on which Britain's prosperity can rest. We cannot prosper by taking in each other's washing. If the Government cast that aside, they also cast aside their future. That does not greatly worry me, but I am worried that Britain is two nations those in work and those out of work. I wish the latter group to be given some hope for the future and for the entire country to have a thriving manufacturing industry.

5.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): May I join all contributors to the debate in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) on his choice of subject, on the timeliness of his choice of subject and on the manner in which he deployed his argument. He used vivid examples from his constituency to illustrate some significant points. He said clearly, and I agree with him entirely, that there is no inevitability about the decline of manufacturing industry. With other hon. Members who have spoken in the debate he has helped to scotch the myth that we in the Chamber take that view.

My hon. Friend gave a good example from his constituency of the successes and the dilemmas which are posed by success. He referred to Ruston Gas Turbines, which exports 90 per cent. of its output in key areas, but then he said this issue, among others, exercises us tonight that that company has had a static payroll but it has trebled the value of its production.

My hon. Friend immediately came to one central truth which should pervade the debate: that it is perfectly possible to crank up the engine of wealth creation, but not to obtain a commensurate increase in employment in the manufacturing sector. My hon. Friend then analysed some of the reasons for decline, and invited other participants in the debate I assume that he also means representatives of the Department of Trade and Industry to construct a policy for success.

I hope soon to reassure my hon. Friend that inside the Department of Trade and Industry we have matched the adjustments which have taken place in the economy during the past few years. We now have a suite of policies which are relevant for the latter half of the 1980s and the early 1990s, rather than a group of policies which borrow far too much from the prescriptions which failed in the 1960s and 1970s.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) spoke on an issue which has exercised all of us the role of the manufacturing and service sectors and the fact that they are complementary, not competitive. The right hon. Gentleman asked for a catalogue of the recipes for success. I shall not be airing that before the House tonight, but I shall suggest some ideas in answer to the question, "Do we have an industrial policy?" If we have such a policy, is it correct to call it a strategy, or has the word strategy been discredited after the practices of the 1960s and the 1970s? Should we use other language to define our new, and I hope that the House will agree formalised objectives in industrial policy?

The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) spoke passionately, as ever, in defence of the shipbuilding industry and in defence of utilising the skills of his constituents and of the north-east generally. I shall return to that issue in a moment. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) talked about the link between interest rates and the value of sterling, although he was careful to ensure that he reaffirmed the need to control public expenditure generally to give us more freedom to manoeuvre in interest rate policies. It is precisely that dilemma which constantly exercises the wits of successive Chancellors of the Exchequer.

I begin my remarks by following naturally from the comments made by the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park). In so doing, I am not trying to be controversial by responding to his remarks on employment. Rather, as I hope the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) may concede, as a historian, I am seeking an area of consensus, in terms of our analysis of the problems, from which to proceed. I quote the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), admittedly from some time ago, but it has relevance today. In August 1978, the hon. Gentleman said in an article in the Glasgow Herald:

> "The 1,500,000 unemployed is entirely due to an expansion of the workforce in Britain. And over the next decade, an additional 1,500,000 more will be in the labour force. That leaves us, even with improved growth in the economy, facing a possible 3 million unemployed by the end of the eighties. To try to blame this on the mishandling by any Government Tory or Labour doesn't get us very far."

That gave us a prediction of 3 million unemployed by the end of the 1980s.

Then I turn to a report in which the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East may have had a hand. I hope at least that he would have been consulted about it. It is a report put out by the Labour party's finance and economic affairs sub-committee in November 1976. I believe that there was an attempt to squash it, but the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) will remember it clearly. He may recall that the report was not published because, from first reading, it appears to be a full-blown justification to the Labour party, perhaps not to others, for import controls and a massive increase in public expenditure. That will be grist to the hon. Gentleman's mill.

Let me return to the analysis and the projections for unemployment. I quote from Robert Taylor's article in The Observer:

> "Unemployment at 2,500,000 by 1980 is predicted in a gloomy confidential paper produced by the Labour Party's finance and economic affairs sub-committee."

He then quoted from the report:

> "'By 1981 the population of working age will have increased by more than 1,000,000. The actual number entering the labour force is sensitive to a number of assumptions, but the official figure of 774,000 is a reasonable estimate. Thus if the growth performance of 1964-1973 were repeated unemployment would be approaching 2,000,000 in 1980.'
> The document suggests that this figure is an underestimate. It reckons private investment would need to grow by 8 per cent. a year just to maintain the 1964-1973 average growth of total investment of 3·5 per cent. a year. The document notes such a figure was achieved only once in that period . . . It also says the 'initial gain in competitiveness conferred by devaluation up to and including the first quarter of 1976 has already been eroded.'"

Opposition Members may be confortable with the conclusion of the report, which argues for import controls and a massive boost in public expenditure, but I hope that they will not dispute yet again the projection that, if those trends had continued, there would have been the prospect of 2·5 million unemployed in 1980. The authors of that report were not to know then that the worst world recession since the war was on its way. When one adds that factor into the balance, plus the structural defects in our economy that have been developing for decades, Conservative Members could say that those who blame the Government for all the 3·25 million unemployed are, to put it mildly, misguided, or if they are being deliberate, are mischievous. Jobs are the political imperative. I am sure that that was in my hon. Friend's mind when he launched the debate.

We are here to discuss the role of manufacturing industry as a wealth-creation engine so that manufacturing industry can be restored to health and have a multiplier effect on the rest of the economy, in the service sector as well as upstream manufacturing activities. This is a big area where my hon. Friend, some Opposition Members and I could agree.

Our share of world trade has undoubtedly plummeted. It went down from 14 per cent. in 1964 to 9 per cent. in 1979. It is now bumping around the 8 per cent. mark, but there is a sign — I am not in the business of counting chickens today — that at long last trade is starting to increase. The reversal of that decline in our share of traded goods and services is at the heart of the Government's job-creation programme. When the Government go on and on, as we do, about the right products at the right time at the right price and of the right quality, we are talking about the paramount importance of the job-creation programme.

One could argue that, in the 1960s and 1970s, policy was dominated by panacea politics. There was the white heat of the technological and industrial revolution. Does anyone remember that? Can anyone see its effects today? What happened during the 1960s and 1970s, exaggerated and exacerbated by the recession, was the development of a mismatched economy. Many people, and large amounts of plant and equipment, were dedicated to producing things for which demand was low, stagnant and falling, and not enough were dedicated to producing things for which demand was high, rising and dynamic. Our policies attempt to put right that mismatched economy, through either the Treasury or the Department of Trade and Industry, and to begin to tackle the unemployment problem.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Does my hon. Friend agree that, at that time, because there was no real uplift in the new technologies, and because of the artificial restraint on wages in manufacturing industry imposed by the then Labour Government, many of our best brains and most able skilled people went overseas? Is there any talk of a brain drain today?

Mr. Butcher: There is evidence that managers are returning from, for example, the United States. Indeed, in talking to such people, we are complimented on the great changes that have taken place in British management during the past five years. Once again, British managers are being tough, professional, ambitious and competent. What is equally important is that the work force is being tough, ambitious, professional and competent. The partnership, which we should have been invoking for a long time, is at long last coming together. An example is the increase in productivity and the dramatic reduction in the number of working days lost through disputes.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point and I can tell him that the brain drain is not the acute problem with which we had to contend some time ago.

I have been asked whether services and manufacturing are in conflict or whether they are complementary. Of course they are complementary, but I recall — my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson), who was then my boss, will remember this — that for some time I asked the Department's economists for an answer to the question: "What proportion of manufacturing output is internationally tradeable, and what proportion of service sector activity is internationally tradeable?" The answer has been checked, rechecked and compared with the research of colleagues in Whitehall, and I can now report that, in general, 80 per cent. of manufactured output is internationally tradeable. By contrast, in general, 18 per cent. of service sector activity is internationally tradeable. There is, therefore, no choice, and this has not been disputed when I have spoken from the Dispatch Box: manufacturing must be at the core of our wealth-creation process. It earns a buck for United Kingdom Ltd's people. It is the way in which we pay our way in the world.

However, there is no gainsaying the fact that even in the teeth of the recession the service sector has been a magnificent job creator. About 700,000 jobs have been created in the service sector since 1981-82. It has done so imaginatively; and much of the activity which has been generated is internationally tradeable.

Although manufacturing may thrive again, as it is beginning to do, it may not create enough employment to make a major hole in the unemployment queues. Manufacturing can increase its share of world trade. It can increase its performance; and the income that it earns will disseminate through the economy, the market, the City, the payroll, through subsidiary companies and suppliers to generate jobs in other parts of the economy. That must be at the core of our appreciation of the role of manufacturing.

I do not wish to detain the House on the general issues that would normally come under the heading "Getting the climate right". I shall simply say that any hon. Member who had a conversation with industrialists in 1981-82, and who had that conversation 500 times, as I did during the west midlands initiative, was left in no doubt that their concern centred on inflation, interest rates, exchange rates and public utility costs. We must agree that the same conversation today would produce a less vivid account of the strength of the difficulties facing industrialists. The problems are coming under control.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): On training, which is fundamental to improving the manufacturing effort, will my hon. Friend confirm, that, as was reported this weekend, the Government will set up a "College of the Air" using radio and television to help to retrain young people, and, indeed, adults, or is this simply an extension of the Open Tech?

Mr. Butcher: The best response that I can make to my hon. Friend's question is to extract the answer from my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Unemployment — [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] — the Secretary of State for Employment. That is not an issue with which the Department of Trade and Industry is involved, but I am sure that the record of this afternoon's debate will invoke that response.

Mr. Park: I should be interested to know what the Minister would say to the engineering employers and the chambers of commerce in the west midlands, because it is evident that the people he is meeting do not belong to those organisations.

Mr. Butcher: I attended the meeting with the Engineering Employers Federation four or five weeks ago and I maintain regular contacts with the federation. I value those contacts, as I do my contacts with the chambers of commerce, particularly those in Birmingham and Coventry. I read their surveys and their analyses of business confidence, and I note the factors that they list. In the next few minutes I shall list what I would say to the EEF.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) rose —

Mr. Butcher: I will give way for the last time. I must press on.

Mr. Williams: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. A few moments ago he mentioned the need to consult the Secretary of State for Unemployment. Perhaps he will be kind enough to explain which Government Department he holds responsible for that function.

Mr. Butcher: There are times when giving way is unwise. I thank the right hon. Gentleman for making a fairly small point and I hope that he will accept that the Secretary of State for Employment is the Minister who appears to be leading on the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson).

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Butcher: I must press on. I hope that my hon. Friend will have a chance to speak in the debate.

Six objectives are incorporated in the Department of Trade and Industry's policy. They are designed to tackle the issues by my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle).

The first objective is to support and disseminate best practice in getting world-beating products to the market. These are post-research and development projects; they are market driven and product driven. A number of my hon. Friends who have been studying the business and technical advisory services will know that our policies on design, quality, productivity and marketing are working. The clients who receive that support say clearly in post-study evaluations that they value the work done under those heads of account.

The Government do not say "'This is how to design a product'" or "'This is how to increase the quality of your product.'" Practitioners are well respected in the market, the schemes are administered by third parties and the taxpayer covers the costs. We can put the best people into virtually any company with fewer than 500 employees to implement best practice in those key areas. It is about products and market penetration; and that is where jobs will come from.

The second objective is to enhance the competitive environment. Where competition is impaired or does not exist, we introduce the minimum safeguards required to protect the consumer properly, while encouraging efficiency.

There is, of course, a comprehensive competition policy. We believe that competition is the driving force for wealth creation and that it safeguards the consumer and keeps company managements on their toes.

In the past few years, not enough attention has been paid to policy on regulating monopolies, whether in the private or the public sectors. My right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere will remember the excellent work done by Mr. Stephen Littlechild of Birmingham university who first brought us the RPI minus X formula, which is a magnificent way of regulating monopolies. We have discovered a way of encouraging British Telecommunications to maximise its return on capital, without putting up prices in its monopoly environment. The formula encourages efficiency and protects the consumer. It may have a big future when we consider other denationalisation proposals and deregulation schemes.

There is also an international dimension to competition policy. It is our duty to promote free markets, whether through the GATT or the EC. I see it as the cornerstone of the Department's efforts during the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Community that we should do all that we can to deliver the truly internal market in the Community.

But — and this is a major but — where international markets are defective, it is not for us to disarm unilaterally. Where necessary, we should secure the multilateral removal of barriers and, if necessary, provide support for British firms that must compete with companies that enjoy support from their own Governments.

The third objective is to tackle the regional legacy arising from the mismatched economy — the unhappy legacy of wasted human resources about which the hon. Member for Jarrow spoke with such fervour. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that DTI regional policy is not the only method of tackling the problem. There are other ways, including some of the measures recently introduced by the Secretary of State for Employment.

The hon. Member for Jarrow should welcome the changes made to regional policy. He may argue about the expenditure levels, but I hope that he will agree that we were right to concentrate on job creation and conservation as part of our review of regional policy which was implemented just over two years ago.

We have shifted towards selective assistance and away from automatic assistance. We made rigorous checks on the viability of products. It is no use throwing money into a company if the management cannot cope with the demands that companies have to meet in the market place or cannot manage innovation or production development. That is money down the drain.

We made checks to ensure that projects are viable. Those checks are carried out not by civil servants, but by people under the guidance of an industrial development advisory board which is made up of industrialists. We have also said that, under normal circumstances, there will be no simple job shifting from one part of the country to another. I know that that practice caused great discomfort to a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Can my hon. Friend assure us that one criterion in judging whether assistance should be given in an assisted area is the effect that it will have on competitor companies elsehwere?

Does my hon. Friend know that printers in non-assisted areas are very worried about new printing companies that are being set up in assisted areas such as Wales? The new firms could drive out of business other firms who cannot compete with the lower overheads of those in the assisted areas.

Mr. Butcher: Job displacement is one of the factors that assessors have to consider. I hope that my hon. Friend will draw some encouragement from the changes that we have implemented. In normal circumstances, simple job shifting will not take place.

However, I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that there will be occasions when a bid from an assisted area represents the UK Ltd. bid for some inward investment. At that point we may have dilemmas to resolve within our economy, particularly if a United Kingdom competitor feels threatened That is an excruciating difficulty, but it has to be faced.

The fourth objective is to achieve the maximum economic impact from the United Kingdom's aggregate research and development spending, in the light of rapidly changing markets.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Before the Minister leaves regional policy, will he agree that to appear to support regional policy, but then to deny areas that have been worst hit by the loss of manufacturing jobs — halving regional expenditure between 1979 and 1985 and halving it again between 1985 and 1989 — is to deny the regions any chance of recovery?

How does the hon. Gentleman react to suggestions by former Ministers — the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) and the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) — that the English regions need development agencies or bodies similar to the Welsh Development Agency and the Scottish Development Agency, which were set up in the 1970s?

Mr. Butcher: That is an interesting proposition, particularly in the context of solving some of the problems of urban dereliction, although I suspect that some members of the Labour party in various parts of the country would oppose such a move. I believe that there are signs of the Birmingham Labour party not being too enamoured of that proposition. I hope that, as a fair-minded spokesman for the Opposition, the hon. Gentleman will concede that one must look at a package of measures when talking about a shift in cash from the south to the north, not least when one looks at the rate support grant settlement and policies emerging from the Department of the Environment. There is nothing for the Government to feel defensive about in terms of resources deployed in the north.

In the time available I want to complete the six objectives. This is the first time in 1986 that we have had a chance to set out the Department of Trade and Industry's industrial policy. If I can do that, I shall resume my seat as quickly as possible.

Our fourth objective is to achieve maximum economic impact from the United Kingdom's aggregate research and development spend in the light of rapidly changing markets. All we are saying is that there is a legitimate role for pre-competitive research spending, but it is right that the Department of Trade and Industry's shift in expenditure should move closer to what the market wants —working with the grain of market forces. Therefore, it is our objective to add the second "D" to the R and D equation. Research, development and design should be the order of the day. That takes us closer to the markets.

The fifth objective is to change attitudes in order to improve the supply and quality of people available to industry and commerce in a world of increasingly international markets. We could argue at great length on why for so long our brightest and best have not been attracted into front-line commercial and industrial management. There has been an anti-enterprise culture, an anti-industry culture and an anti-training culture; but we have learnt through the information technology skills exercise, which I chaired on a multi-departmental basis, that it is possible to bring a new partnership to the business of training and to bring it into the heart of the higher education sector. Private sector companies are now welded into the decision-making process as to which courses in the new technologies, and engineering in particular, should be supported with a mix of public and private sector funds. It is interesting to see the recommendations that are now coming from all quarters that we should take that new partnership upstream into the further education sector. Some would even argue that that should occur in the statutory school sector.

The sixth objective is to secure the broader implementation of the public purchasing initiative. All hon. Members should be aware, if they are not already, that the public sector nationalised industries and Whitehall spend £40 billion a year on services and goods which are bought elsewhere. Some 90 per cent. of that is spent in the United Kingdom. Under the public purchasing initiative, by implementing enlightened purchasing policies we could produce a situation in which those national concerns buy British because it is best and has become best as a result of the implementation of the PPI. That is consistent with our commitments under GATT and the EEC and there is still much mileage available to us in obtaining value for money from that £40 billion.

I am delighted to report to the House that examples of that policy are already under way. We are discussing non-warlike purchasing with the Ministry of Defence. We are discussing supply questions with the Department of Health and Social Security on consumables and medical equipment and the Crown suppliers are already implementing good design policies.

Does that amount to interventionism? Is it a strategy? Not in the sense of industrial strategies of the 1960s and 1970s. There is no bureaucratic or detailed national plan. There are no sector or industry targets. There is no omniscient Department of Economic Affairs and no intervention-driven Ministry of Technology. Instead, we are operating in an environment of a demand economy rather than a comand economy. But there is an objective. It was reported to the House in a written answer on 28 February 1986 when I told my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames), who is in his place:

> "The continuing aim of the Department is to increase the national production of wealth; to promote and enhance the vitality and competitiveness of British trade, industry and commerce within a proper regulatory framework and to increase the United Kingdom's share of world trade" — [Official Report, 28 February 1986; Vol. 92, c. 723.]

Our objective is to reduce or eliminate barriers which impede British companies' ability to sell goods and services in the international markets, and, secondly, where support is necessary, in terms of policy or spending taxpayers' money, to ensure that such support works with the grain of market forces and enhances rather than undermines the determination of companies to compete.

5.44 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): The Under-Secretary of State concluded his remarks by saying that the Government have no plan, no command economy, no sector targets, and so on. He seems to be proud of that fact.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Of course he is.

Mr. Heffer: Of course he is. But the other side of the coin is that, without any planning of any kind, without any real Government intervention, with the abolition of the National Enterprise Board and the changes that have been described by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) in relation to regional policy, we have the highest levels of unemployment in the Western world. Therefore, there must be some correlation between the two.

If we decide that there will be no planning of any kind, that there will be a completely free market, that competition will be rampant, it is not surprising, certainly to me, that there will be higher unemployment and the type of problems that we have at present.

One thing that the Under-Secretary of State said is absolutely untrue — that any sector of the Labour party has ever said that all unemployment in Britain is due to the Government's policies. Nobody has ever said that. What we have said is that the serious nature of the crisis in the Western capitalist world has been aggravated in Britain by the Government's policies. An already serious crisis has been made worse. We are not putting all the blame on the Government. Instead of the Government tackling the problem in an intelligent way, their policy of open and free competition has aggravated it. They have not tried to deal in a serious way with the needs of the British people and of industry.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) for instituting this debate. I do not endorse all his philosophical attitudes towards solving the problem, but is is clear that he is deeply concerned about it and has rightly raised one of the most serious issues facing Britain today. I agree with the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) that we want and must have an improved service sector economy, but that must not be at the expense of manufacturing, which is what has happened. We need a good manufacturing sector. We cannot rebuild and re-industrialise our economy unless we have a sound, serious manufacturing base.

Why has the decline taken place? In particular, why has it taken place since the end of the second world war? There are many factors. The first is that at that time we were no longer the workshop of the world. We came out of a most serious war, into which we had put everything, and we probably suffered more than those countries which had been defeated. We accepted the burdens in a way that other countries have not. That was one of the reasons. We also lost our cheap raw materials because, whether we liked it or not, stage by stage we had to agree to various colonial parts of the empire being given the right to self government. That meant that the prices of our raw materials went up and that we did not have the same pool as we had in the past, although it continued to be fairly good because we were members of the Commonwealth.

We also faced greater competition from countries which had previously not been able to compete with us. One of the reasons for that was that they began where we left off. Many of our manufacturers believed that their methods of manufacture were the best in all possible worlds and that they did not need to change or improve or have new management. They thought they did not need to do things that it was necessary to do. Suddenly they discovered that other manufacturers were using the best of our traditions and leaving us behind.

We have heard many solutions to our problems. I have been in the House quite a long time and I have heard them all. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have told us how we can solve our problems. If I remember rightly, one of the solutions was the Common Market. The EEC was the panacea. We were told that if we got into that we would become more competitive and be able to deal with the problems of our people. We were told that we would have a new market and so on. We joined the NEC — [Laughter.] — the EEC. I have been on the NEC for quite a few years. [Interruption.] The hon. Member has not had my advantages.

What happened when we joined the EEC? Unemployment did not decrease. I am sure that hon. Members will remember the arguments at the time about jobs for the boys. My God, unemployment has increased. The EEC is no answer to our problems.

There are many other factors. There are new modern things now. We are told that we have to follow the examples of various other nations, one of which is Japan. Have hon. Members read much about Japan? I am sure that many of them have been there and seen the way that the trade union movement in Japan is organised and seen the conditions of the work force. They will also have seen the way that many people live in Japan. If anybody wants to go there, they are perfectly welcome to do so. I am not advocating Japanese policies for our people. Those are not the way to deal with this problem.

We have come to the most fundamental stage in industrial development. This applies not only to us but to all Western capitalist societies. I am not asking Britain to accept all the Eastern European concepts, but I do suggest that there is one we could accept. In Eastern Europe there is a planned economy. East European countries do not have mass unemployment. It is true that the conditions of the workers are not as good as the conditions of workers in the West, and consumer products are not as freely available as they are in parts of the West. Eastern Europe does not have free and independent trade unions. However, we ought to learn from the good things it has and reject the bad, while at the same time rejecting the bad things in Western Europe.

If we are to rebuild our manufacturing base and economy, the way to do it is certainly not to have a command economy like that in Eastern Europe, but we need Government intervention. We need planning for the resources of the economy and an extension of public enterprise in many forms in order to be able to have real planning and not just indicative planning of the sort that we had under the George Brown plan. We need real physical planning so that we can ensure that we have the training, the engineers and the industrial investment that are required. That is the only way forward for British industry. We cannot deal with the problem in any other way.

As I said, I have been here a long time and I have heard all the arguments. Those arguments skim over the surface of the real problem: that we live in a society that does not produce goods for use but purely for profit. While that situation exists we can never genuinely rebuild the economy and create the type of society that is needed to give our people full employment.

[Mr. Heffer]

I do not argue against those who say that the new technology has so changed society that we will have unemployment. The combination of existing systems of society and new technology are bound to give rise to unemployment. We have to use the new technology as part of a different type of society. That raises the fundamental question: what do we produce for; what is the objective? Is the objective merely to have a profit-making system benefiting a few, or production which benefits the whole of society?

Mr. Couchman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heffer: No. My speech will be short.

Often in our debates we talk about the skimming effects of one problem as they connect with other problems, but the fundamental question is not often asked and it needs to be asked in a debate of this kind. We have to create a society in which people will work fewer hours. By way of alternative work we can create new opportunities in many other spheres. Perhaps we can give people the opportunity to involve themselves in the arts on a scale that they have never had before.

There is much that could be done, but little is being done. We cannot continue to have a society in which only a small section works and an increasing mass of people do not work. We have to get everyone working and recognise that that means a change in the character of society. Only a democratically controlled, planned, Socialist economy can do that.

5.58 pm

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): I hope that Opposition Members will forgive me if I make a party point, which they know I am unaccustomed to making too blatantly. It is that we normally see an Opposition who proudly parade on their sleeves compassion and concern for the unemployed and for manufacturing industry. With the noble exception of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) and a few of his hon. Friends, today they wear the badge of shame, because there are only four Opposition Members in the House for this important debate.

I give credit to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) for launching the debate. My point about the Opposition is not a petty one, because most of us constantly face a barrage of innuendo, criticism and abuse from Opposition Members on these very subjects.

I have only one point to make about the speech of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton. After the war, this country was the victor. It captured and took markets because it had an industrial base and was provided with cheap and easy to obtain raw materials from the empire. The tragedy was that our industrial structure and trade union movement became fossilised in the 1950s. They were fossilised largely by the Labour Government and their programme for state intervention and nationalisation after the war. The Labour Government were followed by Conservative Governments who then fossilised our trade union movement, because that was the period when Churchill and all the Cabinet agreed that there must not be any trouble with the unions. Therefore, the power and privileges of the trade union movement became entrenched in our industrial system. They went far and away beyond anything that was experienced by any of our competitors.

It is absolutely right to say that in the 1960s this country needed the white-hot heat of the technological revolution, but the tragedy is that the Prime Minister of the then Labour Government who enunciated that doctrine failed to deliver. That is what this Government have had to deliver since 1979. It is a slander for Opposition Members to talk about 13 wasted years. The 1960s were wasted by a Labour Government. Now we are having to catch up.

We faced the fact that traditional industries in our industrial cities are running down massively and quickly because of world competition. At the same time new industries, often in the service sector, do not require so much labour. Modern and many older industries find that they can make do with part-time labour or with overtime instead of having to take on large numbers of new employees. At the same time, the birth rate has been increasing, with the result that many more young people are leaving school and wanting work, on top of which there has been a long-overdue demographic change, with women entering employment in greater numbers. That has happened, in conjunction with the world recession in trade because of spiralling oil prices. Therefore, this Government have inherited something that no Government could possibly have avoided. The missed opportunity, if there was one, was during the so-called swinging sixties. At that time, this country's industry was swinging on the gallows. We have yet to recover from it.

All right hon. and hon. Members agree that Britain's manufacturing base is fundamental to wealth creation in the country, but that is not necessarily the same as saying that it is essential for job creation. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said, every modern economy, apart from the Japanese, has seen a more rapid rate of growth in the service sector than in the manufacturing sector, simply because structural changes of the kind that I have just outlined are taking place everywhere. That means that we must use our manufacturing base as the basis for wealth creation, but many more jobs, proportionately, must be created in the modern service sector, if we are ever to escape from the shadow of unemployment.

Where does that leave the traditional industrial cities of the north and, until recent years, successful areas like the midlands? My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State outlined one of the problems that the Government face. They are doing things, and they believe in what they are doing, but they are not prepared to boast about it. Even today we have played around with words. My hon. Friend asked whether we are dealing with industrial policies or an industrial strategy. Is it or is it not interventionism? Of course it is interventionism. There is no way of avoiding it in a modern economy. My hon. Friend gave many examples.

What is the Government's public purchasing initiative if it is not purchasing by the Government? What is the prospect for the helicopter industry or any major defence industry if the Government are not a major customer? How can we possibly play by the rules of free competition and free trade throughout the world when others do not? How can we—this is a crucial factor that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry must bear in mind—possibly do without the degree of state involvement and protectionism that is afforded by the multi-fibre arrangement in areas like Yorkshire and Humberside?

We are all too well aware that my right hon. Friend's Department—or forces within it—has argued, since the publication of the Silberston report, that the MFA provides a disproportionate subsidy to the textile industry —15 per cent. on clothing—that people otherwise would be able to spend on other goods, thus stimulating the economy. That is absolute nonsense and it is about time that we said that academic studies of that kind are nonsense. It does not follow that people would spend the additional money that would be available to them on British manufactured goods rather than on imports. The degree of dependence of certain limited parts of this country on a major industry is completely ignored. The textile industry is one of this country's major industries. In terms of added value, it is far more important than the aerospace or computer industries, or many of the other essential industries that we think of as being at the heart of the British manufacturing base. Therefore, the Government's role needs to be judiciously used. There is no way out of it.

I pay full credit to my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Education and Science and for Employment for their technical and vocational education initiative. At long last they are trying to change the basic balance of the school curriculum and to make it more vocational in an effort to attract more young people into the world of work and to help them to appreciate that what they learn at school has a degree of relevance to the realistic world of employment that they will enter later.

Equally, we have tried to change the balance in further and higher education in an effort to attract more people into courses that will benefit industry. However, it has taken a very long time. The Finniston committee sat for four years. It began its work in the mid-1970s. A decade later we are still talking about it. An apparatus has been established, but how much influence has the Engineering Council had in trying to tackle the problem?

We have known about the problems and the degree of decline in our industrial cities for a very long time. It was left to my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who is now doing so much to refresh those parts of the Tory party that others cannot reach, to write his report "It Takes a Riot." However, five or six years later we are still conscious that problems remain not only in Liverpool but in other major industrial cities. The lessons are there and what needs to be done is perfectly clear, but we are not acting with the speed or on the scale that is necessary.

Task forces have been launched in eight cities. I am very grateful for the fact that there is a task force in the city of Leeds. However, it has only £1 million to spend and a junior Minister has only a vague responsibility for it. We need to learn the lessons of the urban development corporations and, above all, of the Scottish Development Agency. We need to learn more the lessons of the latter than of the former, because in most of our cities there is not the scale of the problem that is to be found either in London's docklands or in Liverpool. Nevertheless, there are major problem areas.

Therefore, an agency along the lines of the SDA needs to be established and provided with many resources. It needs to have the powers of land accumulation and planning permission. Also, it needs to work in conjunction and partnership with the local authorities. It must not work against them. All right hon. and hon. Members know that the urban development corporations have created resentment in docklands. However, in partnership with local authorities that body could be provided with the necessary resources to rejuvenate an industrial area that is in decline. Then it could move out again and put its resources into another city in another part of the country. That is the main task that must be tackled in the industrial cities of this country.

However, the Government must have the will to do it, just as the same kind of will is needed to tackle the industrial strategy. The very term "strategy" implies comprehensiveness. Our industrial cities need to be considered in terms not just of the environment — fundamental though that is if they are to attract new industry — but of the ramifications of our industrial policy. The Department of Trade and Industry does no such thing. It has no overview of industrial strategy. It has a strategy for individual companies. Therefore, no nationwide strategy is exercised by the DTI over helicopters. The strategy relates just to one company— Westland.

As for the European fighter aircraft, the DTI's view was essentially that of British Aerospace. The Department of Defence was trying to pull in other European partners, and the Department of Trade and Industry was doing its best to frustrate those efforts.

I am sorry that my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) is no longer present, because he might have pursued the best line, but in his short time in office, he had the major task of trying to merge the two huge Departments of Trade and Industry. However, from the tenure of my neighbour, my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph)—who simply did not believe that there should be such a thing as an intervention policy or even a Department of Industry —we have had Secretaries of State in the Department of Trade and Industry who have not had a conviction that there should be any industrial strategy.

Indirectly, an intervention policy has been pursued all other the place, but it has been piecemeal and there has been no effort to try to get a concerted and comprehensive approach. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State made it clear that he had responsibility for some of the action, that other parts of the Department were responsible for others, and that there is also the Treasury. As we all know, the Treasury is far too dominant.

We have waited for the rebuilding and sustaining of our manufacturing base for a long time. It will not happen spontaneously. All our major competitor countries have Government intervention. Japan is the obvious one, but there is Germany with the purchasing power of its Government and France with its more centralised planning arrangements. Even in the United States—the most free enterprise economy in the world — it is the purchasing power, use and role of the Government that build up huge, powerful, multinational corporations, such as IBM, or the United Technologies Corporation, which bought Westland, and the rest.

In the modern world, we cannot pursue a hands-off, non-interventionist, free trade policy. It is fundamental that we have a comprehensive approach. The Department of Trade and Industry must take a stronger and more initiating lead within Government. Furthermore, we need a machinery, such as a Cabinet Committee, to look at industrial strategy in the way that we have for so long had an economic, but Treasury-dominated, Cabinet Sub-Committee and Committees on home affairs, overseas and defence matters.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Both sides of the House will want to congratulate the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) on introducing the debate and on uniquely eliciting two Government responses. The first came from the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, whose list of industrial objectives seemed to get longer as the list of closures got longer, but whose industrial objectives seem to have one thing in common that they would always cost the Government less money and not involve additional expenditure.

The second response came from the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson), whose selective use of statistics, to say the least, concentrated on the silver linings and ignored the dark clouds that affect our industrial horizon. We should also congratulate the hon. Member for Lincoln on eliciting, in both interventions and speeches, with one notable exception, such a display of proposals for a change of Government policy that I almost thought I was at a reconvened meeting of the Conservative Centre Forward group.

The hon. Members for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) and for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) both summed up the extent and scale of the problem that we face. The Government have presided over a decline in our manufacturing industry that is so general that we have lost 1·75 million jobs in the past seven years, 1·5 million of which were in the traditional industrial regions, many of which are now industrial no-go areas that cannot benefit from any expansion in prosperity or growth.

The decline is now so widespread and pervasive that, even on the Government's figures, the collapse of manufacturing investment between 1979 and 1986 is 20 per cent. The decline is so catastrophic that we have reached a unique position in our industrial history. Never before have we imported more manufactured goods than we export, nor sent more capital overseas to be invested in other people's industries than is invested in our manufacturing industries. Nor have we had entire areas of the country, such as the north-west, the north-east, Scotland, and Wales, where there are more people without a regular job because they are unemployed, in part-time employment or on temporary schemes than are employed in all our manufacturing industries, new and old, put together.

We have heard from the Minister, but particularly from the right hon. Member for Hertsmere, the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, some highly selective figures about productivity, investment and growth. He said that capital investment in manufacturing industry was at the highest ever level. He ignored the fact that, under his Government, capital investment in manufacturing industry is still markedly below that of 1979. He also said that we had the highest real level of exports last year than at any time in our history. He ignored the fact that, at the same time, we had the lowest proportionate share of world exports than at any other time.

The Government have told us, and the Minister said it again, that productivity is rising fast. It is true that productivity has been rising, but that is a function merely of the fact that employment has been falling faster than output and less is being produced by many fewer people. In other words, the rises in productivity for which the Government claim credit in almost every speech issued from the Department of Trade and Industry are a function, not of higher investment in the economy, because that is not the case in the manufacturing sector, but of higher manufacturing unemployment and a high level of redundancies.

If productivity was helping the economy so that it was at record levels, if investment was higher than it had ever been, if we were in the sixth year of the economic recovery that the Government have claimed, and if we had never had it so good, as the Secretary of State for Employment in the other place has been telling us, will Conservative Members answer a few simple questions? Why is it that, alone of our industrial competitors, our industrial manufacturing output is still 8 per cent. below what it was in 1979, when the Government came to power? Why is it that output in consumer goods is still 7 per cent. below 1979, in metals 26 per cent., in engineering and allied goods, which include electronics for this analysis, 5 per cent., and in other manufacturing industry 12 per cent. below? Why is it that output in these years has risen by 24 per cent. in Japan, in the United States by 14 per cent., and in all the OECD countries by 10 per cent., when in manufacturing industry in Britain it has fallen by 8 per cent.?

The Minister talked about an inevitable fall in manufacturing employment, but perhaps he should take note of the fact that during the years of this Government manufacturing employment has risen in Japan and some other countries, such as Greece, Finland and Turkey. It has fallen by about 1 per cent. a year in America and Canada and by about 2 per cent. a year in Germany, France and Italy. In this country it has fallen by 5 per cent. a year, and by about 25 per cent. during the period of this Government.

The Minister and other Conservative Members will tell us that this is a function of the shake-out, of the move from the traditional industries to the high-technology industries, and I see hon. Members nodding. They feel that the old industries are making way for the new, that the sunset is making way for the sunrise and that the sunbelt is taking over from the rustbelt. These are the things that we hear from Ministers and Conservative Members in their speeches at the weekends.

The truth is rather different. It is a case, not of the old industries making way for the new, but of the new industries making way for foreign imports. The Government have been stifling the new industries almost as quickly as they have been destroying our traditional industries. If in 1979 we had named one sector which might have been expected to do well because of the happy coincidence of oil being found in the North sea, we would have proposed petrochemicals and plastics. Yet, while in 1979 our trade deficit in plastics and synthethic goods was about £100 million, it is now nearly £200 million as a result of what has happened during the past seven years.

Mr. Butcher: The hon. Gentleman has stood at that Dispatch Box in other debates. He will be aware that we have never said that new industries would replace the old. We have often said that the so-called traditional industries become revitalised by the application of new techniques in making traditional products. We have not said that the reduction in employment in the manufacturing sector is inevitable. Indeed, if the hon. Gentleman checks the record, he will find that, unfashionable as it was then, I said that the continuing fall in employment in manufacturing was not inevitable and that with increased performance we could see increased employment.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the Minister for making the point that I have tried to make throughout the debate. If the traditional industries were being revitalised, we might expect something to be happening in steel, engineering and allied industries, consumer durables and other traditional industries to give us hope that those industries would increase output and exports, and contribute to our industrial recovery. However, there is no evidence that that is the case. Moreover, even in the new industries, where we should be leading the world, our trade deficits are such that we can look forward only to the prospect of a further erosion in manufacturing employment and further losses in competitiveness compared with the rest of the world.

Mr. Couchman: Will the hon. Gentleman concede that the United Kingdom's preoccupation with the old industries, the sunset industries as he describes them, has left us on the starting line with the sunrise industries, and with severe skill shortages? GEC Avionics is an important employer in my constituency and it wishes to take on 500 people this year. It must go to Australia and New Zealand to find people with sufficient skills for those jobs. At present it has a superb export order book.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman makes a different point, but I am happy to answer it. He talked about shortages of skills, which is mentioned in the motion tabled by the hon. Member for Lincoln. These shortages are a direct result of the neglect of training during the past seven years, when the Government should have known that skilled engineers, computer operators and manpower for information technology industries would be required. Indeed, the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission, who is an appointee of this Government, not of the Labour Government, has been extremely critical during the past few weeks of the Government's policy of abandoning industrial training boards and of other measures which have led to a decline in the number of manufacturing apprentices and trainees. Therefore, if the hon. Gentleman wishes to avoid a shortage of skills in future, he must persuade the Minister to change his list of industrial objectives in such a way that money will be spent on training at an advanced level.

Dr. Hampson: The hon. Gentleman must recognise that unprecedented sums are flowing through the MSC to those areas, despite what he says. The Labour Government talked about these matters but did absolutely nothing. Mrs. Williams tried to persuade the Cabinet to set up something like the youth training scheme and to get in-service teacher training in order to provide mathematics and physics teachers, whom we still desperately need.

Mr. Brown: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the Government made a grave mistake in abolishing the industrial training boards. I hope he will agree with the chairman of the MSC, who has talked about the absence of provision in the private sector and the ineffectiveness of the voluntary arrangements, in which the Government have placed great faith. On YTS and apprenticeships, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will note that in 1979 more than 250,000 young people were either apprentices or on training courses in manufacturing industry, whereas under this Government's policies the decline in training opportunities in manufacturing industry has been even greater than the decline in employment in manufacturing industries. Now no more than 100,000 young people are in training either in apprenticeships or on YTS in manufacturing industry. That will inevitably lead to skills shortages later, if and when our economy expands.

I hope that the Minister will say, either tonight or later, why it is, if the Government are on course and we are experiencing industrial progress and things have never been so good for 90 per cent. of the population, that we can look forward only to the prospect of ever-increasing trade deficits, even in the new industries. Does the Minister accept his figures, which show that not only in petrochemicals, where we might have expected to do well, but where we have done particularly badly, but in electronics, microelectronics and information technology our trade deficits and the surplus of imports over exports have been rising at a phenomenal rate over the past seven years? If we are to believe a survey carried out, not by Cambridge university, but by Cambridge Econometrics — a body whose calculations are usually accurate — those trade deficits will increase substantially during the next 10 years, and our manufacturing trade deficit, which is already high, could double.

In the face of those problems, surely the Minister's list of abstract objectives, which involve no specific commitments to any measure that would lead to the expenditure of money, must be reconsidered. If we are to lose the place, and if we are to be unable to compete in information technology, computers, petrochemicals and microelectronics, our future as a manufacturing nation is bleak.

We in the Labour party understand that the world of manufacturing has changed and will continue to change. We understand that a feature of that is that there is almost no manufactured item produced in the United Kingdom which is not also produced abroad, and so has a direct competitor abroad. We also understand that we should be most able to compete in precisely those new high value added, research intense, high skill and high technology industries. However, if we are to be able to compete, we cannot surrender spinelessly, talking about the supremacy of market forces, because no other country does that. We must look carefully and pragmatically at how investment in training, science and technology, research and development and plant and equipment can aid an industrial expansion in those industries which would secure the wealth that would enable us to have jobs in manufacturing industry and to see them spin off into the service industries. That is a question, not of abstracts, but of specific policies which the Government should pursue.

What will the Government do in areas such as research and development, and training, having seen it acknowledged by all the agencies, including para-Governmental organisations, that there is a crisis and steps must be taken? What can the Minister do to change the situation where only half our factories use micro-electronics and the other half have no plans to use them, and where three quarters of the firms in the modern world have no access to computers and computer equipment? How can he change the fact that in Japan robots are widespread in manufacturing industry, whereas in Britain not many are available? How can he change the fact that in information technology, acknowledged experts say that 7 million jobs will be created throughout Europe over the next 10 years, yet there is no guarantee that this country — through research, investment or training — will benefit in any substantial way?

How can the hon. Gentleman change the fact that we spend less on civil research and development than almost all our major competitors? In other countries, expenditure on science and technology has been rising by between 9 and 10 per cent. a year whereas here it seems to have been rising by about 1 per cent. Most of all, how can he change the fact that at present we cannot avoid skill shortages in the future and that we will not have the kind of trained and skilled work forces that will be needed if we are to have a successful manufacturing future?

I have mentioned what the chairman of the MSC — a direct appointee of the Government — has said about the abolition of the industrial training boards. He talked about the broken promises of industrialists to provide on a voluntary basis the training that was lost when the industrial training boards were compulsorily wound up. He has talked about the dearth of action by industrialists to cope with the vacuum that was left following the abolition of these industrial training boards.

An MSC study has shown that British companies are spending far less on training as a proportion of their sales turnover than are comparable companies in Japan, the United States and Germany. It has also shown that 69 per cent. of employees are at present enjoying no training and that 25 per cent. of the manufacturing establishments surveyed had no training opportunities on offer.

That is the real world of manufacturing industry, and those are the real problems. We do not need abstract lists of industrial objectives for some distant day in the future to tell us what the real problem is. It is a question of what the Government will do to ensure that the important new industries will win.

As the right hon. Member for Hertsmere should know by his selective use of them, statistics can tell us many things. Is it not astounding that the figures available show that twice as many people in South Korea are in training in higher and further education as in Britain? That is the state to which this Government have brought the country. Seven years ago we might have hoped to compete with the West Germans, but our best hope now is to try to keep up with the South Koreans. Seven years ago we might have hoped to compete with the Japenese, but now our best hope is to be able to compete with the Taiwanese.

Mr. Parkinson: The hon. Gentleman accused me of using selective statistics. I hope he is not denying that we had record exports in manufactures this year and that the decline up to 1981 has now been arrested. Those are facts. Whether we should be doing better is another matter. However, on what does the hon. Gentleman base his assertion that seven years ago we were in a position to begin competing with Japan? As I said, in 1978 Toyota was producing 65 cars per employee, whereas Leyland was producing 5·5. The hon. Gentleman says that in 1979 we were on the verge of being able to compete with Japan. In reality, we were on the verge of going under. If the hon. Gentleman bases the rest of his speech on the assertion that a few years ago Japan was within our grasp and that we have slipped behind, he is ignoring the real world.

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman would have heard me describe some of his selective statistics had he been present at the beginning of my speech. He again says that manufacturing exports are at a record level. He must accept that our share of world manufacturing exports is at its lowest level ever. That is surely a reflection of our ability to compete with other countries.

The right hon. Gentleman talked about the recovery that has been brought about by increasing investment, but in reality investment in manufacturing industries in the United Kingdom is still below the level of 1979. Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why, after seven years of this Government — after seven years of talk, promises and two elections — manufacturing output is still below the level it had reached when the Labour Government left office? If the right hon. Gentleman can explain that conundrum, he will be doing the House a great service.

Mr. Parkinson: When the Labour Government left office in 1979, certain industries were being maintained purely on the basis of colossal subsidies. At that time the Department of Trade and Industry was spending £2 billion merely on funding the losses of a selection of nationalised industries that were producing products that were incapable of being sold without huge subsidies. There was a substantial block of heavily subsidised production, and the hon. Gentleman's own Government had plans to reduce that capacity. It was not the Conservative Government who evolved the plan to reduce the steel industry to 15 million tonnes, it was the Labour Government, who did not have the guts to do it before the last election. Therefore, we had a lot of heavily subsidised production which the Labour Government were planning to cut out had they been re-elected, but they were not re-elected.

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman has entirely missed the point that I have been making, and I wonder whether he was listening to what I said. My point was that if this Government's record was anything to write home about, we might have expected them to be doing well in the new industries. We might have expected this Government to have had record trade surpluses in areas such as information technology, computers, electronics and petrochemicals. Yet the trade deficit in these industries is worse than in many of the traditional industries which the right hon. Gentleman says must be run down because of outdated technologies.

Like the Minister, the right hon. Gentleman has not explained why under this Government manufacturing output is still below the level of 1979 and, indeed, the three-day working week of 1974. It is hardly a record about which the Minister should boast. No country has had the financial advantages that this Government had when they came to office as a result of North sea oil revenues——

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman, but when I presented the motion I was hoping that every Back Bencher who wished to air his views could participate. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear that in mind.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but the Minister spoke at some length about the sixth point of his industrial objective. However, I have been deterred from completing my speech by the interventions of the right hon. Member for Hertsmere. I can assure the hon. Member for Lincoln that it is my intention to complete it now.

No Government have had the advantages that this Government have had as a result of North sea oil revenues. Those revenues should have gone into investment, training, research and development and science and technology. Instead, they have been wasted on funding ever-rising levels of unemployment, which in real terms shows no signs of falling as a result of Government policies. No Government have so systematically wasted the opportunities that have been placed before them. They have created an industrial desert. They have called it a recovery and have presented it as a triumph of monetarism.

The Opposition believe in the future of manufacturing industry. We will invest in it. We will pay attention to the needs of training, research and development, science and technology and the re-equipping of the vital industries that must win in the export markets if we are to succeed as an industrial nation. The country understands that, and it also understands that this Government have failed.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): So far we have had a good debate which has perhaps been somewhat dominated by the Conservative Benches. However, we were all interested in the exchange between my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson), a former Secretary of State, and the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). Clearly my right hon. Friend scored all the points in that exchange.

Unfortunately, it appears that the Opposition have learnt nothing. We have heard only a minute's worth of their proposals although we have learned that they are now in favour of robots. It is a pity that it has taken them so long to reach that view. When our industries were under their stewardship, they were unable to invest for the future and in robotics for British Leyland. Robotics has saved British Leyland from extinction.

I join hon. Members from both sides of the House in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) on securing this important debate and on the terms of his motion, which I entirely endorse. As an international banker, I am not paid as highly as popular rumour would have it. I believe that international bankers are paid a proper rate for the job and I should like to see higher pay in industry. I am worried at the attempts that have been made to polarise the United Kingdom economy into manufacturing and service industries and pitting the one against the other. We need both and we must, as a nation, excel at both.

These days, in order to sell a power station to India or aeroplanes to Botswana, it is necessary to provide a potential purchaser with the finance. British architects earn valuable foreign exchange for services rendered to overseas clients and they enhance the opportunity for United Kingdom contractors to secure the follow-up business.

We can be justly proud of the achievements of our service industries in greasing the wheels of industry and in securing overseas business in their own right. London is the undisputed centre of the financial world with more than 500 foreign banks. Lloyd's is the principal insurance market, and foreign companies invariably seek to have their contracts governed by English law as they have the highest regard for our legal profession and for the administration of justice. I would like that spirit of enterprise, confidence and determination which is so evident in the service sector of industry now to pervade the industrial sector. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere I believe that we are approaching the new culture that we are trying to create.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I have been following my hon. Friend's argument, although it has been brief so far, very closely. I am one of the Conservative Members who has considerable reserve about the positive position of the City of London. Can my hon. Friend explain why the City of London finds it possible to devote hundreds of millions of pounds to takeovers which do not produce additional jobs? Will he, further, tell me why the City can find so much time and expertise to invest money in other paper money by way of foreign currency transactions rather than investing in manufacturing industry? That is the few making a lot more money for the few and ignoring the real needs of this country which lie in manufacturing industry. There is so much money in the City. Why is that money not coming out of the City and into manufacturing industry?

Mr. Howarth: As always, my hon. Friend is very vigorous in his remarks. However, he fails to understand that funds are available. There is no shortage of funding for anyone who has a good idea. To talk about the recent spate of mergers and takeovers is a complete red herring.

Mr. Winterton: No, it is not.

Mr. Howarth: It is. I must tell my hon. Friend who is becoming agitated that I support him in most things. However, he has a perverse deviation on this point.

Mr. Winterton: Perhaps I should ask my hon. Friend to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Howarth: I am unable to support my hon. Friend in that deviation. The banks are falling over themselves to lend funds for any good product or proposition. It is simply not true —

Mr. Winterton: No, they are not.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend says that they are not. If they are not, there are plenty of Government agencies which are willing to invest money. NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. in my constituency has £15 million at its disposal. It is anxious for anyone to come forward with a good idea which it can support.

Since entering the House in 1983 I have taken a close interest in manufacturing industry in my constituency and I have a special interest in the aerospace industry. Among the companies in my constituency there are Lucas Electrical, a major caterpillar dealer and a company which supplies sports boats around the world from a point which is the furthest from the sea in the United Kingdom — Fletcher International Sports Boats. The picture in my constituency and elsewhere in the west midlands does not accord with the description that I have heard from the Opposition Benches.

There is no doubt that industry has problems. However, there is also good news and that point was most forcefully made by my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Howarth]

Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) who moved the motion. I have seen a textbook revolution taking place in my constituency. There was clearly overmanning on a massive scale when this Government came to office in 1979. Under previous Labour and Conservative Governments the unions had been allowed to dictate the level of manning. The result was that the unions, anxious to maintain short-run jobs, ensured that industry was overmanned to the extent that it was completely unable to compete. This 40 years of failure by previous Governments to allow management the right to manage, has been at the heart of our problems.

In seven years we have had to do what our major competitors have done over the past 40 years. That is, we have had to adjust manning levels to the requirements of industry and the needs of the market. This change has been traumatic. Every week hon. Members see the results of this traumatic change in their constituencies. However, I believe it is to the great credit of the Government that they have at long last bitten on the bullet and taken the necessary action to allow management to manage so that at last we can start to rebuild.

Those who say that our economy is now wholly dependent on North sea oil should remember that it constitutes only some 8 per cent. of gross national product. It is not the most dominant sector of our economy. I liken it to Dunkirk. Just as the British Expeditionary Force was fortunate to have calm weather when the little ships returned from Dunkirk, so I believe that the Almighty has smiled on the British economy. He has given us oil, the most valuable commodity of its time, out of the most inhospitable waters, from which we have been able to derive resources which are now providing us with the cushion of opportunity to correct the economy.

We were suffering from overmanning and that has largely been resolved. New union agreements have been made whereby the work force is more flexible in its agreements with employers. Investment has risen by 39 per cent. since 1980-81. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East referred to robotics. No doubt he has visited Austin Rover where robotics have made a substantial contribution to the revitalisation of that company. Since Jaguar came under new management in the early 1980s, the amount of investment to which my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield referred, has been about £100 million. That investment is producing results. Initially that investment displaced men. The move towards the introduction of robotics which was so strongly resisted by the unions and the Labour party stood in the way of progress in manufacturing industry. It is the shackles which outdated manufacturing processes have placed on manufacturing industry which have created the problems.

These changes together with the new determination evident in the industry not to rely on captive markets as in the past but to provide the products at the right price on the right delivery date, is turning the British economy round. The managing director of Jaguar has said that he will go for a zero defect car. It is no good producing an expensive car if people have to take it back to the dealer so many times that they are put off. I salute Jaguar's work in setting an example for the rest of British industry.

I have firms in my constituency which were in difficulty but which are now quietly confident. That is most encouraging. They are taking on new labour, although they are not making a great song and dance about it because they do not want their competitors to know and because there is unquestionably a reluctance to believe that there is a boom ahead. We want quiet confidence — a boom would destroy the manufacturing base because it would immediately suck in imports, and our industry cannot respond to such an increase in demand overnight.

Some of the calls on the Government to take action are right. It is now time for interest rates to come down. They represent a substantial burden on industry. My right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere was entirely right about interest rates being unreally low. They are now unreally high. My authority for saying that is discussions with foreign exchange dealers in the City who firmly believe that falling interest rates would be regarded as a sign of strength in the British economy and would not result in sterling going through the floor, thus creating inflationary expectations.

The Government have managed to reduce energy costs to industry by 8 per cent. That achievement has gone unremarked on the Opposition Front Bench. The reduction is largely the result of the Government's action in regard to the National Coal Board — they have ensured that it has become much more commercial.

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to re-examine the European Community directive on product liability. It is causing industry, especially manufacturing industry, great headaches. It will add to their costs and it is likely to benefit the importer rather than the domestic producer.

I urge my hon. Friend not to relax the green belt. There is plenty of available space in other parts of the country not far from the south-east where there is relatively cheap accommodation. The Government must reconsider rent decontrol, which is vital.

It is not entirely up to the Government or industry to put their houses in order. Industry can do a lot, but I put in a special plea to the fourth estate — our friends in the media. Please will they stop knocking manufacturing industry? Journalists in France and Germany, for example, do not knock their industries. There is far too much knocking of British manufacturing, and less would be greatly appreciated. My message is that industry is prospering under the Government and I hope that it will continue to prosper even more.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Time is short. I make no complaint about that. I should have liked the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) to have spoken longer as we did not hear enough about Labour's industrial policy. We heard very little, for example, of the extensive nationalisation that was promised in 1983. Has that now been jettisoned from the manifesto? We heard very little about the planning controls and agreements that were sought by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Wâlton (Mr. Heffer). I look forward to seeing how those discussions proceed. We also heard little about incomes policy and the present negotiations between the Labour party and the trade unions. We did not get quite the full picture of Labour's industrial policy that we expected.

Until the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East spoke, I thought that this had been a useful debate. I thought that it had finally dispelled two great myths about manufacturing industry — that it is doing badly and that the Government are not doing their best to assist it.

I cannot judge whether manufacturing is leaner or fitter than in the 1950s, 1960s or 1970s, but I know that it is a lot healthier than Opposition Members suggest. I know that capital investment of £6·7 billion was made in manufacturing last year – 21 per cent. higher than in 1983, when I was elected to this House. I know, too, that engineering output was up 6·5 per cent. last year, that machine tool exports have increased by 20 per cent. during the past 12 months and that there have been considerable and formidable improvements in productivity in the steel and textile industries.

In the north-east, despite high unemployment and what the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) told us, scores of manufacturing companies are doing well and making good profits. If there were not, we should not be getting 25,000 people off the unemployment register every month, as happened last year in the north-east. The hon. Member for Jarrow gave two examples, both of which I want to take up. He mentioned steel. He might have seen last Sunday's edition of the Northern Echo which ran and article on the Darlington and Simpson Rolling Mills annual results under the headline:

"Huge profits add 100 jobs."

The company sells steel profiles across Europe and into the heart of America. Profits last year increased by £800,000, or 16 per cent. The profits of £6·7 million have been ploughed back into the company. At the beginning of the year for which it reports, the company employed 645 people. It now employs 737 and will employ 837 people next year.

The hon. Member for Jarrow also mentioned NEI Reynolds and its anxiety about power station work. It is far more worried about the threat to the nuclear power station programme posed by the Labour party's conference resolution at Bournemouth last year. Not many people in NEI will be voting Labour at the next election and seeing themselves put out of work as a result.

It is simply not true that the Government are not helping industry. Some 28,000 jobs have been created by the new regional policy in the north-east alone during the past two years, and a further 10,000 jobs have been preserved. The Department of Trade and Industry's spending is now much better balanced. We get more for the regional aid money that is spent, and we get better spread of support between the new and the old industries. We also have enterprise creation measures which we never had under previous Governments.

Radical government cannot stand still. As well as creating the right conditions of low inflation and helping with the economy, the Government should do two other things to assist manufacturing industry. First, they should target regional policy even more effectively. I understand that a mini-review is going on at the moment. There are still distortions, not simply between assisted and non-assisted areas, but between assisted areas – between development areas and intermediate areas.

The Government must also improve the efficiency of the labour market. An unemployment rate of 13 per cent. is neither tolerable nor efficient, but 23 per cent. male unemployment, as in the north-east, is simply unacceptable, especially when we consider the skills that are wanted in the south and which are wasted in the north. There are men in the north who want to work but cannot because they are trapped in the north in private houses that they cannot sell or council houses that they cannot exchange. I am aware that not all want to move, but it is much more difficult now for people to move than it was in the 1930s or the 1950s, as the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) said. If the Government do nothing else – there were signs last week that we will not do much else – they should radically improve the housing market by making it much easier, by decontrolling rents and relaxing green belt restrictions in the south, to provide opportunities for people in the north who are out of work and have skills to move to areas of the south-east where there are skill shortages.

Question put and agree to.

Resolved,

That this House agrees that manufacturing industry has a central part to play in the future prosperity of the United Kingdom, and, that, in order to succeed in a fiercely competitive world, it must use the most modern manufacturing methods, and market its products with skill; notes further, that the importance of manufacturing must be recognised by society generally and by schools and colleges in particular, so that industry can surmount the present shortage of skills; and believes finally that success in manufacturing can only be won in any enterprise through the united efforts of all the work force.

Press Gallery

6.59 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a point of order Mr. Speaker. I have been sitting here throughout the debate. As hon. Members we are often criticised by the press for not being in our places. Throughout this important debate on the future of manufacturing industry in this country I could have counted on the fingers of one hand the number of people in the Press Gallery. Is it not possible to make some representations to the press to attend important debates of this kind?

Mr. Speaker: That is not among my many responsibilities. I think that I should confine myself to what happens on the Floor of the Chamber, not to what goes on behind me.

Tin Industry

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Secretary of State to move the Prime Minister's motion, I must announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): I beg to move,

That this House endorses the Government's response (HC 457) to the Second Report from the Trade and Industry Committee on the Tin Crisis (HC 305-I); regrets the difficulties brought upon the Cornish tin industry, the International Tin Council's creditors and others as a result of the failure of the International Tin Council to reach agreement with its creditors, despite the considerable efforts made by the Government, and welcomes the Government's package of measures to help employment in Cornwall.

I invite the House to endorse the Government's reply to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. I note that a surprisingly large number of hon. Members wish to speak in this important debate and, therefore, I shall try not to take up too much time and I shall come straight to the point.

It strikes me that there are three main issues on which I suspect that the House will wish to concentrate. As the House knows, under difficult circumstances, to which I shall refer later, the Committee has produced a report which raises a number of important questions. The three main issues are, first, the constraints under which the Government operated in giving evidence to the Committee, secondly, the conduct of the Government both before and after the collapse of the International Tin Council in October 1985 and thirdly, the effect on the Cornish tin industry. My hon. Friend the Minister of State will deal with the problems of Cornwall more fully when he replies to the debate.

I should like first to deal with the constraints which the Government faced in giving evidence to the Committee. I must, however, reject any suggestions that, in giving evidence, Ministers or officials withheld information except where required to do so by international obligations, legal considerations or established conventions relating to the disclosure of information to Select Committees. In fact, the Government made every effort to provide as much information as possible to the Committee. In the case of the papers and proceedings of the International Tin Council — to which confidentiality attaches under the international tin agreement and the ITC rules — our delegates twice requested the council to agree to disclosure. Both those approaches were emphatically rejected.

The Committee also criticised our refusal to depart from the principle that advice given to Ministers by officials may not be disclosed. I must make it clear that the instructions given by Ministers and followed by officials in the course of this inquiry were no different from the rules that are generally applicable when civil servants give evidence to Select Committees. These rules are set out in the memorandum of guidance for officials appearing before Select Committees. They make clear the categories of information which officials must not disclose to Committees including, in particular, advice to Ministers. The purpose of such a rule is clear and well understood. It is to preserve the basis of confidence between Ministers and their advisers. That is necessary for the effective functioning of Departments, and it underlies the basic principle that it is Ministers and not officials who are responsible to Parliament for the activities of their Department. Finally, we were constrained by the fact that the matters under investigation were the subject of legal actions in which the Crown may become involved.

Before I turn to the question of the conduct of the Government in the tin crisis, I shall tell the House the background to this debate.

In 1982, when the fifth international tin agreement expired, the Government had to decide whether to join the sixth agreement. There was considerable reluctance to do so, particularly as the two largest consumers, the United States of America and the Soviet Union, had announced that they would not join. So there was some question as to whether the consumer voice would be fully effective.

On balance, it was decided to continue as members of the ITC. I remind the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) that that was a decision the previous Government had equally come to in joining the fifth agreement. That decision was taken, first, because the Government at the time believed that it was in the interests of this country that there should be, as it was then seen, a stable international market in tin; secondly, because the majority of the Community member states wished to join; and, thirdly, it was thought that to refuse to join would have adversely affected our relations with the producing countries. There were also a number of subsidiary reasons in the Government's mind at that time, but it is fair to say that those were the three main reasons why, on balance, the difficult decision was taken to join rather than not to join.

Very early in the life of the sixth agreement the Government became concerned at the lack of information about the operations of the buffer stock manager. The Government made no secret of their concerns about the absence of proper control and accountability over the actions of the buffer stock manager. We tried hard, through the ITC, to establish proper accountability, but were not supported by other member countries. With between only 4 and 5 per cent. of the votes, our power to enforce proper accountability was limited. The nature of these efforts was explained to the Select Committee, and they are part of the published evidence.

The Select Committee was critical, in its report, of what it saw as the failure by the Government to insist on obtaining the necessary information from the ITC to enable everyone to understand what was going on. In my view the Committee was quite right to focus on the issue of accountability, which is one of the main lessons for the future to be learned from the tin crisis. However, with respect, it was wrong to lay the blame for the lack of accountability at the door of the Government. In this context I should like to refer to the Committee's assertion that either Ministers were informed about the crisis, in which case they should have acted, or were not informed, in which case they should have insisted on being so.

I believe that the view that it was within the power of Ministers to insist on having the information needed to foresee the impending collapse is based on a false assumption. It is perhaps not always fully appreciated that the ITC is governed by an international treaty between sovereign states. It therefore operates largely outside United Kingdom law. For example, the Companies Acts do not apply to the ITC. Therefore, it is not a body over which Her Majesty's Government could exercise control, nor even a supervisory function. International bodies of this nature are not subjected to such intervention by the Government of the host country.

The ITC made its own rules and within those rules our ability to obtain information was restricted. We tried hard to get the rules changed, but without success, and there was no way in which, unilaterally, as a member with between 4 and 5 per cent. of the votes, we could enforce our views on the council. Therefore, it was necessary to work on the basis of inadequate information, and the information which was available did not suggest impending collapse. Indeed the level of indebtedness declined between 1983 and mid-1985.

The members of the ITC did not, however, know that the buffer stock manager had been making substantial unpriced forward sales of tin. This meant that any reduction in the tin support price would have led to losses on these forward sales. It was not revealed until after the collapse of the ITC on 24 October 1985, that the buffer stock manager has contracted to sell forward 60,000 tonnes of tin on an unpriced basis.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I find it difficult to follow the Secretary of State. Why did the Government not know about that when representatives were there and, apparently, the buffer stock manager was warning all the time of the impending crisis?

Mr. Channon: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, that is not exactly right. I have been trying to explain to the House the great difficulty that Government representatives had in obtaining adequate information from the ITC, although we made attempts to do so, in which we had little if any support from other member states.

ITC members were not informed about the buffer stock manager's unpriced forward sales contracts, nor were full details of the scale and nature of his operations revealed until after the collapse on 24 October. Frankly, that is the crucial point. There was no way that we could discover what the exact position was. That would not have been possible unless the ITC had been prepared to release the information.

I should like to deal with some of the detailed criticisms of the Government's conduct in those affairs. I shall refer first to the warnings to the banks, brokers and United Kingdom tin producers. However, before doing so, I should like to refer to a wider issue that arose in this context.

I very much regret that the Committee thought it fit to criticise a named civil servant. However, I do not propose to discuss that issue today. It relates to questions of general principle, which are best considered in the context of the issues discussed in the seventh report from the Select Committee on Treasury and Civil Service, entitled "Civil Servants and Ministers: Duties and Responsibilities".

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): He was useless, and proved that.

Mr. Channon: With respect to my hon. Friend, it is a little unfair for him, in the House of Commons, to attack a named civil servant who does not have the chance to reply. With respect to my hon. Friend, I feel very strongly about the matter. I resent that

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: If my right hon. Friend had had the courtesy to instruct his Ministers to give full information to the Committee, the Committee would have been in a position to attribute blame to Ministers. As it was, he hid behind his civil servant and denied the Committee information to which it was entitled.

Mr. Channon: With respect, I do not agree with my hon. Friend's interpretation of events. I understand how strongly he feels about the issue. I have to say that, rightly or wrongly, I accept responsibility for my Department, and I continue to do so.

No warnings were given by the Government to anyone that the ITC was about to collapse. It would have been most improper to do so as we had no information to suggest, until shortly before the events of 24 October, that such a collapse was imminent. Even in September 1985 the producer countries were reported to have recommended to their Ministers the injection of additional funds in the agreement. Indeed, had the Government issued formal warnings to the banks, brokers and others, we would, by doing so, almost certainly have precipitated the collapse of the ITC. We would have been accused by all other members of sabotaging the agreement while moves to inject new funds into it were under active discussion. In such circumstances, most people would have believed that the Government had acted irresponsibly, and had brought about the collapse of the ITC deliberately.

What both the Bank of England and the Government did was, in response to concerns expressed by the London Metal Exchange, to warn that, if the ITC ran out of money, the brokers could not count on the ITC member countries stepping in to finance any shortfall. We also told the LME that we did not have adequate information about the financial position or the market activities of the buffer stock manager. In addition, in response to a question from the chairman of the London Metal Exchange in June 1985, Department of Trade and Industry officials made it clear that the United Kingdom Government would not unilaterally guarantee the LME brokers against a default by the ITC.

As I tried to explain earlier in referring to the unpriced forward sales, neither Her Majesty's Government, nor, I believe, any of the other member Governments, were aware of the potential scale of the ITC's default. For the reasons that I have given, it would have been entirely inappropriate to give warning either to the banks who were lending to the ITC — most of which were foreign owned — or to the Cornish tin producers. Indeed, Rio Tinto-Zinc has told us that it would have made no difference to its actions even had it been warned at the time when officials met the LME brokers.

I refer now to the Committee's suggestion that the Government's conditional agreement to contribute £50 million to help meet the costs of a solution to the crisis was not sufficient. I hope that the Committee will not mind me saying that I cannot accept that criticism and I find it difficult to understand the basis on which the Committee should describe the United Kingdom's offer as insufficient.

I must emphasise that the Government accept no legal liability for the debts of the ITC. We were prepared to contribute £50 million in addition to an amount proportionate to our original contribution to the buffer stock, which was about 4 per cent., in order to secure a return to orderly trading in tin. That would have been in the interests of all concerned, including the Cornish tin industry and the LME. We believed that, given the attitude of other ITC member Governments, a negotiated resolution to the crisis would not have been possible without a significant additional contribution by the United Kingdom. However, it would have been quite wrong to expect the taxpayer to provide a greater sum when the United Kingdom's share of the funding of the agreement was only 4 per cent. I must reject any suggestions of complacency on the Government's part. We are determined to draw what lessons we can from the failure of the ITC for other agreements of that type.

Even before the Select Committee reported, the Government had begun a study of their responsibilities to other international trading organisations and similar bodies. As a result we are reasonably satisfied that none is likely to develop problems such as those that occurred in the ITC, but they will all be kept under close review. It is not always easy to identify potential liabilities with precision in advance or to quantify the extent of the risk, which may change over time if the role or operation of the organisation changes. But our object must be to minimise those risks and avoid incurring fresh ones wherever possible. We intend to ensure that the operations of such bodies are reviewed regularly, and in considering our approach to future agreements of this nature, that will be one of the factors which will be very much to the fore in the Government's considerations.

The Committee, in its report and in its response to the Government's reply, draws attention to the importance of the tin mining industry in Cornwall. I fully understand — as I think the whole House does — the importance of tin to the Cornish economy, but the problem has to be looked at in the context of a fall in price in tin in recent weeks to well below £4,000 per tonne — less than half the price at which it was being supported under the international tin agreement. Those low price levels are the result of over-capacity and of the large tin stocks left in the market by the default of the ITC, and it may well take several years for the stocks to clear and for the price to rise to a level at which tin production capacity necessary to meet future demands can operate profitably. When considering applications for assistance, we have to make judgments about future market conditions, and we have accepted that decisions need to be taken about the future of the Cornish tin industry before the long-term price of tin is known.

Regrettably, we were forced to conclude that the proposals put to us by the Geevor mine did not offer sufficiently robust prospects of commercial viability to justify the unavoidable risks associated with any such project, particularly in view of the very large sums of public money that would have been required.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why do the Government seem to have adopted a different strategy to bailing out companies when they are in trouble from the strategy that they are adopting towards the tin mines? Why, for instance, in 1984 could the Government find £100 million of taxpayers' money to bail out Johnson Matthey Bankers without recourse to meetings other than the secret meeting in Threadneedle street? That was £100 million of taxpayers' money, with no guarantee of anything back in return. In the same year, the Government managed to find £250 million to bail out the bankrupt Common Market. On and on it goes. The Government seem to bail out the parts of the casino economy that suit them while they do not care tuppence about the few thousand miners who work in Cornwall. How do they manage to come to different conclusions? Is it because their friends in the City have to be looked after but they do not care about miners?

Mr. Channon: I hope that the House does not expect me to answer the detailed points regarding Johnson Matthey. They are wholly irrelevant to what we are trying to discuss in what is inevitably a short debate. I am trying to outline the considerations which we have had in our minds on the tin problem and the work that is going on. My Department has offered to fund a study aimed at seeing whether a commercially viable project could be identified.

The Government recognise that the further contraction or closure of the Geevor tin mine would increase the already high level of unemployment in the Penzance and St. Ives travel-to-work area. In addition to existing measures of assistance made available from 1 July in the Penzance and St. Ives TTWA, a slightly amended version of the business improvements service package of schemes of assistance to small businesses which is currently operated by my Department will be available. This will help the local economy to diversify into activities other than tin mining and tourism. As the House knows, £1 million will be made available for this purpose.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Before my right hon. Friend reaches the issue that is of prime consideration to me and my constituents, I must say that we accept that the initial application was for a large sum of money, and we are grateful for the £1 million that is being made available under the business improvement scheme. However, have the Government closed their minds completely to a contribution towards care and maintenance of Geevor mine for a period of two years? I am told that it would cost £150,000. That would be £150,000 well spent to keep Geevor mine going—to keep the pumps going—so that there is at least hope for Geevor and the people of west Cornwall who depend on it. Will my right hon. Friend address himself to that issue?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend raises an absolutely crucial point for Geevor. I pay tribute to him for his efforts on behalf of Geevor and those employed at Geevor.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: We should like the answer now.

Mr. Channon: I shall give the answer now, if my hon. Friend will allow me to do so. The proposal put forward so far, which my hon. Friend the Minister of State will deal with in more detail when he replies to the debate, does not satisfy us as to being able to provide future viability for that mine. As I said a moment ago, I have offered to fund a study aimed at seeing whether a commercially viable project could be identified. I hope that that offer will be taken up.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Before my right hon. Friend progresses to that, is he aware of a telex sent by an official of his Department which said that the Government would pay to keep the mine dewatered to the end of August? I have seen the telex. Has the Minister not seen the telex, or is he reneging on his own Department's telex? If not, will that money still be paid to keep the mine dewatered to the end of August?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend has not described the terms of the telex accurately. The best that I can do, on the whole question of Geevor, its viability and the study that I suggest should be undertaken, is to say that any detailed points which my hon. Friend or other hon. Members wish to take up will be answered by my hon. Friend the Minister of State in the course of the debate. He has been involved in the discussions.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro) rose—

Mr. Channon: No, I shall not give way again. All I can say is that the interpretation of the telex to which my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton referred is not one that I can accept, but let us deal with that in some detail.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) rose

Mr. Channon: I shall willingly continue to give way, but does the House wish me to finish or not?

Mr. Alan Williams: Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that the information for which he has been asked is central to the debate? Many Conservative Members in particular will not know what to say and will not know how to assess what the Government's position is until they have the information that we are now told is to be given in the reply. The Secretary of State should give the information now. Is he saying that he is so little briefed on that subject that he does not know the answer?

Mr. Channon: With respect, the right hon. Gentleman is lowering the tone. I have already answered the question. The telex to which my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton referred does not bear the interpretation that has been put on it. I have described in some detail the Government's policy regarding Geevor. I have said that we have offered to fund a study aimed at seeing whether a commercially viable project can be identified. Let us hope that that study can go ahead, and let us hope that a commercially viable project can be identified. I cannot go further than that at this stage.

Mr. Penhaligon: I use this rare opportunity to ask the Secretary of State, as opposed to his deputy the Minister of State, a fundamental question which worries many people. Within hours, and certainly weeks, of the original sad collapse, the Government machine made a decision to offer up to £50 million to put the agreement back together. I make no complaint about that. However, eight and a half months later we still have no clear declaration from the Government that they are willing to put money into rescuing some of the tin mines. It is true that they have not said no to all of them. But even now, there is no clear declaration of the sort of money that the Secretary of State is talking about. Will he confirm at the Dispatch Box tonight whether, if the criteria are right, he is willing to give the miners of Cornwall half of what he offered the dealers?

Mr. Channon: In consultation with Geevor, Rio Tinto-Zinc and others, we must try to identify whether there are projects that would be viable. So far, no project put forward for Geevor has been proved to be commercially viable. I have said that we have offered to fund a study aimed at seeing whether a commercially viable project could be identified. The Government are also discussing with Rio Tinto-Zinc the possibility of providing financial assistance to enable its tin operations at Wheal Jane and South Crofty, where about 1,000 people are employed, to continue. There are continuing discussions with Rio Tinto-Zinc to see whether a viable project can be identified.

[Mr. Channon]

In addition, we are considering applications from smaller tin producers in Cornwall. We shall particularly take into account the employment implications and the level of financial assistance necessary in each case but, as in the case of Geevor, we shall need to be satisfied that tin operations in Cornwall would be viable.

I think that the House will agree that the events in the tin crisis have been traumatic for all those concerned — those in Cornwall, those outside Cornwall, those in the tin industry itself, and the communities concerned with tin production.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: And for the Department of Trade and Industry?

Mr. Channon: I am sure that for my hon. Friend it has been. We believe it is essential that we should do everything to ensure that such a position cannot be allowed to develop again. I hope that the House will agree. This will govern our approach to all future potential commodity agreements.

I invite the House to support the Government's motion and to endorse their response to the Select Committee.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"rejects as utterly inadequate the Government's response (HC 457) to the Second Report from the Trade and Industry Committee on the Tin Crisis (HC 305-I); notes that the Select Committee highlights inherent faults of the International Tin Agreement which made it 'catastrophe prone'; considers that the Government failed to monitor these faults and so contributed to the failure of the International Tin Council and thereby to the consequential collapse of tin prices, to enormous losses by Tin Council creditors, to the closure of Geevor Mine and to the severe threat to the whole Cornish tin industry; and dismisses as derisory and pathetic the Government's so-called package of measures to combat unemployment in Cornwall."

With respect to the Secretary of State, the Government's response to the damning report that has come from a Committee on which the Government have a clear majority is pathetic. I recognise that the Secretary of State is not the person largely responsible for the events that we are debating. I know that he must accept the role of head of a Department, and we shall deal with responsibilities a little later. I accept that many of the problems with which we are dealing mere inherited rather than caused by the right hon. Gentleman, but I submit that the Department has caused many of those problems.

It may be improper to make the observation, but, as I look at the number of supporting officials that the Secretary of State has had to bring along with him this evening, I realise just how worried the Department must be. If the Secretary of State carries on like that, we shall soon need a double decker Box for officials. However, that is not surprising, having read the evidence, as most hon. Members have done. There is a three-year catalogue of buck passing, incompetence, inaction, lack of perception and lack of any sense of urgency. Having studied this exercise in ineptitude, I understand how the Department of Trade and Industry blundered into the Westland fiasco and the Leyland debacle. This is in the same category.

What are the consequences of the Department's three years of bumbling and bungling? The brokers and bankers stand to lose sums which cannot be quantified. The minimum is £160 million, but the City claims it will be as much as £600 million. The tin price and the tin market have collapsed. Already there has been the loss of the Geevor mine and we face the possible loss of the remainder of the 2,000-year-old Cornish tin industry. There is the urgent prospect of an extra 2,000 unemployed in Cornwall. Crippling damage has been done to London's reputation as a trading centre. All those consequences arise, in part, from the actions of the Department of Trade and Industry.

Two clear features emerge from an objective reading of the report. First, there has been the refusal, on an unprecedented scale, by a Department to supply information to a Select Committee. The Secretary of State must understand that those of a less generous disposition might feel that that savours of a cover-up or of an attempt to save someone's neck at the expense of another's. Secondly, the collapse need never have taken place. Ministers bear an overriding responsibility for the fact that it happened, as I hope to prove.

The Secretary of State referred to the suppression of information. I supported the setting up of the Select Committee system. I have never seen such a barricade of excuses to justify the refusal to give information which was essential to the work of one of our Select Committees. I shall give just a few examples of the excuses. We were told that the International Tin Council was covered by diplomatic immunity and confidentiality. We were told, "We cannot reveal the advice of officials to Ministers. We cannot give any information on the legal advice given to Ministers because it is wrong to disclose the advice given to clients."

We were told that some matters could not be discussed because they were sub judice and that others could not be discussed because they might be sub judice. Junior officials told us that the questions should be put to senior officials. Senior officials told us that Ministers had told them not to answer. Ministers said they had no intention of giving answers. One is left with the impression that even the luncheon vouchers in the Department of Trade and Industry are listed as classified documents. One could only wish that the Department had shown a less cavalier attitude when dealing with the odd letter or two from the Solicitor-General's office.

The permanent secretary acknowledged the embarrassment, answering question No. 697 by saying:

"I do not believe I have ever been under quite so many constraints in giving evidence to a Select Committee."

That is extremely serious when one considers the scale of the consequences.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: They were self-imposed constraints.

Mr. Williams: Exactly. I shall come to that point.

That led the unanimous report of the Select Committee, in paragraph 13.1, to observe:

"As a result, we have been effectively prevented from discovering all the facts about one of the principal facets of our inquiry: the role of the Government in the crisis."

What is a Select Committee for? The Select Committee system was set up to enable the House to investigate the Executive. It was the check for the legislature on the Civil Service and on Departments. That is what the system is all about.

When a Select Committee Chairman, backed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, tells us that the Select Committee was not able to obtain the information to enable it to draw proper conclusions on the Government's conduct, surely the House has a right and a duty to be concerned and to probe further. The concept of Select Committees is put at risk and is open to doubt if we allow the Department of Trade and Industry to get away with the absolute contempt with which it treated the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. It was extremely modest of the Select Committee to state:

"it seems unnecessarily obstructive of Ministers".

Even on the limited information revealed — we have been allowed only partial information, the worst bits having been swept under the carpet or kept in the cupboards — the Department and the Secretary of State have every reason to be cautious. In line after line of the evidence to the Select Committee they were pleading the fifth amendment. The evidence reveals without doubt that the Government are guilty of complicity by neglect.

The most damning evidence — that Ministers were aware of the risks before they entered into the agreement — has been endorsed by the Secretary of State. The right hon. Gentleman has given some of the reasons. In question No. 603 a civil servant gave this reply to the Chairman:

"I think the position is that Ministers in the very beginning were warned."

The Chairman asked:

"What is 'the very beginning'?"

The civil servant replied:

"The agreement came into force in June 1982, so before we entered into the agreement officials made clear to Ministers the risks that might be involved in entering it. Then subsequently they told them about the problems they had been having with the operation of the agreement."

That line was developed further by the permanent secretary, the Department's accounting officer, who, in answer to question No. 742, said:

"I think it was evident in 1982 before we even joined the Agreement; if was evident that if Brazil was not a member, and it was a low-cost producer which would be encouraged by the sort of tin prices at which the Agreement was aiming and it would be subject to no constraints in expanded production, it would place great strain on the Agreement. This was amongst the disadvantages of the Agreement which were known at that time."

If those facts were known at the time and it was known that there were grave disadvantages, what would hon. Members' sense of survival dictate if they were Ministers about to encourage the signing of such a treaty? Any Minister worthy to hold the title "Minister" would want to ensure that, having been warned of the risks, he protected the country, our traders and the Government from them. Why did Ministers sign up without obtaining a proper monitoring agreement? Where were the checks? Why did Ministers not demand a system of checks before signing the agreement? They had the muscle before they signed. Where was the requirement to be given adequate information?

The Secretary of State has said that they had much trouble in obtaining the information. As one who on various occasions has had to enter into agreements, I have wanted to be sure about their terms. I doubt that the Secretary of State would have entered into the agreement on its terms. It was incredibly irresponsible to act in that way. It is beyond belief that Ministers could have signed that document with that knowledge without taking safeguards.

In answer to question No. 714, the permanent secretary described the agreement as "a recipe for an ever-increasing buffer stock . . . . it was necessary for . . . additional reserves to be made available"

He also stated:

"This agreement has suffered from its outset from an inadequacy of resources"

Surely it was suicidal for Ministers to enter into an agreement from which three major producers — Brazil, China and Bolivia — were absent, without ensuring that they built proper safeguards into the agreement. Yet Ministers of the day were not perturbed. Perhaps they should be here today at the Dispatch Box.

The ministerial guilt at the outset is further compounded when we consider the other warnings that came during the lifetime of the agreement. If ministerial alarm bells had not been ringing at the outset, it is bewildering that they were not alerted by what followed. Let us listen to the words of the buffer stock manager in a report which the Secretary of State refused to make available to the Committee but which it obtained from American sources. The buffer stock manager said:

"As we have reported over the last three years or so, the fact that hardly any cash was contributed to the Sixth Agreement was gambling on the good fortune of Buffer Stock operations, and so far the gambling by ITC members has fortunately paid off very well. It is mainly due indeed to our good fortune in the market, ie the increase in the US dollar. One may trust that the severe decline in the US dollar over the last two months will have clearly vindicated our message that the ITC should stop gambling on its good fortune in view of what is at stake, ie the fortunes of the entire tin-mining industry."

The buffer stock manager is saying that he had warned of the same hazards as some of the civil servants had warned at the outset. In that context it is remarkable, in view of what I shall mention soon, to read the evidence by the other Minister of State in the Department, who unfortunately is not here this evening, no doubt for good reasons.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Before the right hon. Gentleman makes that point, I would much prefer him to inquire whether the United Kingdom delegate, Mr. Lunn, passed the warning from the buffer stock manager to Ministers. It is all very well for Ministers to say that they take responsibility and that civil servants should not be criticised, but if they will not tell the Committee or the House whether the civil servants gave them the necessary information on which they could have taken action, we must assume that the civil servants were even more incompetent than they appear to be.

Mr. Williams: That is an interesting point, because the absent Minister of State had no compunction about trying to pass the blame down the line to his officials, however unconventional that is in terms of normal practices between Ministers and their officials. In answer to question No. 600, the Minister of State said:

"Ministers were not informed."

In answer to question No. 601, he said:

"I am not aware of particular occasions on which Ministers were informed."

In question No. 602, he was asked:

"Do you not find it unbelievable when this sort of financial risk and financial problem was becoming evident that Ministers were not informed? Is that not nearly beyond credence?"

The Minister replied:

"It certainly has proved to be unfortunate."

The Minister has a remarkable flair for understatement. He also seems to have a remarkable flair for inaccuracy or for inadequate memory.

[Mr. Williams]

It is important to remember that evidence was submitted by the permanent secretary which rebutted that claim by the Minister of State. One is bound to ask where Ministers were when that information was coming forward. Do they not read their briefs, or, if they do, can they not understand them? Rip Van Winkle is alive and well and sleeping in the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Perhaps he was in his castle.

Mr. Williams: He may have been in his castle. I suspect that that is where he is tonight and that the drawbridge is up.

The permanent secretary wrote a letter to the Chairman and, through the Chairman, to the Committee in which he rebutted, not once but 15 times, the evidence given by the Minister. On 15 occasions between 1 July 1982 and 24 October 1985, reports and briefs were provided for Ministers. It is interesting to consider how they break down. Eight were provided up to March 1984. That is an important date, and I shall return to it. The other seven reports were provided between June and October 1985. So what happened during the 15 months in between? Why did Ministers not receive any reports? If they say that officials did not send them, in view of what the Secretary of State has said about the alarm before they entered into the agreement and in view of the warnings they had already received in 1983 about the inability to provide information, why on earth did no Minister have the nous to ask? As a Minister, one has only to ask and it will be provided. That is the system, but it seems that it did not occur to anyone. Not one Minister, in one of the most overstocked Departments in Whitehall in terms of Ministers — in numbers not quality — bothered to ask. Someone else will pay up to £600 million as the bill for their failure.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): My right hon. Friend must not overlook the fact that, although 15 papers were sent to Ministers by civil servants, the permanent secretary would not tell the Committee whether there was anything in them. I asked him more than once.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Were they in invisible ink?

Mr. Crowther: They may have been. Whether they were in invisible ink or not probably made little difference to the content. I did not ask the permanent secretary to tell the Committee what information was in the reports because of the confidentiality rule. I did not say, "We want to know what is in them." I said, "Will you simply tell us whether there was any information in them at all?" He replied, "Oh, no. That is not a piece of information that I can give to the Committee. That is confidential."

Mr. Williams: My hon. Friend does not appreciate the fact that Ministers set the tone of a Department. As they were not reading the brief, no one else thought it was necessary. The permanent secretary was not being reticent; he was just reflecting the amount of attention that was shown by his ministerial masters. In answer to question No. 627, it was categorically said that Ministers gave no instructions about reports. Yet they had been informed and warned time and again. What were the Ministers of the day doing? The present chairman of the Conservative party was the Secretary of State at that time. What were they doing when all that was happening, when the entire system was rotting and they should have been aware that it was rotting? The tenor of the evidence that came from Ministers was not to deal with the fundamental questions, but contemptibly and outrageously to attempt to pass the buck down the Department, in most cases to the officials. In breach of the normal practices of Ministers, they apparently have never heard of ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): The right hon. Gentleman has spoken for 20 minutes about Select Committee procedures and ministerial responsibilities. Will he make it clear whether, had there been a Labour Government in 1982 they would have signed that agreement? If they had, how would they have monitored the subsequent events and at what price would they have supported the price of tin? In view of his strident and sarcastic remarks, does he feel that in such a commodity market the Opposition would have coped any better?

Mr. Williams: I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman thinks I am sarcastic; I thought it was just fair comment. If anything, I am being slightly kind to a Department that has been guilty of unprecedented bungling. It is easy for the Opposition to stand here and say that we would not have signed it, but there is no way in which I would have accepted it. I have served in four different Departments and had the responsibility of making and standing by my decisions. I saved Wheal Jane, which is more than the Government did. I am telling hon. Members that I would not have been party to this agreement without adequate safeguards being built in before it was signed.

Mr. Hoyle: Does my right hon. Friend agree with Sir Winston Churchill, that the person who answers a hypothetical question is a bigger fool than the person who asked it?

Mr. Williams: I am not sure, but I shall plead the fifth amendment to that question.

In his opening speech, the Minister went out of his way to say that we could do nothing because we had little support from other member states, yet everything went quiet for 15 months from March 1984. In March 1984 the eighth session of the ITC, took place. The Canadian representative, Mr. Kepper, said:

"The Council, through a series of non-decisions and unwillingness to address essential issues facing it, has in effect given up control of key provisions in the Agreement. Two of these provisions concern the size of the buffer stock and its financing. The Council has effectively allowed the Buffer Stock Manager to redefine the size of the buffer stock through the use of forward transactions."

The Secretary of State implied that the Government became aware of the use of forward transactions much later. In March 1984, not only was this being pointed out, but the Government had what they said they did not have before — an ally. However, they went back to sleep again, deciding to keep a low profile. They not only had an ally, but they had been given a warning of the malpractice — the forward purchasing — of which they suggested in their evidence, they were unaware until much later.

What representations did Department of Trade and Industry Ministers make to other Departments? Did they alert other Departments at ministerial level, never mind at official level? Did anyone from the Department of Trade and Industry talk to anyone at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Treasury or the Bank of England?

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): One wonders whether the Foreign and Commonwealth Office ever talks to the Department of Trade and Industry. Because of the danger of entering into this agreement, when the storm signals must have been hoisted and when no information was forthcoming, I suspect that there must have been other reasons for keeping the agreement going and for the lack of activity. One can only believe that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office was saying, "Do not rock the boat," for other, wider reasons in connection with our relationship with purchaser countries.

Mr. Williams: If the Foreign and Commonwealth Office was saying, "Do not rock the boat," that was more communication between the two Departments than was shown anywhere in the evidence given to the Select Committee. I do not think that the Department of Trade and Industry knows where the Foreign Office is or what it is about, or vice versa. Ministers did not attempt to mobilise other Departments. Did any papers go to Cabinet Committees? Was any attempt made to alert the Government as a whole to the dangers that were present? Did Ministers make any approaches at international level to their counterparts to try to mobilise support? Was it all left to one official, who is now having to carry the can, to have discussions with other officials at a very low level?

Ministers should be ashamed of their record. They are trying to hide, quivering, behind their officials when there is no doubt where the constitutional responsibility lies. Why were no warnings given to those whose money was at risk? The Government, so they thought, were in for only £8 million, in a low-budget operation, and they made it clear that they intended to keep it as low as they could. Others, if we accept the evidence from the City, were in for nearly 100 times as much, yet nothing was done to alert them.

The Department of Trade and Industry's silence and the threat of alerting the other members could have been a sanction used by Ministers against the ITC. If they had gone to the ITC and said, "Unless you come to heel and give us the correct information, we will alert those who are funding the operation"—after all, it was someone else's money—they would have had greater leverage against the ITC. Yet, again, no one asked anyone or discussed anything. Instead, the Government, far from recognising that they are responsible, have tried in their evidence to pretend that they had some form of limited liability under the agreement. Unlike other international agreements in which limited liability clauses exist, no such clause was provided in this agreement. Anyone who has read the evidence would say that there is little doubt that the Government have a moral responsibility, which they should honour.

There is even a question about whether the London Metal Exchange was warned. The Department has changed its position on this. What happened in June 1985? An official said that the Department warned the LME to advise its members. The Department would not have advised them itself, but it suggested that the LME should advise its members that the Government would not stand behind and back any financial losses that occurred.

The chairman of the LME said that that statement was imprecise and worthless. In answer to question No. 877, the Secretary of State said:

"I do not think it was an official warning from the DTI."

Was it an aberration? It think it was the beginning of fear in the Department, the first step in trying to get out from underneath. The Department wanted to have it on record that it had said something. The warm and friendly hand on the shoulder had a blade up its sleeve. The Department was pretending to alert the LME and at the same time to protect itself if the LME later said that it had received no warnings. That is an unbelievable saga of failure and of evasion of responsibility by the Department.

The Department abandoned the bankers and brokers without any misgivings and without any show of conscience. Whether the sum was £160 million or £600 million, it was a devastating blow to the LME. It was also a devastating blow to the credibility of other commodity agreements. What is more, as the report points out, it is an astonishing example to set now, when the debtor nations could take advantage of Britain's precedent and plead that their obligations should be treated in the same way. The Government will say that there are no obligations, but Australia does not agree. The Australian Minister has said that his Government would expect to meet their obligations under the treaty.

Finally, let us come to poor Cornwall, which was ignored until the moment of catastrophe. It is the most innocent party of all in this tragic and avoidable debacle. Cornwall must consider today's debate as a non-event. On 3 June, the Minister of State said that he hoped a decision would be taken on the Rio Tinto-Zinc mine within five or six weeks. That is this week or next week. So why are we having the debate today? Why could we not have it next Monday when the Secretary of State could tell us what he is going to do? Why could we not have the debate on the Monday after that? I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to tell us then what he intends to do. If I were in Cornwall, I should regard the timing of our debate as ominous and disturbing.

We will not accept that the House should go into recess without a full statement about what the Government intend to do for the Cornish mines.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I may be able to help the right hon. Gentleman about the timing. The Minister of State said that he could not tell the House what future price he had assumed for tin while his decision on Rio Tinto-Zinc was outstanding. Clearly, knowing what price he has assumed is crucial to our judgment of the decisions for which the Government have called. By having the debate before the decision on RTZ is made, the Minister of State thinks that he can escape telling us what price he has assumed for tin. He would not be able to escape if the debate had been held after the RTZ decision. I hope that I am wrong, in which case my hon. Friend the Minister of State will tell us what price he has assumed.

Mr. Williams: I am reluctant to intervene in these internal doubts and questioning on the Government Benches. It is remarkable what the incident has done to the confidence of Conservative Back Benchers in their Front Bench. It is clear that the Back-Bench Conservative Members do not know what to trust or whether to trust; they do not know whether they are being conned or evaded. The timing of the debate leads me to think that a massive exercise in evasion is going on.

[Mr. Williams]

In the meantime, Geevor has gone, when it need never have been at risk if Ministers had been alert. The rest of Cornwall's 2,000-year-old industry is at risk, teetering on the edge of a precipice, but the Government are not even willing to tell us what they intend to do or allow us to have the debate when we could discuss their decisions.

The Government seem oblivious to the fact that another 2,500 people may be made unemployed in Cornwall, although the cost of keeping them unemployed will be lower than the cost of keeping them at work. [HON. MEMBERS: "Higher."] I am sorry. The cost of keeping them unemployed will be higher than the cost of keeping them at work.

It is a nonsensical situation. The Government do not seem to care about the import substitution or about the impact that decisions will have on a community as isolated as Cornwall if they go wrong. Instead, the Government passed a begging bowl around the Departments and it came back virtually empty. A feasibility study and £1 million is the Government's offer to Cornwall as a sop for abandoning the county's oldest and most traditional industry.

Let there be no doubt that if the Government abandon the tin industry, Cornwall's communities will be destroyed. The young will leave, the skilled will leave and the decision will be a death sentence to many of Cornwall's communities. That is why I do not understand why we are having our debate before the Government are able to announce their decision.

The Select Committee report reveals an unprecedented and unremitting succession of errors of judgment and failures to perceive the obvious. Ministers should come to the House not just in penitence, but immersed in shame for what the Department of Trade and Industry has done. In the words of the buffer stock manager, the Government gambled with the future of the entire industry. The Government lost the gamble but the industry has been left to pay the bill.

8.4 pm

Mr. David Mudd (Falmouth and Camborne): As I shall be following the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) into the Lobby, I hope that he will forgive me for not following his remarks. I wholly concur with all of them.

About 300 years ago a former MP for Falmouth was fed up with Whitehall because of its cavalier attitude towards Cornwall and the Cornish people. He stormed out of the Chamber and announced his intention of going straight back to Cornwall, where, he said

"I doubt not I shall find a good cause".

Tonight, a vital cause has come from Cornwall to the Chamber of the House of Commons.

Sixteen years ago, in my maiden speech in the House I accused successive British Governments of having created the best developed negative attitude of any nation towards its minerals industry. Tonight I use even stronger language. Despite the smug, camouflaged red-herring language of the motion, I suggest that there is abundant evidence that the Government were initially reluctant to acknowledge the local implications of the growing crisis in world tin, incapable of appreciating the magnitude of that crisis when it broke and unwilling to act as the economic and human holocaust moved onwards through Cornwall. The Government have been impudent, impotent and incompetent.

As applications from Carnon Consolidated, designed to keep 1,000 miners working at South Crofty, Wheal Pendarves and Wheal Jane, are still being considered, I shall say no more about those applications but that I hope that there will be a reversal of the refusal that has already cost 350 jobs and the death of Geevor.

I hope too, that the Department of Trade and Industry is now a little more geared up than it was on the unhappy afternoon of 14 May when I visited it. At that time Geevor was within three weeks of closure and protective notices had been served at the other three mines. When I asked at the meeting on 14 May what commitment the Government would give, I was told that it was hoped "that the uncertainty could be talked through as quickly as possible."

I was told that, although the Government would come to their own conclusions, aid would have to fall within EC criteria. Yet 48 hours earlier, a report from the Community had written off the Cornish tin industry. When I asked the Department for the figures against which the possibility of aid would be considered, I was told that at that time — seven months into the crisis — no projections existed on what bracketing of best and worst possible prices aid would be assessed against.

The tin crisis and the tin industry are unique. The crisis, although it costs jobs in Cornwall, is not locally or even nationally inspired. No blame whatsoever can be levelled against the companies or the unions, or against the management or the men. No other British industry can claim to be wholly dominated by external factors, and no other industry can claim a closer and more consistent collaboration between employers, unions and men in cutting costs and in a constant search to increase efficiency and productivity.

Carnon Consolidated has already cut its break-even cost to just under £6,500 per tonne and will reduce that by another £250 per tonne within the next three months — with the possibility of another £1,000 per tonne off that price if it can get the support that it is seeking from the Department of Trade and Industry. In simple terms, £5,250 per tonne from the Cornish mines would undercut a very significant percentage of worldwide producers. South Crofty and Wheal Jane are already listed in the top 20 world ratings for contained tin.

Is there a world need for tin? If there were not, and if it were not a strategic mineral, the United States and the Soviet Union would not be hell-bent on increasing their stockpiles at the present rate. If there were not a need for tin, a demand for tin and a future for tin, I cannot believe that the Government of Malaysia would be using its Primary Industry Ministry as the banker to provide 6 per cent. loans to cover the difference between production costs and the realisation price of tin.

However, encouraging though it may be to look to the world future of tin, let me paint the House a picture of the record in Cornwall which the Government's motion seeks to conceal. Let me remind the House that that is against a local record of unemployment that has already engulfed one person in four.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State talked about turning attention to "smaller producers". Let us look at the smaller producers. Cornish Tin and Engineering at Tuckingmill developed a tin flotation process that made it possible to extract tin oxide from low grade feed materials. At the turn of the year that enterprise and innovation meant 24 jobs. Now the plant is closed. There are no jobs.

Concord Mineral Processors at Tolgus was on the verge of creating 120 jobs, subject to winning a technical appeal on discharges well out to sea. We shall not now see those jobs.

Just before Christmas Medway Tin at Brea was worth £1 million as a company. It developed a new technology to slash processing costs to be profitable even against a low price of tin. In December 1985 it was worth £1 million and had a direct work force of 35, plus 20 subcontractors. Now there are three in that company, including the managing director. The machinery is useless. There is nothing to process. It cannot be sold because mining equipment cannot be given away these days. For two years, against a prospect of nil activity, the company will continue to have to pay rent on the ground that it operates. From December 1985 to June 1986 the value of the company has fallen from £1 million to zero. Now, day by day, it inexorably slides further into the red.

Even Camborne School of Mines, for generations one of the world's greatest centres of research, development and training in new technologies, could become a phantom centre of excellence and academic promise in a landscape of moribund mineral activity.

Against that reality, we suddenly find the incompetent Department of Trade and Industry coming forward, with a new-found boy scout enthusiasm, with its latest helpful idea—one based on ethos rather than experience. It has come up with the idea that not much would be lost if the pumps were turned off and the mines allowed to flood for possible resurrection at some future date.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): What does the hon. Gentleman expect when three Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry are millionaires?

Mr. Mudd: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I shall not follow him that closely. I am sure that he will reserve his observations for later in the debate.

If it is the considered view of the Department of Trade and Industry that the water can be allowed to rise in the mines to be pumped out one day and that all will be well, I can only assume that Methuselah is alive and well and is now the Department's special consultant.

The fact is that no major Cornish tin mine has ever recovered after flooding. In the tiny minority where reopening was achieved, it was in the olden days when a Cornish pump stood over the shaft and could be reactivated with comparative ease from the surface. Modern electrics and technological equipment are so many fathoms underground that they would be lost for ever were the waters allowed to cover them.

We Cornish people do not cry out for charity. We are too proud, too realistic and too individualistic for that. To us, employment, often at low rates of pay, is a badge of dignity and responsibility. Tear away that badge and there will be grief, disillusionment and anger. There will be the social consequences of drink, violence and broken homes.

The words that I find most appropriate tonight come from the German protestant pastor, the late Martin Niemoller. He summed up eloquently what I am trying to say. He said:

"First, they came for the Jews. I was not a Jew. I was silent. Then they came for the Communists. I was not a Communist. I was silent. Then they came for the trade unionists. I was silent. I was not a trade unionist. Then they came for me . . . There was no one left to speak for me."

In the House there are no Cornish quarrymen, farmers or fishermen, no Cornish shipyard workers and no practising Cornish engineers. We have been silent as their jobs have been taken away. Now "they" are coming for what is left and we in Cornwall look to the House for help and protection before it is too late.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): As a non-practising Cornish engineer, it is particularly appropriate that I should follow the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Mudd).

If those of us who live in Cornwall, and feel, breathe and are a part of the community, were a long way down the other end of the line listening to this debate on the radio or television, we would have found the first hour of it quite remarkable. We have discussed what has happened and the background to it and I make no complaint about that. The one spark of anger, outrage and anguish that the Secretary of State showed—he may have been justified, I do not know—was when he turned on the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop), who attacked an innocent civil servant. I know not the background of the argument. It may well be that the hon. Member for Tiverton was outrageous, but one innocent civil servant was given that level of defence by the Secretary of State.

We are talking here about hundreds of innocent Cornish miners. They are innocent to the point of naivety. They are hundreds of miles away from the origin of the crisis. Yet they have to look to the House to resolve their dilemma because they have no one else to look to.

A great deal was made of whether there have been prophecies regarding the collapse of the international tin price. The irony is that the whole strategy of those running the mines in Cornwall over the past three years has been based on the assumption that the international tin agreement could not survive for a great deal longer. Whether it was Geevor, Crofty, Wheal Jane or Pendarves—all in their own way were spending the profits that they were at that time generating on improving their mines so that they could compete in a free market. I do not believe that any of them expected the collapse to take place as suddenly or as far as it did, but the idea that no one was aware, at least at my end of the industry—I speak positively for my end of the industry in this debate—that a collapse was imminent is simply not so.

Well, we are where we are. Eight and a half months have rolled on and at least two Members of the House have made so many speeches here about tin that it is difficult to think of something else to say.

There is a future for hard rock mining in my county. I cannot help but remember that in 1984, in sheer tonnage, we had the largest output of tin that we have had this century. The international price at the moment, of less than £4,000 per tonne, cannot provide the world with the tin that it wants and requires. Therefore, one can with some confidence predict that the price of tin will increase.

It would be interesting to ask the Minister—clearly the Government must have studied this by now in great depth, since a number of us have been shouting at them for about eight and a half months—what percentage of the current world tin output the Department of Trade and Industry believes is being mined profitably at the current international price. [HON. MEMBERS: "None."] I am willing to give way to the Minister. We have some time. What percentage of the world's tin is being mined at a profit? My friends in Cornwall are more modest than those who say none. They admit that there may be one or two mines somewhere staggering on at those sort of prices, but certainly the figures that I have heard suggest that the figure is less than 5 per cent. of the world's output.

[Mr. David Penhaligon]

Five per cent. of the world's output is currently profitable. Therefore, the international price for tin must increase substantially. I cannot say to the Minister that I know how far or how quickly, but since the Department did not seem to guess that the collapse would be anything like as far or quick as it was, I cannot be blamed for that.

The present mines cannot sustain their position for that much longer and my county wants to know whether the Government are willing to give some money or to provide a building block to re-establish the industry and give it another chance. May I spell out the cost of saying no? It is 1,500 men. By Cornish standards they are well paid, and I make no secret of that. As the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne said, the unemployment rate in the area is about 25 per cent. That is the level all the way from the west of Truro to Land's End. That means there are no other jobs for those men. Perhaps one or two may find work, but they will do that only by dispossessing other people.

Some 1,500 men out of work will cost the Government about £6,000 each a year in loss of tax and supplementary benefits. That gives a total of £9 million a year. Next year they will want another £9 million, because the first year's £9 million will have produced absolutely nothing. I know that the arguments are being presented to the Department of Trade and Industry by the companies that keeping the mines open is considerably cheaper than the costs of the first two or three-year closure. I do not know why a little more encouragement could not be given to the local applicants. It will cost the Government £9 million a year to say no, and of course the nation will inherit nothing.

It is worth spelling out what is produced. The mines produced 5,000 tonnes of tin, 7,000 tonnes of zinc, 750 tonnes of copper and 2·5 tonnes of silver in 1984, the last real mining year. That will be lost for a long time. If a mine floods, there is no law of logic which says that it can never be dried out. One thing that I have learnt in my 12 years as a Member of Parliament is that if one wishes to survive one never says never, but we are getting as near to never as I can possibly imagine.

In an odd way, the difficulties of drying out a mine today are more complex than they were 50 years ago. Clearly we have the technology to make it easier, but when the mine floods one destroys much more valuable equipment than was destroyed some 50 years ago. It will cost Rio Tinto-Zinc, the company that owns these mines, a lot of money to shut them. The one redeeming feature for Cornwall is that we know Rio Tinto-Zinc will not go bankrupt and will not renege on the commitments that the Cornwall mines place upon it. It will cost the company a lot of money to close the Cornish mines. I have heard various figures, but £10 million or £12 million is the sort of money that it will cost. The company is saying to the Government, "Why cannot we use that £12 million as a contribution towards giving the mines another chance, as opposed to giving the mines no future whatever?" That is the argument put to the Minister.

It is quite probable that once again the miners in my county will be willing to make a contribution towards saving their mines. Perhaps "willing" is an adjective that slightly stretches reality, but when the crunch comes, I suspect that the miners in my county will be willing to make a contribution towards saving their mines and their future. There is a commitment from the company and the work force, against whom no criticism can possibly be levied. Are the Goverment willing to put the third leg in the stool? The stool cannot stay up unless it has three legs. Two have been provided, but the Government will need to supply the third.

The Cornish mining industry is not looking for charity. The biggest mining company in my constituency — English Clays, Lovering and Poching, or English China Clays, as it is called now — does not mine tin. To be candid, the English part of the title grates on me, but last year that company made a profit of £75 million. I admit that not all that profit came from the claypits in my constituency, but certainly two thirds of it came from there. Some £50 million must have been generated by mining clay in my county.

All we are asking — I suppose that one has to say that, after eight and a half months, we are begging — the Government to do is to use some of that great tax income that they have had from the mining of china clay in one part of Cornwall to make a contribution towards alleviating the difficulties of miners in another part of Cornwall. It is not inconceivable that in 20 years the argument may be the other way round, because in the long run mining is an up-and-down world.

In his 30-minute speech that opened the debate, the Minister said little that was encouraging. The Minister of State, the hon. Member for City of Chester (Mr. Morrison) will sum up the debate and I hope that he will give us a few more details upon which to make a judgment. When I look at the three Ministers on the Front Bench, I wonder which of them is the poorest and which is nearest to the real poverty that my constituents are about to experience if the final collapse takes place.

Can the Minister give us a couple of sums? What does the Department believe the tin price will be in two years? If the Minister does not have a figure for the price in two years, what about three years? I am an optimist, and if the figures do not fit, I will settle for an estimate of the price in four years' time. The Minister must have a figure in his mind. He must have had a figure before he rejected the application for the Geevor mine. Let us hope the Department did not reject it without at least having some figure in mind upon which to base the rejection of that application.

Let us have a figure of what the Government believe the international tin price will be and a clear assurance from the Minister that after eight and a half months someone will have the courage to tell the House that at least half the £50 million that they were willing to give the tin dealers will be used to save the great historic hard rock mining industry in my county. Without that sort of money, the industry will die and will never be replaced. The history of the community will be destroyed, and in the long run Britain will lose an extremely valuable part of its economy.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) has repeated an inaccuracy and I believe that he knows that it is an inaccuracy. He said that the Government were willing to give £50 million to the tin dealers, but he knows perfectly well that that is not the case. In part at least, that money was to be used to ensure an orderly disposal of this wretched stock of tin that is overhanging the market and has cast such a shadow and brought such devastation to Cornwall. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that that is the position.

I should like to concentrate on the Geevor mine in my constituency, because throughout this crisis it has rightly been my preoccupation. I recognise the wider issues in the debate, but Geevor is my concern and, sadly, right from the outset, it was clear that that was the most vulnerable of all the Cornish mines. It was vulnerable on two grounds: first, because of the geological and mineral nature of the mine, and, secondly, because it was owned by a company that was standing by itself and with its shareholders. It did not have the mighty resources of Rio Tinto-Zinc behind it.

When the people from the media descended in their droves and the television cameras and the newspapers wanted folksy articles, they beat a track to Geevor. We welcomed that, because at least it focused attention on the plight of that mine and the community — that small isolated community of St. Just and Pendeen, just seven miles from Land's End. Apart from Geevor, there is very little else in that area. Now Geevor is to close.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Mudd) is wrong. Geevor is not dead. Geevor is closed. The pumps are still working in Geevor. My concern tonight is to try, with all the power that I can muster, to get it into the heads of my right hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench that those pumps must be kept going. That is what the argument is about. We have gone through the agony of the lay-offs. The day when the last shift came up was one fo the saddest days in Cornish history that any of us can remember. Subsequently Geevor's second application was rejected by the Government and the lay-offs were then converted into redundancies. The anguish and uncertainty of the last few months has caused untold pain.

I pay a willing and genuine tribute to the management and men of Geevor. First I pay tribute to the management, in particular to Mr. Ken Gilbert. At times he is not the easiest of characters, at least in his dealings with Ministers and civil servants. However, his only concern during the long months since 24 October when this crisis first burst upon us has been the future of the mine, the men and the community. The board has not done everything that I should have wished it to do, but it has acted from the very highest motives and from a desire to ensure that the mine survives, if it is at all possible for it to survive.

I felt that I could not criticise my hon. Friend the Minister of State when unfortunately he and the Government rejected Geevor's second application, and I should like to say why. The sum involved was very large. Although I wished that it could have been otherwise, I could not say, with hand on heart, that they were absolutely wrong in rejecting that application. However, what I desperately tried to do and what I shall continue to try to do is find a way through the crisis. I wish, as I have wished many times during the past few months, that the Department of Trade and Industry and Geevor could sit down around the table and that the DTI could say, "That is not on, but we might be able to try this, so let us try to do it this way." Throughout these long months that is what has been missing.

Geevor told me during the past week that if the Government will put up £150,000 — a piffling sum — Geevor, from its own resources — limited, goodness knows, as those are now — and from the activities that it will be able to generate, will keep the pumps going for two years. That is a bargain that the House and the Government should not reject. It is a very small sum, but it would keep hope alive for Geevor and for the community. Above all else, that is what the community of St. Just and Pendeen now want. Reluctantly and with a sense of resignation I believe that they have almost accepted that there will have to be redundancies, grievous though they are, as are the implications of those redundancies. I have already referred to the effect of redundancies on the community.

The vicar of St. Just has unfortunately had to carry a tremendous burden for his parishioners. That has played havoc — I hope temporarily — with his health. That is one example of the kind of stress that has been caused to the community and to the families of everybody who worked at Geevor. This House and the Government owe it to the community to ensure that every means is found to enable the pumps to be kept going for £150,000.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister of State for his patience and for his efforts on behalf of the industry. He has come in for a great deal of unfair criticism tonight. I pay tribute to him for the many occasions upon which he has willingly seen me and everybody from Cornwall and for all the efforts that he has made. However, I am expecting something else from him tonight — £150,000 to keep the pumps going for two years. I do not care much how he does it. If he has trouble with the rules, regulations and officials, let him find another way round the problem. I am sure that if Governments have a will there is a way. I shall listen with the utmost care to my hon. Friend when he winds up the debate. Unless he can show good intentions and offer some hope to Geevor by providing that amount of money, I am afraid that I shall be unable to support the Government tonight in the Lobby.

8.35 pm

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): I listened with a great deal of sympathy to the speech of the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris). I should feel the same sympathy for any hon. Member whose constituency had been so badly let down by a Government of his own party. In due course we shall see which way he votes. I feel that he may have to vote against the Government, because there is not much likelihood of any positive assurance coming out of tonight's debate. If such an assurance were to be given, I think that we should have heard about it at the beginning of this debate.

I am a sponsored member of the Transport and General Workers Union, which represents virtually the whole of the work force in the tin mining industry. I do not believe that Ministers, however much they may protest their innocence, can escape responsibility for the crisis that has now put all those jobs in jeopardy and, in the case of Geevor, has actually destroyed jobs.

[Mr. Stan Crowther]

What makes the social consequences for this industry particularly serious is its geographical location, a matter to which the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) drew our attention. Geography is so much against the area in which these mines are located that there seems to be little possibility of new industry being attracted to it and creating jobs on the kind of scale that would compensate for those that are now being lost. In my area of south Yorkshire, which has the geographical advantage of being in the middle of the country and at the heart of the motorway network and of having full development area status, we cannot attract new industry. The unemployment rate in the Rotherham-Mexborough travel-to-work area is 23 per cent. If my area, with all those advantages, cannot attract jobs, the future for parts of Cornwall is very bleak.

What has happened is nothing short of tragic. One of the points which came out most clearly in the Select Committee inquiry was the amazing dedication of the work force to the industry. It is proud of the industry, it is very knowledgeable about it and it is devoted to it. When representatives of the TGWU gave evidence to the Select Committee, I felt a great sense of personal pride because of the quality of that evidence. I was proud to be a member of the same union. It is wrong that the people they represent, who have made a great contribution to the country and who will do so again, if given a chance, should be placed in such appalling difficulties by the machinations of an international cartel.

After we had produced our report, I was somewhat dismayed to find that, even then, the management of both Geevor and the RTZ mines had still not submitted their proposals for Government assistance to the Department. While members of the Committee, trade unions and local authorities were working hard to try to find a way to save the industry, the management did not produce its own proposals for the consideration of Ministers. I was rather upset by what appeared to me to be their dilatoriness.

Mr. Harris: That is a serious point, but it should be said in defence of the management that its difficulty in framing its applications was the same difficulty of the Government in considering the applications, which was the uncertainty about what was likely to be the future price of tin. I have seen the Geevor applications, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that an enormous amount of work went into them. It was not simply a matter of preparing those applications, as some people think.

Mr. Crowther: I am sure that it is not a simple matter and I would not suggest that it is. However, I still think that the management took rather longer than it should have done.

As has been said, it was an extremely difficult inquiry because of the virtual refusal of the Government — Ministers and civil servants — to give us any information. We could not even discover whether they had any information to give us. We have found out many things since then. This is the first time that I have been involved in an inquiry in a Select Committee where we have discovered a lot more things since we produced the report than we did while we were holding the inquiry. For some reason, the publication of our report and the Government's response to it have stirred up something of a hornet's nest and people are now pouring in information that we did not have before.

It is now crystal clear, as a result of information that has come to light, and that was held back from us before, that there has been a gigantic international fraud. I see no other word for it. It is a fraud in which the conspirators are not shady profiteers and speculators but representatives of supposedly responsible Governments. I find that astonishing. The tin mining industry, the brokers and the creditor banks have all been victims of a confidence trick, and one in which the British Government were either a knowing or unknowing participant. I do not know whether they knew. I find it difficult to believe that those who represented the British Government in the affairs of the International Tin Council were so ignorant that they did not know that a massive fraud was being prepared. I am saying that deliberately, and that is the inescapable conclusion from the information that has come to us.

In their observations on our report, Ministers have said things to us that they did not tell us when giving their evidence. Unfortunately, it appears that at least two of the new things that they have said are not true. For example, they say in paragraph 23 that the Bank of England

"advised the ME . . . that they"—

that is, the brokers—

"should not count on the ITC member governments standing behind the ITC if the Buffer Stock Manager were ever unable to meet his commitments."

The chairman of the London Metal Exchange has told us bluntly that that is not true. He has quoted information that we did not have before from confidential minutes taken at the time to prove that what Ministers have told us in their response is not true. That matter will have to be gone into again.

Supposing that it were true, and the Bank of England, on behalf of the Government, warned the brokers that they "should not count on the ITC member governments"—

which means Her Majesty's Government, along with the others, standing behind the ITC—the ITC consists of its own members because it cannot consist of anybody else—

"if the Buffer Stock Manager were ever unable to meet his commitments."

In other words, if he went into contracts and finished up owing money that he could not pay or he was defrauding the people with whom he was doing business, they should not count on the member Governments to stand behind the ITC.

As I have said, the LME chairman says that that is not true, but if it were true why did the Government say that? The only possible conclusion is that they were already preparing for a fraudulent position to arise. What other implication can there be? They are saying that the Bank of England said to the brokers that if the buffer stock manager had signed contracts with the brokers that he could not honour, and finished up owing million of pounds, the ITC is not to be counted on to do anything about it, although it is his employer. Why should the Government say that, if such a position were not already being planned or at least forecast? We shall need to know about that.

Again, in their response to our report, Ministers claimed that the LME had access to all that was going on and had representatives with the DTI at the ITC meetings. Again, the chairman of the LME simply says that that is not true. I do not like Select Committees being told in Government statements things that are not true, and this will have to be exmined in some depth.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) has already mentioned the rather remarkable statement from the Minister in answer to question 600 when he said that Ministers were not informed about what was going on. However, the civil servant referred to, Mr. Lunn, later on in the same sitting of the Committee said something different. He said that Ministers were frequently informed, especially the Secretary of State. It was difficult for us to discover the true position. It is hard to believe that Ministers did not know what they now tell us the Bank of England knew. If the Bank of England knew it, why did not Ministers know it? These mysteries remain.

When I heard about the debate, I thought that the Government would announce some assistance for RTZ. I thought that they would not have given us a debate in Government time unless they had some goodies to hand out. I now share the fear that has already been expressed that the fact that they have not announced any advantage to RTZ may mean that it will not get any assistance and it will go the same way as Geevor.

Sooner or later, the country must have a Government who will stop this endless running down of British industries, which has gone on for far too long. Sooner or later, we must have a Government who are prepared to adopt policies to stop this pattern. I fear that it will not happen before the next general election but it must happen then because it will be our last chance to be once again a great industrial nation.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): What magnificent speeches we have heard from the men of Cornwall tonight. I was proud to be in the House when they made those speeches, from both sides of the House. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister heard them not for the party politics but for the representations of how people feel about not just the tin industry but all industry and our concern for it.

The report from the Trade and Industry Select Committee was unanimous, and I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to understand that. It came after some careful hearings. When one seeks to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is to make an apt speech that one wants to make. Tonight I do not want to make this speech, but I have to make it.

The Committee made the decision to investigate this matter of its own choice. My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) was instrumental in making sure that we seized on the need to investigate the crisis, but it was my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister who said that the House

"recognises the competence of departmental Select Committees of the House of Commons to consider issues raised." — [Official Report, 15 January 1986; Vol. 89, c. 1090.]

So the endorsement of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is behind this inquiry, as it is behind every other Select Committee inquiry.

It is regrettable that we have seen the time bomb explode. The time bomb was built into the 1982 agreement which should never have been accepted by the Government. With Brazil, China, the United States outside the agreement, it was only a matter of time before it destroyed itself. Indeed, it is remarkable that in the Government's reply to the Select Committee report we were accused of obtaining documents from the United States Government under their freedom of information legislation. Unfortunately, that was not the reason why we got the information. It was because the United States' Government were still on the circulation list of the last tin agreement as nobody had bothered to cross them off. That which is marked confidential in the United Kingdom, is not confidential in the United States.

Difficult problems arise for me when I receive letters such as I have received today from an eminent City banker with a strong record of work and devotion to the Tory cause. He said:

"We are deeply shaken at the change in Her Majesty's Government's position from one of accepting obligations to help aggrieved parties to one of denying all issues, as has been made clear both in the Government's reply to the Select Committee and in private conversations this bank has had with the Government."

I turn to the broad problems facing the Department of Trade and Industry on the eve of the 'big bang'. I am worried that at best the Government's position appears not to be relied on to favour enterprise and a free market. At worst they tell the country that market forces rule and that if one lives to regret it, that is one's loss, whether it be one's job or savings. If that is not the case my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State must demonstrate in this one vital industry that he can rise above the mere dogma which too often appears to be behind Government policy. I cannot believe that the Governments of France, West Germany, Japan and the United States would allow one of their key industries to go to the wall as we are doing.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may say that this is unkind of me, one who has loyally supported the Government for many, many years. I could not believe that they would come to this style of government regarding industry. I have had a lifetime in industry and I now believe that we are sapping the will of business and industry to succeed. This is a test case and we could easily devote limited resources to a cause which is essential to us. We must get tin from somewhere. In 18 months the buffer stock will have been used up. Where will the tin come from? What about import substitution? Are we willing to pay £25 million a year for that? Is it not better to do the sums and look across the the Departments of Health and Social Security, of Employment and of Trade and Industry to analyse how much it will cost in value terms to keep those men in their jobs now? In 18 months we shall need every one of them to help us.

We should not believe that we cannot do anything. The Department of Trade and Industry is supposed to be a Department of enterprise. It is not acceptable that Ministers should have instructed their most senior civil servants—men of considerable ability such as Sir Brian Hayes, the permanent secretary, and Mr. Murray, both of whom have demonstrated their effectiveness—to appear before a Select Committee and not to answer questions. Mr. Murray had to remain silent while flanked by two Ministers who did not rise to defend him, and Sir Brian Hayes said:

"Whether or not I gave advice is advice itself", and therefore would not answer the question. It was a parody of "Yes Minister" and a farce. Indeed, it was less funny than "Yes Minister".

It was not until we concluded our inquiry and people saw the standard of information that we had been given by the Government that information began to fall off the backs of lorries by the skipful. People said that they were fed up with confidentiality which was costing them their jobs and savings, and that they wanted to be heard. It is regrettable that the concept of the "word is my bond" of business and the City must be broken for the truth to emerge.

Indeed, warnings about the tin stock went back to 1982. The position was not new. It was not a case of the Government signing an agreement and telling everyone what the agreement was. One of the documents tells us — I am willing to place this before the Select Committee, if it chooses to reopen the inquiry, as it may do:

"We now learn from ITC documents that, because not all the countries invited to participate in the 6th ITA actually signed the treaty, the normal buffer stock was established at 19,666 tonnes . . . This important fact was never made public."

If it was not made public and people were invited to invest in the agreement, what were the standards to which the Government were working within that agreement? The document continues:

"you might think that the omission to publish that fact was a fraud on those who were engaged in business with the ITC."

I understand that that will be challenged in the courts.

The position was even worse than that. The statistics were manipulated and at best the member states did not understand and at worst, what they understood, they chose to ignore. Another confidential ITC document, the report dated 8 November 1985, which was prepared for the ITC by its auditors, Peat Marwick Mitchell, stated that the existing contracts of the manager were not for about 19,000 tonnes but for more than 63,000 tonnes. Unfortunately, the auditors did not know all the facts and the ITC's total risk position was 120,819 tonnes. That is ludicrous. There were 15 billet-doux or, as my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Sir J. Stradling Thomas) said billet-don'ts. I am delighted that my hon. Friend is doing well after his recent accident and we look forward to welcoming him back. We shall never find out what they said.

One thing is certain—exposure of the Government is much greater than the Government appreciates. What was thought to be £100 million is probably £600 million. One wonders what happened to those billet-douxs and billet don'ts. Miss Edith Jones, an excellent lady who gave evidence to the Committee, was moved from her job. Why was she moved at a critical time when the Government were having trouble with Malaysia on international student fees? That strange country has featured in the newspapers during the past 24 hours most unfortunately. The previous Committee did a great deal to try to remedy the "Buy Britain Last" slogan of Malaysia by publishing a report on Trade in ASEAN. There has also been a battle over Concorde flying rights there. Were we listening to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and not to the Department of Trade and Industry about the international tin agreement? Now we have neither Concorde flights nor an international tin agreement.

On 1 July the Governor of the Bank of England kindly wrote me a letter. I had written to him saying that the Government had told me, properly, that the Bank of England knew all about the matter and that I should ask it. The Governor replied:

"we always work on the assumption that a Committee of the House of Commons will tell us if they want to see us or to receive evidence from us; indeed, we were not aware of any precedent for an organisation like us taking steps to initiate an appearance before a Committee."

I could tell him that the Kerrier district council and the TGWU in Cornwall heard the shouts of tin miners as they marched through the City and that if the Governor had had his window open, he too would have heard the shouts of those miners appealing for help. It is not at all satisfactory that the Government should place the Bank of England — and the Bank of England should seek to place the London Metal Exchange—in a position where it is all their fault but nothing to do with us.

The tin mines of Corwall are a strategic industry for this country. While all recognise that, why did not the Government tell the London Metal Exchange exactly what was going on? The Government's answer is that the LME must have known because two of its members were trotting around with the DTI into all the meetings of the International Tin Council. However, in these documents that keep coming to us in skipfuls, we discover that these two members were required to be there as advisers to the DTI and were not allowed to tell the LME what they heard. Furthermore, when money was mentioned, they were thrown out of the meetings.

Given the Government's reply, my right hon. Friend will understand the scepticism of the Select Committee through the words of hon. Members who have already spoken as well as others who will no doubt do so.

We should listen more clearly to the words of the London Metal Exchange. Mr. Jacques Lion wrote to us on 24 June in a document circulated to the Select Committee and said:

"If the DTI had fully appreciated the situation in June 1985 (and it claims to have done so even earlier) why were there not high level discussions and consultations taking place between the Government, Bank of England, LME and Banks to try to avoid or mitigate this disaster? It is absolutely incredible that the UK Government, with great influence and large resources at its command, simply issued a few delphic warnings and then sat back and waited for the time bomb to explode".

It may be argued, "Well, of course, there are no precedents." But a report on Concorde was published by the predecessor Committee of which I am now Chairman, in 1981-82. Paragraph 265 on page 68 showed that the Government accepted that it was far better to keep 3,000 Concorde workers in work than it was to put them on the dole. The sums were given, and all the arithmetic shows quite clearly that whatever the merits of Concorde, the Government of the day looked across the DHSS, the Department of Employment and the DTI and said that it was better to keep those men in work producing things that other people would need than to put them on the dole.

There were 3,000 of those workers—there are only 2,000 Cornish tin miners. The precedent exists. I hope that the Government will listen. As the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) pointed out, it is cheaper to keep them at work than to throw them on the scrap heaps and slag heaps of Cornwall.

In a case such as this, one might ask what a commercially viable project is. In 18 months the world tin stock will have run out, and more will be required. I regret that tonight I doubt whether the Government will secure my support in the Lobby. But I appeal to my friends in the Government to look again and again at this sad and staggering situation. It goes far beyond the world of tin.

I hope that they will see through the mists of silly secrecy in which this inquiry has been enveloped. They should understand that this House must have the truth from the Government at all times. Ministers must prove that civil servants are not hiding from the truth or from Ministers. The only and essential truth is that Ministers must go from the House and find for us all in Cornwall—in city and country—a method of bringing together the institutions and the people to make a success of the tin enterprise. This is a test case for the Government. They should hear those who are now crying to them, even if they do not support the Government in the Lobby.

9.3 pm

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), who is Chairman of the Select Committee of which I am a member. On both sides of the House so far there seems to be a clear understanding that the Government have not given us all the information that they should have given. Indeed, I go further and say that if the Secretary of State's opening remarks are anything to go by, they have been very shifty. The right hon. Gentleman was either ill-briefed, or he was no more prepared to tell the truth now than he was during the Select Committee inquiry.

An important principle is involved — the work of future Select Committees. It cannot be stressed often enough that we were not after the advice given to Ministers or what they did about it. We wanted the information given to Ministers. That was refused to us, and that is the charge that we make against the Government.

If the Government are not prepared to be influenced by Opposition Members, I hope that they will be influenced by the number of Conservative Members who have said that they cannot support them. Some of them have gone even further and said that they will vote against the Government.

The reality of what we are discussing is known to us all — the crisis that has been created in the tin mining industry — and that reality comes home to us all when we talk about Cornwall. People in Cornwall are being thrown out of their jobs. As we have heard from hon. Members who represent constituencies in Cornwall, these people are suffering.

Why did this crisis happen? We have not received an adequate reply to that question. To find the answer, we must consider the level of the buffer stock. The ITC buffer stock was 30,000 tonnes and that was financed by contributions from member states. Therefore, we start with a basis of 30,000 tonnes. To that must be added 20,000 tonnes financed by the borrowing on the security of tin warrants or on Government guarantees. The total stock should therefore have been 50,000 tonnes. It is evident that that was not the position. It is also clear that nothing was done to correct that position. The council was allowed to make other arrangements to supplement these resources.

We heard in the Select Committee from the Department of Trade and Industry that the Government's contribution amounted to the cost of 19,666 tonnes. I suggest that the arithmetic is wrong. The figures do not add up. When we consider the Government's contribution of 19,666 tonnes, it is evident that 27,700 tonnes were bought from the buffer stock of the fifth international tin agreement. After that, there were only 11,900 tonnes to be bought. This is where the arithmetic does not add up. The buffer stock manager told the economic and public review panel that he had bought on the strength of the contribution for 19,666 tonnes. He therefore exceeded the limitation.

That is only part of the story. We now also know that it is almost certain that the buffer stock manager was not content with that. He was buying far more tin—and this is the important point—than the ITC had funds for. Indeed, 120,000 tonnes was at risk including 50,000 tonnes sold on "unpriced sales". Obviously these stocks were not sold. In the light of that, the buffer stock manager said that the idea of buying only as much tin as there were contributions was both impractical and untenable. However, we know where this folly has led. It has led to the crisis and to some of the good people of Cornwall being put on the scrap heap.

Someone must answer for this. Someone must be responsible. The Government have said tonight that they did not know—we had no means of determining in the Select Committee whether they did or did not know—what was happening, but doubtless they knew about the shortage of subscriptions to the sixth ITA. We have heard that the Ministers did not know about the borrowing and lending activities of the buffer stock manager which I have just described. I find that difficult to believe. The facts that are available show that the possibility that the buffer stock manager was borrowing tin other than on tin warrants without authority from the council was, as the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye has said, suspected as long ago as 1982. It does not add up for the Government to claim that they had no knowledge of what was happening when it was suspected as long ago as 1982. Either the Government did not know what was happening in the Department or they did know and chose to ignore what was happening.

We know that the United Kingdom delegates were told not to press for more information as that might prove counter-productive. The hon. Member for Hastings and Rye has speculated on some of the reasons for that advice. Nevertheless, the information existed, so how can Ministers tell us that they do not know? According to Sir Brian Hayes, the Permanent Secretary to the Department of Trade and Industry, there were 15 reports to Ministers between 1982 and 1985. We do not know what was in them, but we know that they were made. I should have thought that it would have been prudent for the Government to have taken some action on the basis of those reports.

I do not believe that it is any use putting the blame on the London Metal Exchange. The Bank of England's advice was that the LME should not expect the Government to stand behind the International Tin Council if the buffer stock manager was unable to meet his commitments. A Bank of England letter said that, in the event of the buffer stock manager's funds becoming exhausted, it should not be assumed that any Government would step in with additional finance. We now have skip loads of such letters. They are adding to the rubbish that is part of the other clean-up campaign which the Prime Minister has initiated. We heard from the LME that it did not take the Bank of England's advice to mean that the Government would not stand behind the buffer stock manager's current contract. There is something gravely wrong there, and it should have been gone into. We now learn that the LME representatives were not representatives or party to some of the most important decisions.

This is a sorry tale. It will not do for the Government to shelter behind their civil servants, saying that they were given the wrong advice, that they knew nothing or that they should not be blamed because it is just one of those things. That is not the behaviour of a responsible Government. Somebody must accept liability. The Secretary of State did not try to provide any answers. In spite of the Select Committee's difficulties, it is clear that action should have been taken far earlier.

We cannot escape the fact that responsibility must lie with the Government. I am pleased that the Minister for Trade, who should bear responsibility for the dealing with the ITC, is on the Bench. I should like to hear his explanation. We know about the problems in his Department and that there have recently been resignations. I quite understand why it does not want any more, but he is the Minister responsible, and he should give us some explanation about his conduct. Why did he not act? Why did Ministers prevent civil servants from giving the Select Committee the information that it needed?

The Government should take on board the fact that the Select Committee report was accepted by all members of that Committee, Conservative as well as Members of the Opposition. I will go a little further than that. All the Members of the Committee felt that the special report, which was issued after the reply we received from the Department of Trade and Industry, was an inadequate response, had not been thought out and did not answer the queries we put to them. That should be worrying the Government. They should not be taking flippant regard of what the House is expressing tonight — I am not suggesting that they are—because it is serious. We are now facing a House of Commons in which it is said that nobody bears responsibility for this kind of crisis. That is not good enough. Ministers who are responsible should accept that responsibility.

I am sorry that we will not be hearing tonight from the Minister responsible for the civil servants who attended the ITC. I am sure that this is not the end of the matter. It cannot be washed away in this fashion. Sooner or later I hope that we will get the truth about what occurred and the truth as to why no action was taken sooner, why no warnings were given and especially why the tin producers of Cornwall were not warned. I am sure that if such action had been taken something could have been salvaged from the mess we find ourselves in tonight. We are facing the possibility that tin mining might be coming to an end. We cannot allow that to happen. The Government should take some action to help protect Cornish tin mines. Also, some Minister should be prepared to accept responsibility for the mess we find ourselves in.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: If the four hon. Members who are now rising speak for about eight minutes each, I shall be able to call all of them and still leave adequate time for the Minister.

9.17 pm

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Since the buffer stock manager ceased operations seven months ago I have followed developments in the tin industry with growing concern. Important issues of principle are at stake. Apart from the legality of it, which is a matter for the courts, it is totally unacceptable that 22 member states should simply have abandoned the international tin agreement. As the Select Committee said:

"if prosperous countries walk away from their collective debts because of a cloak of immunity, there can be no reason for us to expect poorer nations to pay their debts."

The Government have said in reply that they would be concerned if the failure of the International Tin Council was to be taken as a precedent by any country. Of course it is a precedent. It is a precedent for every country and for every international trade agreement. It is also a thoroughly bad example to set the City of London.

Reading between the lines, I am clear enough about what happened. Before October 1985 all those concerned — the member states, the banks, the brokers and the producers — believed that the council had unlimited liability. If it ceased to trade, it would pay its debts. It was a gilt-edged agreement because sovereign Governments were parties to it. Its debts were sovereign debts.

I am sure that that was a widely held assumption. It was only after October that Governments backed away from it. If they had always taken the view that they had no liability, they should have said so earlier. In that case, the agreement would have been stillborn, for no one would have dealt with the manager. That is why it is so disingenuous of the Government to say that they warned the metal brokers via the Bank of England that they should not count on the member Governments standing behind the Council if the manager were ever unable to meet his commitments, but that they could not have given a similar warning to the banks or the Cornish tin industry because it would have precipitated a crisis and probably the collapse of the buffer stock operation. Had the brokers actually been warned—it is clear that they were not—they would have stopped dealing with the manager at once and the buffer stock operation would have collapsed.

The fact is that the operations of the manager had got completely out of control. He was in breach of the articles of agreement and he was gambling with other people's money. It was double or quits. For a remarkably long period he kept on doubling, even after his stock was exhausted. In the end he quit, leaving a trail of gambling debts behind him.

He was able to get away with it for so long because his operations were secret for good commercial reasons. There was no way in which those dealing with him could know that he was acting so recklessly. Had they known they would simply have stopped dealing with him and the crisis would have been precipitated that much earlier, but they would still have assumed that the council would pay its debts. They would have reached that conclusion after examining the public documents—the agreement itself, the headquarters agreement and the order of 1972. A study of those documents discloses that the council had legal personality, that the council enjoyed immunity from suit, and that the manager had authority to operate the buffer stock operation on behalf of the council.

The council existed under a United Nations treaty with the objective of carrying out the political, social and economic objectives of the member states, which declared their intent to support a minimum price for tin by a buffer stock operation. There was nothing in the agreement that limited the liability of the member states. It was a reasonable assumption that if member states, joined by international treaty, were determined to implement certain objectives, that were largely political, using a buffer stock operation, those member states would ensure that the resources and facilities of the manager were sufficient and adequate to carry out those objectives in a manner consistent with international commercial conduct and accepted international standards of sanctity of contracts.

Article 21 of the sixth agreement provided that the council was to maintain a normal buffer stock of 30,000 tonnes, funded at all times by Government contributions, and an additional buffer stock of 20,000 tonnes, maintained by borrowing. In other words, the paid-up share capital of the council was to be 30,000 tonnes of tin and the maximum borrowing permitted was to be limited to the amount required to purchase 20,000 tonnes. The gearing ratio was established at 3:2. Now we have heard from hon. Members on both sides of the House that, in fact, not only was the permitted buffer stock lower—it was 19,666 tonnes because not all the countries invited to participate in the agreement signed the treaty—but in any case the buffer stock manager easily exceeded the 50,000 tonnes of buffer stock on many occasions in the three years of the agreement.

The situation was made even worse because the member states did not proportionately reduce the borrowing power of the council to maintain the gearing of 3:2, but instead maintained the same borrowing level, which completely distorted the gearing ratios approved by the agreement. From the very outset, therefore, third parties dealing with the council had no idea that the gearing of the council was far worse that that authorised by the agreement. Notwithstanding the limitations imposed by the agreement on the total tonnage of the buffer stock, the buffer stock was allowed to exceed those limits on many occasions during the life of the agreement.

The overall picture of what actually happened discloses a lack of political will in the face of mounting evidence of financial collapse. The member states had to lower the floor price to a more realistic figure or provide the manager with additional resources, or proceed to an orderly closure. As they would do none of those things, in order to carry out the policy imposed upon him by the member states the manager had to resort to questionable trading practices and manipulation of statistics.

In a paper prepared for the European Community working group on commodities in December 1982 by the Department of Trade, there was an analysis of the obligations of the manager and the manner in which those obligations were being evaded or ignored. The paper requested the Community to instruct its spokesmen to put certain questions to the executive chairman of the council at the meeting to be held in December 1982. After describing certain operations conducted by the manager, the paper concluded:

"The manager has no powers to engage in it"—

the transaction—

"since the tin in question will not be tin forming part of the buffer stock and the operations will not constitute a buffer stock operation of a kind authorised under the agreement and he has no authority to purchase tin except for the buffer stock".

At the second meeting of the council, held in London in September 1983, the Australian delegate expressed concern about the "continual reports being received from the buffer stock manager indicating that the situation of buffer stock operations was very delicate and there was even a risk of total collapse".

At that same meeting the manager referred to previous reports in which he had requested the council either to give him new resources by new contributions or to provide resources in other ways. Also at that meeting, the delegate from Norway was reported as having said:

"The manager had time and again warned the council that unless . . . measures were taken, the very existence of the International Tin Council would be threatened."

The report of that meeting also records the fact that by September 1983 eight countries had still not paid outstanding contributions of £12·4 million. It is no wonder that the council was short of capital. That was another fact that was not disclosed to those doing business with the council.

Other examples have been recited during the debate of how, at meetings of the International Tin Council, the position was made entirely clear that the buffer stock manager was continually operating in extremely difficult circumstances. The member states knew that the manager was acting in excess of the authority given in the agreement. There was no attempt to curtail his activities. The member states knew what was happening and they allowed it to continue.

In the interests of time, I shall conclude without reciting the other examples that I had intended to recite which show clearly that the Government knew throughout, from the meetings of the International Tin Council, exactly what the position was. The council documents speak for themselves. All member states knew what the position was. They knew that the manager was exceeding his authority and that he did not have the money to pay his debts. That can mean only one of two things: either the member states knew and accepted that they would have to put up additional financing to meet the obligations of the manager as they fell due, or, alternatively, they knew that they would not or could not put up those funds, in which case the manager and the delegates had participated in fraudulent trading. There is no other answer.

When the manager ceased operations, the Government did try hard to secure agreement on refinancing. Ministers responded with commendable speed to the crisis. On 1 November last year my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) issued a statement in which he declared the objective of the United Kingdom Government to be "to enable all legal commitments outstanding at 29 October 1985 to be met."

The implication was clear. The Government accepted a legal obligation to put up their share of the council's debts. I hope that they will now, once again, take the lead by accepting their responsibility in this regard and pressing other member states to do likewise. The EEC presidency offers an opportunity to take a lead. At a time when the Government are promoting higher standards in the City through the Financial Services Bill, nothing less will do. A precedent has been created and an example must now be set.

Mr. Tim Brinton (Gravesham): I support so much of what my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) has said that I need not speak for long. My constituency is in Kent, not Cornwall. I have listened with admiration to the fluent advocacy of hon. Members from Cornwall making the case for the miners and the mines that are in such peril. A company in my constituency is very important to me. As an employer in my constituency, which has an unemployment rate of 18 per cent., Britannia Refined Metals Ltd., through a wholly owned subsidiary, burnt its fingers considerably. Some hon. Members may feel that those who chance their money are not in the same bracket as miners in Cornwall, but I remind hon. Members that without their money, my constituency will not have so many jobs if that firm fails.

I shall summarise what happened to the company Henry Bath and Son. On 24 October 1985 the company purchased, on behalf of the buffer stock manager, 2,000 tonnes of tin at an average price of £8,680 per tonne. At the LME "ring-out" price of £6,250 per tonne, the company is owed £4·85 million, plus loss of interest, plus costs. If the "ring-out" price is struck down in the course of next year, the debt owed by the ITC to the company will increase by a further £5·14 million, taking today's price for tin of £3,680.

If one were dealing commercially that could be accepted, but as a non-expert in such technical and highly skilled fields I have listened tonight to a story which I, as an amateur, can only describe as a story of carelessness and recklessness. Above all, it is a moral issue. The Government must bear moral responsibility, at least for their part in this disaster.

I am a free market man and I cannot for the life of me imagine why we thought of signing the sixth international tin agreement. It seemed to be outside the Government's perception, but we signed it. Information came and went. I have served on a Select Committee and know of the difficulties sometimes faced in obtaining information. It is clear from what I have heard tonight and what I have read that warnings were given and that the Government, the Department, Ministers, the Bank of England and almost everyone in the City concerned with this matter knew that something was rotten in the state of tin.

On 5 May The Times reported that the British representative at the United Nations, Sir John Thomson, said that it was not right for the United States or the Soviet Union to breach their international obligations by withdrawing part of their contribution to the United Nations budget. He said:

"It is not acceptable or right for the superpowers to set such a poor example."

Those words are appropriate tonight.

9.30 pm

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Three issues are before the House in only a three-hour debate—the fate of Cornish tin, the events leading up to the collapse of the international tin agreement and the Government's activity, or inactivity, and responsibility.

It is all very well for Ministers to say that critical references should not be made to civil servants but, beyond a shadow of doubt, Mr. de Koning, the buffer stock manager, was dealing fraudulently. It was evident to Government representatives that the buffer stock manager was trading outside any authority and beyond his resources. The Select Committee was entitled to know whether that was reported by the Government's representatives, Mrs. Jones and then Mr. Lunn, to Ministers. If Ministers want to exculpate their civil servants, instead of merely saying, "I accept responsibility" — a meaningless utterance — they must tell us whether they were aware that the buffer stock manager was trading fraudulently. Either they were or they were not —there is no third choice.

It is no good Ministers saying that they had 15 reports if those reports merely had the date at the top of the page and stated, "I attended a meeting on behalf of Her Majesty's Government," and were signed either my Mrs. Jones or Mr. Lunn. That is meaningless. The House needs to know whether the civil servants concerned reported to successive Ministers that the buffer stock manager was trading fraudulently and that he was entering into commitments which he had no resources to honour. If a company did that, its directors would go to goal. In doing that, the credit of tin producers was put at risk because they were selling metal at the London Metal Exchange price—the future price. They therefore borrowed money from their banks in the certainty, as they thought, that money for the tonnes of tin sold would be coming in at the LME price.

Mr. de Koning did not undertake his trading secretly. We received ample information, despite the Government's attempts to ensure that we did not, to show that the buffer stock manager was worried about what he was doing. He made sure that the representatives of the 22 signatory Governments, including the United Kingdom — Mrs. Jones and then Mr. Lunn — knew what he was doing. Either those civil servants reported the facts unambiguously to Ministers and ensured that they knew, so that they could take appropriate action or they did not do so. The Select Committee was entitled to be told whether they had done so. This is nothing to do with advice; this is about facts.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to a memorandum. Hon. Members may care to look at the Procedure Committee report and compare that memorandum of guidance with civil servants to the memorandum given to the Select Committee by Sir Richard Barlas, whom many regard as an authority beyond question. Those of us who studied Sir Richard's performance right up to the time when he was Clerk of the House would have no hesitation in preferring his written evidence to that of an anonymous memorandum which does not constrain civil servants.

Moreover, Ministers have ample authority to release their civil servants from any constraints in the interests of a Select Committee, which is reporting to the House, ascertaining true facts, without which Select Committee reports can be misleading and unjust in their criticisms.

Only truth leads to justice. If truth is concealed by a Minister saying, "Only I will answer; I will not permit my civil servants to do so," and then refusing to answer, the House and the Select Committee will be frustrated in getting at the truth.

Many people know little of mineral mines. Some are apparently concentrated within the Department of Trade and Industry. They believe that mines flood with pure water. In fact, they flood with salt water—as in the case of Geevor—and they flood with highly acid water—as in the case of South Crofty, Wheal Jane and Pendarves —which will destroy the entire electrical systems of the mines and even destroy steel rails in next to no time.

There is no question of a mine filling up with water and being pumped out. Inundation renders the levels crumbling and unsafe. It cannot be pumped out so that men can be sent in. The men know that they have an excellent chance of being killed by collapses.

Anyone who goes to Geevor to see the model that shows the labyrinthine levels and the connections between them will appreciate that trying to block them off with concrete plugs, as the most senior placed idiot in the Department of Trade and Industry has recommended, is not a solution. To imagine that the levels can then be unplugged, having filled up with water and been rendered unstable, so that, yo ho ho, in five years' time mining operations can recommence is unrealistic. I wonder whether the people who give that advice would care to undertake such mining operations themselves.

Some mines have been reopened, but there have been hideous losses to human beings — hideous avoidable accidents, including drownings and cavings-in. We do not want that sort of future for Cornish mining.

It may be said that hon. Members on both sides of the House have agreed at various times to the closure of coal mines. Indeed we have, but we are talking now about the whole of Britain's remaining tin production, which is capable of meeting half Britain's needs for tin. We are not talking about closing peripheral areas; we are talking about heavy unemployment in areas of already heavy unemployment.

That is the position in a nut. The Government have a responsibility towards international integrity which they have not discharged. They have a responsibility towards the House which they have not discharged.

The collapse of the ITC was entirely predictable and it was a cartel where consequences were entirely predictable — that it would draw in new producers who were not members of the cartel and encourage tin users to use alternative metals such as aluminium. That is predictable of any cartel that sets out to raise and permanently support the price of whatever commodity is being dealt with above the cost of the marginal entrant or the marginal cost producer. That follows as night follows day. There is not news in that.

The ITC did not cause the collapse of Cornish tin. Cornish tin was due to be in difficulties when the world price of tin fell below the cost of mining it in Cornwall. But the Government could — as they have done with steel and British Leyland, where, incidentally, the Select Committee on Trade and Industry is due to go immediately after the Division tonight — as they are permitted to do under the EEC rules, supply refinancing to lower the cost of production so that which is not presently viable can become viable and sustain itself.

That is why we do not ask that Ministers should have a crystal ball which nobody in the world possesses. We do not ask that they should see the price of tin in three year's time when all the bankers have got rid of their tin warrants which secured the loans that they made to the London Metal Exchange while the ore which gathered at the pit heads and the other sources of production, while international trade was in disarray, is got rid of. That is the other rule of the equation.

What the price will be in three years' time we do not know and we do not expect Ministers to know either. What we do say is that the men will still be unemployed in three years' time. There is nothing else for them to do. It is a reasonable dedication of taxpayers' money to keeping the water out of the mines, including Geevor, and to putting them in a posture where they can move back into profitable production when the world price of tin has stabilised. That is what we ask of the Government.

The latest Geevor request is for only £175,000 to keep the water out for two years — part of the cost will come from the shareholders — and that is the absolute minimum that the Government should do. They should come to an agreement with Rio Tinto to refinance those mines which need reshafting and a considerable amount of other work so that their economic future, and the smelter at Capper pass, which depends on Cornish tin — it cannot use alluvial tin — is assured as well. That the Select Committee recommended after intensive hearings. That it still recommends to the House and it asks the House to assert that that is what the Government should adopt and execute as their policy.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): I regret that so much of the time of the House tonight has been spent on sterile and caustic remarks about the Government's conduct during the tin crisis. Those are most unhelpful remarks, coming mainly from the Opposition, but, I regret, also from some of my hon. Friends.

What does society and the United Kingdom expect of the Government and Ministers in high-risk commodity agreements? Should the business of the House be talking about the minutiae of civil servants, minutes, Ministers and dates instead of about the valiant efforts to establish Newco and to find solutions? I hope that if Select Committees wish to be accepted as credible by hon. Members such as myself they will not get tied up in procedural matters on important occasions such as this on the eternal examination of the bones.

Let us get to the heart of the matter. Tin is a problem to my hon. Friends who represent constituencies in Cornwall, and they honourably put the case for their constituents. I back them in their efforts — [Interruption.] If Opposition Members do not wish to intervene, I wish that they would keep quiet. We are talking about an important matter that affects the life and livelihood of many people. Let us treat the subject seriously and talk not about procedures but about realities. Most people must have realised that after 1982 and the signing of the agreement this was a high-risk matter.

In an intervention I asked the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) what he would have done. He gave a slightly diffuse reply. According to my information, we signed the agreement along with Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, West Germany, Greece, Ireland, India, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Sweden, Switzerland, Australia, Indonesia and many other countries. Let us not say that signing the 1982 agreement was foolish. The world had to have an agreement to control tin and what happened is now a matter of history.

Having signed the agreement, the Government made great efforts to secure reform and to make sure in discussions that those who were party to the agreement were trying to make it clearer and more communicative. There is no point in some hon. Members shaking their heads, because if they had signed the agreement along with all those countries they would have found that it is not just a simple matter of going in and blasting one's way through and making the agreement simple and easy to understand.

[Mr. Iain Mills]

This is a highly complex matter affecting consumers and producers throughout the world, and there are no easy answers. It is a shame that after the problems ensued the highly innovative solution of Newco, about which many of us were briefed in the House by the LME and by Mr. Kestenbaum and others, was not successful.

Credit is due to the Government and to our Ministers for supporting the Newco solution. Nobody has given the Government credit for that and I suggest that it is because most right hon. and hon. Members want to be negative about it. The Government tried to support Newco and had committed themselves to funds for Newco. It was not the fault of the Government that Newco failed: it was the fault of others. As a result of that failure, Cornishmen may lose jobs. I have to tell the House, because no other hon. Member has done so, that people in the City may also lose jobs. I supported Newco and did my best to lobby Ministers, as did some of my hon. Friends.

I pay tribute to hon. Members in all parts of the House who signed the letter jointly with me that we sent to Germany. At one stage, West Germany was not in favour of proceeding with Newco. The ambassador's No. 2, the Baron von Stein, sent me a letter which said that his Government would support Newco. At the end of his letter he said:

"Like most other signatories to the International Tin Agreement, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany takes the view that the member countries are legally not liable for the ITC's obligations."

I wish to ask my hon. Friend the Minister of State a few questions. I do not expect him to answer them tonight, but I should be grateful for a memorandum that would help me to answer questions that are being put to me by those who have expressed an interest in these matters. The Federal Republic of Germany has said that it is not convinced that it has legal responsibilities. I ask my hon. Friend to let me know in writing what are the legal obligations of members of the ITC, including her Majesty's Government, to meet in full the ITC's indebtedness.

What is Her Majesty's Government's view about the request for formal liquidation of the buffer stock, in accordance with article 26 so that the respective portions of the ITC's liabilities falling upon members may be calculated? Do her Majesty's Government distinguish between the failure of ITC members to meet the indebtedness of the ITC and its members and the failure of any other Government to meet their international loan obligations? [Interruption.] I was about to say that the crisis has led directly to the loss of 200 jobs. I am sorry that Opposition Members find that funny or amusing. Their hilarity and criticism is most suspect. I shall be grateful if my hon. Friend is able to say that the Government are willing to consider an innovative approach in order to find a solution to this most difficult crisis.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Morrison): First may I say to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) that there is nothing sinister about the timing of today's debate. He will recall that his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition asked for a debate on several occasions during questions on the business statements. He has rightly reminded me that by the time of the debate I had said that I hoped that I would be able to respond to all the applications relating to Cornish tin mines. I regret as much as he does that it has not been possible to make that response today.

I agree with the Chairman of the Select Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) that there is nothing funny about the events of the past 12 or so months. As my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) said, if we had not signed the 1982 agreement, many of the problems that we are discussing this evening would not have had to be discussed. However, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry explained in his opening speech, for reasons that he gave to the House it was decided at that time that on balance it was best to be part of the agreement. However, that decision did not affect the situation in Cornwall. Indeed, it could be strongly argued that because we were a member of the agreement we had more room for manoeuvre because of the effect of the agreement on Cornwall.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said that no Government could have tried harder to resolve the crisis, once it broke. That is quite correct. My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry sent personal messages to all other members of the agreement asking them to follow our lead. At that time we did everything that we possibly could to try to find a solution. We believed—and the House backed us—that an orderly return to trading in tin was the best way to proceed.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) and my hon. Friends the Members for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Mudd) described the position in Cornwall. The hon. Member for Truro asked me why the Government did not do something immediately the tin agreement collapsed. The answer quite simply is that if we had done something, and subsequent negotiations had been successful, there would have been no need for us to do so. Therefore, we could not proceed until we had had an application and an application did not arrive in the Department until after the final collapse of the tin market.

The House knows that every effort was made to find a solution to the problem of the collapse in the price of tin and at that stage, in November and December of last year and the first two months of this, all our principal efforts were concentrated, although considerable thought was going into the likely impact on the tin mines in Cornwall, to see what we could do to ensure an orderly return to trading in tin.

I have said before that when those efforts failed, immediately our attention turned to see what can be done to help the Cornish tin mines. We have been told in vivid terms of the difficult unemployment situation in Cornwall. We are told that if the mines cannot re-open, what is a difficult situation becomes a very difficult situation, not least because of Cornwall's remoteness. I understand that alternative employment is not easy to find there, and that is why every effort was, and continues to be, made to see what can be done to assist the continuance of tin mining in Cornwall.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives, in whose constituency Geevor is, will recall that it proved impossible to accept the first application. Against considerable difficulties and odds we were prepared to set aside what I agree is only a small amount of money, some £40,000, for care and maintenance so that the second application could be examined. As the House knows, I made a statement a few weeks ago that it was also not possible to accept that application. The reason is that a test of viability needs to be applied. One has to take into account the cost per job and the amount and proportion of taxpayers' money that is going in.

We also examined ways of giving an operating subsidy, but again it was not possible to give one. My hon. Friends the Members for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) and for St. Ives talked about care and maintenance, but this time round we were not able to give an offer for that. However, I am in close contact with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment to see whether something can be done through a Manpower Services Commission scheme, and not on a normal basis. As my hon. Friend also knows, we are prepared to offer a sum of money for a consultant to study the future viability of the mine.

I agree with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne about Carnon Consolidated and RTZ. I should like to be able to make an announcement but, as negotiations are still going on and the sums are substantial, it is not possible to do so at the moment. The right hon. Member for Swansea, West has raised his hand at me. I point out to him that the company has not yet made any point to me about delays. This is the right way to proceed. We shall want to help it as far as we can. The right hon. Gentleman will hear about these things in the normal way, and I was happy to inform the House about Geevor.

This has been a sad and sorry saga. The Government do not accept that they have a legal obligation to pay the debts of the ITC. As there are threats of writs, the House will understand that I cannot elaborate on that point now.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House endorses the Government's response (HC 457) to the Second Report from the Trade and Industry Committee on the Tin Crisis (HC 305-I); regrets the difficulties brought upon the Cornish tin industry, the International Tin Council's creditors and others as a result of the failure of the International Tin Council to reach agreement with its creditors, despite the considerable efforts made by the Government, and welcomes the Government's package of measures to help employment in Cornwall.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Latent Damage Bill [Lords] and the Education (No. 2) Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Orders of the Day

Latent Damage Bill [Lords]

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 1

TIME LIMITS FOR NEGLIGENCE ACTIONS IN RESPECT OF LATENT DAMAGE NOT INVOLVING PERSONAL INJURIES

10.26 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 14 leave out and insert

'any potential plaintiff first had'

'the plaintiff or any person in whom the cause of action was vested before him first had both the knowledge required for bringing an action for damages in respect of the relevant damage and a right to bring such an action.

(5A) in subsection (5) above "the knowledge required for bringing an action for damages in respect of the relevant damage" means'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 2.

The Solicitor-General: On 24 June, in our debates in Committee, I undertook to give further consideration to subsection (5) of new section 14A of the Limitation Act 1980 following expressions of concern raised by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) about the references in that subsection to "any potential plaintiff". That reflected concern about the drafting of the provision rather than its substance. I explained to the Committee that if the Government considered it necessary to clarify the position we would do so. The two amendments fulfil the undertaking that I gave to the Committee.

Amendment No. 1 is the substantial amendment and the other is consequential. The purpose of subsection (5) is to define the starting date for reckoning the three-year time limit from discoverability or, to put it more strictly, from knowledge of the damage. The amendments are intended to remove the doubts expressed in Committee and in another place. They make it clear that the only person whose knowledge is relevant is any person in whom the plaintiff's cause of action was vested before it came to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff himself. I can now reassure the House that, in cases involving multiple plaintiffs, time will not start to run against any particular plaintiff only because another person has discovered separate damage to himself arising out of the same act of negligence. Thus, in the case of a negligently drawn will, for example, the knowledge of one beneficiary that he has suffered damage will not of itself cause time to start running at large against other beneficiaries. Each has his own separate cause of action against the wrongdoer.

I am pleased to tell the House that the Law Society, whose concern about subsection (5) was reflected in speeches made during debates in another place, now considers that the amendments give exactly what is needed to remove a source of potential uncertainty in the Bill.

I am grateful to all those who have drawn attention to a certain lack of clarity, which has proved to be capable of being remedied. The amendments are purely drafting ones. I commend them to the House.

10.30 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): This issue was raised in Committee. I had the opportunity to discuss it with the Solicitor-General the day before the Committee sat. Our fear, as expressed in Committee, was about the drafting of the clause rather than about the Government's intention. I am grateful to the Solicitor-General for coming back with the amendment that he promised us in Committee. It is not a question of the Government's intention. It is a question of the ambiguity of wording. The new clause meets that to everybody's satisfaction.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I add my thanks to the Solicitor-General. The right hon. and learned Gentleman met with alacrity and, I think, enthusiasm, the reservations which he knew were held throughout the Committee on the wording of the clause. In my view, the new clause gives the Bill a clarity which that area of the law has lacked in the past. It is most important that plantiffs should know not only where they stand but who they are. In my view, the new clause helps to achieve that.

Question put and agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 2, in page 2, leave out lines 19 to 23.—[The Solicitor-General.]

Clause 2

PROVISIONS CONSEQUENTIAL ON SECTION 1

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 4, line 19, leave out 'subsection' and insert 'subsections'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to consider the following amendments: No. 10, in page 4, line 20, after '(5)', insert 'Subject to subsection (6) below,'.

No. 11, in line 25, at end insert—

'"(6) Where, in any action to which subsection (1)(b) above applies, the deliberate commission of the breach of duty referred to in subsection (2) above was performed by a servant or agent of the defendant (or any person through whom the defendant claims or his agent), such that the defendant neither knew nor had reason to know of the breach of duty at any time prior to the expiration of the fifteen year period referred to in section 14B of this Act, then section 14B of this Act shall apply to such action, notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (5) above.".

Mr. Thurnham: The amendment concerns deliberate concealment, which we discussed in Committee on 24 June. Hon. Members will notice that Hansard refers to the date of the first sitting as 24 March, which can hardly be correct. As has been said on a number of occasions, the principles of the Bill are laudable. Its shortcomings lie in the proposed manner of implementation. Nowhere is that problem more acute than in the provisions regarding deliberate concealment. Regarding construction work, the provisions are such that, in the majority of cases involving latent defects, the 15-year cut-off will not apply. That is not because the defendant in a construction case has been guilty of some special misconduct; nor do those who support the amendment believe that the Law Reform Committee deliberately set out to victimise the construction industry.

Having studied my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor's responses in the debates in the other place, I feel less sure about his intentions. The Law Reform Committee commented on the matter in paragraph 4.20 of its report and recommended that where there had been the defendant should not benefit by the 15-year cut-off. That lumping together was somewhat misleading, especially with the moral overtones involved, as neither fraud nor mistake is relevant to the Bill, as both would involve quite seperate causes of action.

"fraud, deliberate concealment or mistake"

The only element of relevance is "deliberate concealment". In that respect, I criticise the Law Reform Committee for entering a field where specialist knowledge is required. The definition given of "deliberate concealment" in the 1980 Act is such that most latent defects in construction will, by their very nature, automatically fall into that category. The Law Reform Committee probably did not realise that it was on difficult ground, but what it needed was careful discussion jointly with an engineer, an architect and a lawyer specialising in construction law. The matter could then have been sorted out. Unfortunately, that did not happen. Consequently, we have provisions in the Bill that will render the 15-year cut-off inoperative as regards most latent defects in construction.

Because the Law Reform Committee did not appreciate the practical problems inherent in the concept of deliberate concealment, it saw it only as a moral issue. As it said in its report, it considered that it would be wrong to allow someone to benefit from immoral behaviour that went beyond mere failure to comply with legal obligations. Expressed in those simple terms, its conclusion seems quite reasonable.

The Bill was criticised in that respect in the other place by the noble Lords Hacking and Wilberforce, who adduced careful argument to back the criticism. As in the case of many other matters concerning the Bill, my noble friend the Lord Chancellor did not address the arguments that had been put to him, and they still lie unanswered. I find that frustrating when the arguments were put by a Law Lord of the eminence of Lord Wilberforce, who is a Cross-Bencher and was not representing any outside interests. He was simply offering useful and constructive criticism, based on his wide experience in dealing with such cases. However, reason seems to have little relevance in effecting changes to the Bill.

In Committee in the House the arguments were presented again and were developed in more detail. In this instance, it is fair to say that my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General tried to deal with some of the points and undertook to consider them further. Had the Committee stage continued for two or three sittings, as would have been appropriate in view of the concern expressed in the House over the Bill, instead of being rushed through at great speed for no good reason, sufficient dialogue could probably have developed to enable the matter to be properly considered. Regrettably, however, with this Bill one has to do very much more than convince just my right hon. and learned Friend.

The criticism of the Bill in this respect has two branches —one concerning the drafting and the other a matter of principle, which is related to this. I shall take the drafting point first. Clause 2(2) has the effect of ruling out the 15-year cut-off where there has been deliberate concealment of any fact relative to the plaintiff's right of action. On the fact of it, this seems reasonable, until one finds that the Limitation Act 1980 defines "deliberate concealment" in such a way that the majority of latent defects in construction work by their very nature fall into that category.

In Committee, some 10 examples of latent defects in construction were given to illustrate that point and there is no need to repeat them now. When that matter was brought up on Second Reading by my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman), my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General sought to answer him by saying that the situation would only arise where, in the wording of the 1980 Act, there had been a and that most cases would not be of this category. That answer was opportune because, as I endeavoured to demonstrate in Committee, the situation will be the opposite because most cases of latent defects will arise through an employee not following his instructions. His act or omission will be deliberate and, as a consequence, by the principle of vicarious liability, his employer will be guilty of so-called deliberate concealment and the 15-year cut-off will not apply.

This means that, despite the Lord Chancellor and my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General introducing the Bill as giving a balance between the interests of plaintiffs and defendants and providing a long stop that will bar proceedings after 15 years, it does no such thing — at least it may for solicitors and accountants, but it certainly does not for architects, engineers and contractors. It is a myth. This Bill gives with one hand and takes away with the other. One has to put the question: is this the result that the Government desire?

I turn to the other branch — that of principle. The justification given by the Law Reform Committee for ruling out the benefit of the 15-year cut-off where there had been so-called deliberate concealment was that it would be unconscionable to allow some one to benefit from his immoral behaviour. But what further wrong has the employer done? He knew nothing of the act or omission and, if he had known of it, it is likely that he would have stopped it or had it rectified. What unconscionable thing has he done to lose the benefit of the 15-year cut-off? The answer is that he had done nothing and the Committee's argument just does not apply.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General attempted to give us some comfort at the end of the Committee stage by suggesting that there would be a difficult burden of proof upon the plaintiff to show deliberate concealment. I wish that that were so, but, with all respect to my right hon. and learned Friend, it seems to me that the wording of the 1980 Act plus the normal circumstances of construction work add up to a situation where most latent defects will automatically fall into that category. The Act is too recent for case law to help, and cases based on the earlier Act endorse our misgivings.

It is clear that where a defendant might benefit from the 15-year cut-off, the plaintiff will go for deliberate concealment. I believe that he will have little or no difficulty in establishing this, but, if hon. Members doubt this point, they should consider the litigation that is likely to follow. There will be doubt and argument as to what "deliberate" means in the circumstances of the particular project. Many parties may have been involved, one way or another, with one defect and "deliberate" may apply to some employees and not to others. All this will be 15 years or more after the event, when people have dispersed, records no longer exist and memories are unreliable. As with arguments about the starting date, it reads like a lawyer's benevolent fund.

The proposed amendment was tabled in two alternative forms. The first, which was tabled as amendment No. 9, followed that of Lord Hacking in the other place and was my preferred amendment. It said simply that the provisions of the 1980 Act relating to deliberate concealment should not apply. Amendment No. 11 removes the unfairness that arises through vicarious liability and allows the defendant employer to benefit from the 15-year cut-off where he did not know of the breach of duty.

I snall be pleased to hear what my right hon. and learned Friend can say to help us in this matter. Does he believe that sufficient notice was given to my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, whose duties include the promotion of enterprise and deregulation, of the burdens on business which are implicit in the Bill? Is he familiar with the documents "Lifting the Burden" and published last year, "Building Businesses not Barriers", which was published in May? This Bill has undone much of the good proposed in those White Papers.

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) has expressed well the anxieties of many people about this matter. I have given much thought to the clause, and today I had the good fortune to discuss it with my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor, who satisfied me on several issues. The important point that he made was that the intention of the clause relates entirely to one's own agents and that it does not affect other people's agents. Therefore, it would go a long way towards exonerating other professional advisers from responsibility for the actions and behaviour of the servants of other interested parties. That is a considerable assistance.

I am reassured that inadvertence is not deliberate concealment, and that culpability must be beyond mere inadvertence. If that is the case, we can be reassured that engineers, architects, surveyors and others will not have problems erupting in their faces 10 or 15 years later. The problem is serious, because the contractors who are liable to be carrying out such work seem to go for company reconstruction about once every seven years. If the contractor no longer exists, the plaintiff is likely to look for other possible defendants. In those circumstances, it is natural that the professional advisers who were involved in any such scheme would be extremely worried, not only during their active lives, but during their retirement.

At present, the professional person is insured only for the year for which he pays the insurance premium. That is common in many policies that are approved by professional institutions. In future, professional bodies should ensure, through the insurance market, that it is possible for their members', to obtain insurance to cover subsequent claims on actions that take place during the year of the insurance. If a professional person retires and has to continue to pay for an insurance policy, which might cost about 10 per cent. of turnover, it will be a very heavy burden, particularly if, as I understand is the case after retirement, the cost could not be offset against tax.

It would seem essential that the Government should stress to the professional bodies that they should reappraise insurance arrangements to ensure that such a burden would not descend on people at the time of life when they are least able to cope with it. I understand that even the estate of a deceased professional adviser could be affected and, if the estate had not been settled, his widow could be affected. That could lead to considerable press publicity and would not be a good advertisement for the Bill, which contains a number of definite advantages.

I have been given assurances by the Lord Chancellor, but, bearing in mind the anxieties eloquently outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East, I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General will give us further assurances on this important matter.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I come to the debate without a professional axe to grind, which is something new. I cannot say that I come to it with an open mind, because I heard the arguments thoroughly trawled in Committee.

I have to tell the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) that his arguments are no more impressive now than they were in Committee and that his briefs have not improved with time either. The engineering associations that have been briefing the hon. Gentleman have had since the Committee stage to amend their briefs—it was a grievance in Committee that there had not been enough time for hon. Members to be briefed—yet their arguments have not changed.

We must remind ourselves that we are considering how the law will affect deliberate concealment and whether a 15-year cut-off should advantage a person who is charged with deliberately concealing something that has disadvantaged someone who felt that he had a right to rely on that person's professional competence.

The hon. Member for Bolton, North-East argued in Committee that these cases were difficult in law. That may be so, but that is no reason to say that we should not make laws to deal with difficult cases, which seems to be the broad thrust of the hon. Gentleman's case. He is asking that people standing accused of deliberate concealment should be able to take advantage of a 15-year cut-off. That seems morally unfair.

Deliberate concealment might be difficult to prove in court, but that is what the courts are there for. That is what the case would be all about. A person who has done something that is obviously wrong should not be able to take advantage of a cut-off point. The whole Committee, with the exception of the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East, accepted that argument.

I take exception to the hon. Gentleman's claim that we rushed through the Committee stage. He was supplied—admittedly lately—with copious briefs from all sorts of professional associations that presumably did not have enough confidence in their members to feel that the Bill would not disadvantage them.

Mr. Neil Thorne: Is it not grossly unfair to say that professional associations cannot rely upon the competence of their members? After all, we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) that of the total paid out by way of damages, about 50 per cent. went in lawyers' fees. That is a strange situation, which would suggest to the layman that there were difficult cases to consider but that, nevertheless, the legal profession was benefiting far more than the person who was harmed.

Mr. Brown: Yes. I shall deal in a moment with whether one should resort to litigation. I am arguing at the moment that the option to go to law should be there for the party who feels injured. I shall come to whether the legal profession is the main beneficiary. My remarks about the confidence which professional associations have in their members was meant lightly and I hope that they are taken in that way. That was not a serious charge.

However, I do take exception to the charge that the measure has been rushed through Committee. If the hon. Gentleman had wished to hold the Committee up he had only to read his briefs a little more slowly and he could have kept us there for hours. Indeed, it is not unknown to the House for Members to detain Committees for hour upon hour. The Committee stage was not rushed through; because there was a broad consensus. That is why there was only one sitting. The hon. Gentleman was the only person to object, and he could have made his arguments at length, but he did not want to. His point about rushing through the Committee stage is rhetoric which is only for the record.

There is no more substance in that charge than in the charge that the Law Commission was composed of all lawyers and therefore has "fitted up" the report on which the Bill is closely based in order financially to advantage the legal profession. I asked in Committee how the gap between the 10-year period, wanted by the professional associations for which the hon. Gentleman is speaking, and the 15-year period, which the Law Commission recommended, could enormously advantage the legal profession.

Are we really being asked to believe that a retired Law Lord and other senior members of the legal profession would, when trying to strike a balance between the rights of plaintiff and defendant, somehow adjust the law solely to the financial advantage of lawyers, perhaps in other branches of the profession? The argument borders on the ludicrous. I am not a lawyer, and I do not see it as my role to speak for the profession. As I made clear in Committee, I see it as my role to speak for the consumers of legal services. Yet it is utterly unacceptable, and impossible to substantiate the charge that somehow the Law Commission has deliberately recommended legislation in order to advantage the profession.

Mr. Thurnham: The hon. Gentleman says that he speaks for consumers, but will he accept that the burden of the cost in the Bill will be imposed upon consumers in the prices that they are charged? That is why the construction industry is arguing. The cost here can only be carried by consumers.

Mr. Brown: I accept that these cases are complex and may be expensive, but the hon. Gentleman's remedy is that they should not be heard at all and that advantage can be taken of the longstop. That seems even more unfair than having an expensive law case. I am sorry that it is expensive, but to say that the solution is to have no remedy at all cannot be just, and that is what the hon. Gentleman is advancing.

The hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) spoke of professional people retiring and having the threat of an action hanging over their heads for 10 or 15 years. As he probably realises, the difference between 10 and 15 years is a contentious issue. The Law Commission recommended 15 years as striking a balance between 10 and 20 and the professional associations representing engineering industry said that they would prefer 10. The parliamentary Liberal party has struck a balance between 10 to 15 and has said that it would prefer something between 12 and 13.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Twelve.

Mr. Brown: The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) says 12. The alliance veers towards the employers rather than the plaintiffs.

The House must consider seriously whether it wishes to reject a decision by the Law Commission and substitute something based on no more than splitting the difference or backing up the professional associations against the arguments put on behalf of the consumers. The consumers have rights too, and it worries me that all the arguments advanced from the Government side on Second Reading were on behalf of the professional association. Nobody said a word about the consumers, who would be the plaintiffs in such actions.

We did hear highly dubious and contentious theory that somehow it was not in the consumers' interests that the professions be disadvantaged by this legislation. That was the thrust of the argument, but not one Government Member said that the consumers' point of view is the right one and that the special pleading from the professional associations had to be resisted. No Government Member urged the Solicitor-General to resist that pleading, although the Opposition did.

The matter of professional insurance was raised in Committee, and the hon. Member for Ilford, South raised it in this debate. It is an important question, but why is it much more difficult to get professional insurance for 15 years than for 10 years? Nobody is saying that it is impossible to get it for 10 years. If it can be obtained for 10 years, it can surely be obtained for 15 years. I accept, based on an actuary's calculation, that it would be more expensive, but it is possible. Therefore, the argument rests solely on cost.

Mr. Neil Thorne: The hon. Gentleman has got the situation wrong. I said that when a person retires he gets no tax relief on his premiums. For that reason, the insurance should work in a different way and should be on the basis of when the work was carried out and not on the basis of when the defect is found. I am not arguing that there should not be insurance. There should be, but it should be on a different basis, and at present the professional institutions organise insurance for their members on the basis that it must be continued into retirement. That is wrong.

Mr. Brown: My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) whispers in my ear that, quite rightly, it depends on how the policy is framed. Nobody will be able to take out professional insurance after a cause of action has been discovered. I can see that and I am sure that the hon. Member for Ilford, South can see it. The professional indemnity is known to other professions and is usually arranged through professional associations, or arrangements are made for it. That has to include an indemnity to cover all forms of action which might arise in the period envisaged in law.

Actions can now be pursued in law. I find it difficult to understand that for the first time we are legislating for the concept of a longstop. This should put many retired people's minds at rest. They will know that there will come a time after they have ceased their professional activities when, unless they have done something really wrong, they are beyond the threat of actions of this sort. The Solicitor-General should be thanked for that and it should be welcomed by the profession. Instead of that, it is being resisted.

On Second Reading and in Committee the Opposition welcomed the Bill. We asked the Solicitor-General to resist amendments of the kind that have been moved this evening and that were also moved in Committee. We are grateful to the Solicitor-General for resisting that special pleading and for his even-handedness towards both the consumers and the professions, as the Law Commission asked him to be.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): As there seems to be unanimity of thought on the two Front Benches, I wondered at one time whether the Bill was being presented by the Opposition or by the Government. My hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) and for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) have argued the case tonight very cogently. It was not very latent.

I am distressed by the way in which the Bill is being rushed through the House, compared with what happened in the other place. I have read every word of the proceedings in the other place, and I have been immensely impressed by the legal views that were advanced there. It distresses me that the Bill is being discussed so late in the day. The Committee stage lasted for two hours and it took place after midnight. I tried to obtain a copy of the Committee proceedings, but I did not succeed. It was impossible to obtain a copy from the Vote Office. I was abroad during the Committee proceedings, otherwise I should have liked to be on the Committee.

The Bill has been rushed through this House. The lawyers are trying to push it through, and we shall end up with bad law. [Interruption.] Oh, yes. The House is always packed with lawyers late at night, and somebody must say that the lawyers do not always make good law. The result is that we end up with bad legislation. I said this at Second Reading and I say it again now.

Both Front Benches have said tonight, although it was resisted a little by my hon. Friends on these Back Benches, that the Bill is designed for housebuilding. It will protect house purchasers against contractors who build houses, and I commend it for that reason, but at Second Reading I put it to my right hon. Friend and learned Friend the Solicitor-General that the Bill should not apply to massive contracts for the building of chemical and process plants. That is entirely different from the building of houses.

I must declare an interest at this point. I am a consultant, and have been for many years, to the British Chemical Engineering Contractors Association. (HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] There is nothing "Ah" about that. It is a very interesting profession that makes a great deal of money for this country. There is a great deal at risk. If things go wrong in chemical or process plants, the damages can run into millions or billions of pounds. The contractors therefore need to be protected.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself to the specific amendments that are before the House.

Mr. Crouch: That is always very difficult for me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, at this hour of the night, particularly when I am seeking to make almost a Second Reading speech again, because my last Second Reading speech did not make as heavy an impact as it ought to have done.

Perhaps I have said enough already. It must go on record that the Bill does a good job, as far as it goes, for the housing construction industry, but it should not cover the massive activities of chemical process plant builders. That is an entirely different matter. That is why I sought to catch your eye tonight, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and not to get you on your feet.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): I do not know whether it can be said in truth that the Bill has been rushed through, but I think that there will be some surprise in later years when people look back at the proceedings in this House and find that it was passed after a fairly perfunctory debate. In years to come I believe that the Bill will give rise to very many complications and considerable controversy. I should have welcomed a fuller exchange and more flexibility and movement by the Government in response to many of the submissions.

The case that has been put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) merits far more consideration than has been given to it by the Government and the Opposition.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: We have had this in Committee and other debates. It is one thing for the hon. Gentleman to say that he does not agree with what has been said by the Opposition and Government Front Benches—that is what democracy is all about. It is another thing to say that proper consideration has not been given to the points of view. That point was made in Committee against the Law Commission, and it is now being made against the Opposition Front Bench, and presumably against the Solicitor-General. That is unfair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind the House that we are discussing specific and narrow amendments. We are not on either Second or Third Reading.

Mr. Moate: With respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I was addressing the particular point about deliberate concealment, as the hon. Gentleman was in his intervention. I am not an engineer or an architect, but we have read considerable submissions from people very learned in that sector, who have studied the law in that regard, and to dismiss out of hand, as seems to have been done, their belief that a vast number of construction claims could be described as having been caused by deliberate concealment by an employee, not by the principal, merited considerable concern. For any construction organisation or professional undertaking working today, the possibility of an unlimited time during which it might be held liable presents it with insuperable insurance problems.

On this as on all other amendments, with the exception of the technical amendments that were accepted earlier, and which I did not follow, the Government seem to have made no fundamental concession to the many professional and sincere submissions that have been made to them. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General will reply on this point at greater length.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) has got it fundamentally wrong. Nearly every hon. Member who has spoken on this subject, throughout the debates on Second Reading and in Committee, was representing the interests of the consumer and the producer. The great test to be applied by the House and by the professionals is not the profitability of the contract or profession—that does not apply because most costs can be passed on — but the sheer practicality of legislation such as this. Many hon. Members have got this wrong. They believe that simply by extending the period, with a long stop in this case, they are helping the consumer. This is gesture politics which does not help the consumer. In practical terms it will not help, and it is delusion. We should have paid more attention and respect to those professionals whose job it is to build houses or give people advice because they are concerned with the practicalities.

Something fundamental was missed on Second Reading, and is being missed tonight. The consumer is not the house buyer, to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) referred, or the small man. Over a 15-year period, it is most unlikely that the small consumer or the house buyer will be in a position to sue the original cause of that error. It is most likely that this amendment to the statute of limitation will be used mostly by the big institutions. They will be able to calculate more precisely who caused the error 15 years or more before, if they can adduce wilful concealment.

In this case, the big buyers of products such as chemical plants, Government buildings and the like, are the Government or local government. They will most likely be able to harness the forces of law to prove their case. The big commercial organisations will be the biggest beneficiaries of the Bill if it becomes law. This is important, because if one is trying to protect the consumer who suffers through the purchase of a false product, or a house buyer, one does not look to legislation such as this to do it. One should look to more specific insurance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is addressing himself to a clause in the Bill rather than to the specific amendment. I hope that he will address himself to the amendment.

Mr. Moate: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was also making the mistake of responding to some points made earlier by Opposition Members.

In conclusion, I shall deal with a fundamental point about the practicality because many hon. Members——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot do that. He must address himself to the group of amendments.

Mr. Moate: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the practicality is about these amendments. Many hon. Members have said that one would simply insure against the additional exposure that occurs as a result of the amendment. The amendment seeks to extend the period during which claims can be brought if individuals can be deemed to be guilty of wilful concealment. Often it is not practical to do what those hon. Members suggest because the whole insurance world is endeavouring to move from that type of coverage. In professional indemnity insurance cover is limited to policies under which claims must be made during that particular year. The insurance world is moving away from cover which can take one back over many years to the year in which the error first occurred. In the United States the old "claims occurring" basis is the basis of insurance and that has caused millions of pounds worth of claims today and has virtually caused that type of insurance to dry up.

If we seek to protect the consumer, it is important that we should be practical. Often in this debate we have lost sight of the practicalities. Therefore, I do not think that hon. Members, no matter how sincere, will achieve the objective which they seek.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham), in moving these amendments on deliberate concealment, has provided the House with the opportunity to examine clause 2(2) and its effects, following earlier discussions on Second Reading and in Committee.

The intended effect and the effect of his amendments is to provide a defendant employer with a defence in the form of a time bar in negligence proceedings which arise from his vicarious liability for acts or omissions deliberately committed by an employee or agent so as to keep the plaintiff out of his knowledge of his right of action.

Without transgressing your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I must say a word about the allegation that this part of the Bill has been rushed through. I hope that it was not suggested — I do not think that it was — that I responded in Committee cursorily to the points fully made by my hon. Friend. I was worried that I might have taken rather too long. Although I took a generous time in response to each debate there was still a substantial amount of morning Session to run when our business was concluded. That cannot be laid at the door of the Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) speaks of the Bill being rushed through and attributes it to the fact that lawyers always pack the Benches at this hour. I could see some force in that, were the number of lawyers so great that there was no room for anybody else, but on looking round I see that charge is not substantiated. The truth of the matter is that we have answered every point made, and if they have not been made over an extended period, it perhaps derives from the fact that the House as a whole and the Committee wished to see the recommendations of the Law Reform Committee implemented.

Clause 2(2) has a limited objective. It gives effect to the Committee's recommendation that the long stop should not apply in cases of deliberate concealment or deliberate concealment of a breach of duty. But the long stop will come into play in those cases of latent damage where there has been negligence by inadvertent or careless acts or omissions. That is the crucial distinction between inadvertence on the one hand and the deliberate commission of breach of duty on the other.

11.15 pm

Every point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East was by implication answered by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne). I am grateful to him for his reference to his conversation with the Lord Chancellor, which he said had satisfied him on a number of matters. Those were the matters which my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East dwelt upon in moving these amendments, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South had put his name.

The amendments would permit a defendant to plead the long stop — in other words, 15 years have gone by, therefore the action is time barred — in cases where unbeknown to him his agent had deliberately committed a breach of duty with the intention of putting a plaintiff out of his knowledge of his right of action. Therefore, the defendant would be able to rely on the law of limitation to avoid proceedings in respect of alleged negligence for which a defendant may be held vicariously liable.

The key to this debate lies in whether the House of Commons was or was not right when it passed section 32 of the Limitation Act 1980, because the provision in this Bill does no more than build upon section 32.

The ordinary rule of limitation in relation to actions for negligence is that one has six years in which to bring one's action. But because that was widely perceived to lead to injustice, the House of Commons most recently in section 32(1) said that if:

"any fact relevant to the plaintiff's right of action has been deliberately concealed from him by the defendant . . . the period of limitation shall not begin to run until the plaintiff has discovered the fraud, concealment or mistake".

That is the general rule in the 1980 Act. Parliament went on to legislate in the terms of subsection (2), which provides that:

"deliberate commission of a breach of duty in circumstances in which it is unlikely to be discovered for some time amounts to deliberate concealment of the facts involved in that breach of duty".

If it was right in 1980 to make that provision — which prevents a defendant from relying upon the time bar — how can we possibly justify allowing him to rely upon the new time bar of 15 years, which for the first time is introduced into the law by this Bill? Are we to allow the defendant to take advantage of it, notwithstanding the deliberate commission of a breach of duty which amounts to deliberate concealment of the facts involved? I cannot see how that can be justified.

The interesting thing is that when we consulted upon the recommendations of the Law Reform Committee, very few people indeed suggested that there should be any amendment to the provisions of section 32. That is the answer to this point. Of course I recognise the proper concern of my hon. Friends for the consumer who has to pay more in terms of the cost of additional insurance, but I do not agree that we have been neglectful of the interests of consumers. Time and again the Law Reform Committee and everyone who has spoken in the House has acknowledged that there is a conflict between the interests of the consumer of services, including the consumer of lawyer services — and I stress that point for the benefit of my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury — because lawyers' opinions are caught by this as much as the constructor of some chemical plant.

Mr. Crouch: Like the rest of the House, I am listening to my right hon. and learned Friend because no one can explain these detailed points of law better than he can. However, on the point about the statutory period of limitation as it affects contracts in the process plant industry, where such contracts ensure that the liability of both parties is well defined and that the contractor's liability terminates absolutely — fraud apart — after a determined death defined period, usually of 12 months, after the successful conclusion of a performance test, we are considering a scientific and industrial world where that is the practice. Does my right hon. and learned Friend think that it is wrong that the statutory period is not a statutory period but and agreed period between the contractor and the purchaser or operator of only 12 months? Will that be overridden by the important Bill that we are debating tonight?

The Solicitor-General: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his helpful intervention. However, it is all a matter of contract. It is a matter of what the two parties to an agreement have agreed upon. It is open to parties to extrude their own liability for their own negligence provided that they do so in absolutely explicit terms. They can agree between themselves to limit their liability in terms of time, provided that they do so in the most explicit terms. Where they have not done that, the law has for centuries imposed a period of limitation — and that period has varied over the years — for liability in relation to actions based upon negligence or other breach of duty.

That is the key to the debate. On the one hand, we must take proper care for justice and what we have called the consumer. Equally, the employer must be protected to a reasonable extent from stale claims. I hope therefore that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East believes that I have not dealt summarily with his points. The Committee consulted extremely widely and so has my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East does not seriously mean that reason has had little relevance to the way in which the Government have responded to various amendments to the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South made an important point about insurance and that is a matter for the industry. I am glad that these important matters are now being considered within the industry and with those who advise the industry on insurance matters.

My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) felt that there had been no concessions in the Bill. I had hoped that I demonstrated that I had listened carefully to what was said about the lack of clarity in the Bill and the first two amendments that we have dealt with tonight represent my response to that. That response has been generally welcomed.

There is a good deal more to the concept of vicarious liability than the idea that that is simply a matter of social convenience as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East described it upstairs in Committee. That lies far beyond the law of limitation in negligence cases involving latent defects with which the Bill is concerned.

I believe that the Bill represents a fair balance of the conflicting interests and I urge the House, although it has listened with the usual care to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East on a matter in which he is deeply concerned and experienced, not to accept the amendment.

Mr. Thurnham: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for his courteous and attentive replies both in Committee and on Report. I am not a lawyer and I am advised that some of the issues about which there is doubt will have to be tested in law. Time will pass before these matters are resolved; in other words, we shall have to wait and see. Accordingly, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

No. 13, in page 6, line 11, at end insert—

(a) a person acquires an interest in damaged property in circumstances to which section 3 would apart from this subsection apply; but

(b) the original cause of action accrued more than six years before this Act comes into force;

a cause of action shall not accrue to that person by virtue of subsection (1) of that section unless section 32(1)(b) of the 1980 Act (postponement of limitation period in case of deliberate concealment of relevant facts) would apply to any action founded on the original cause of action.'.—[The Solicitor-General.]

The Solicitor-General: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill is a compromise — that has always been acknowledged — and we have been engaged in the difficult task of striking the right balance. The Bill came before us after having been examined carefully in another place, and it has received clear and careful scrutiny in this place from hon. Members on both sides of the House. The House will be especially grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) for bearing the heat and burden of the day for those with legitimate concerns in construction and other industries. He has been assiduous in drawing our attention to a wide range of problems that is faced by industry and I appreciate his concern. I hope that I have dealt sensibly and fairly with it.

The Bill will ensure, as far as possible, that potential defendants may confidently feel that after a definite period they may regard as finally closed incidents which might have led to claims being made against them. It is understandable that in the course of our debates reference has been made to the problems of insurance. I have taken up those references in what I have said to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne). These matters are currently under review as part of a separate initiative by the Building Economic Development Committee.

Finally, I thank the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) for expressing the Opposition's support for the Bill. That is based, as the hon. Gentleman has made clear, upon their support for the careful consideration and recommendations of the Law Reform Committee.

The Bill will bring about a substantial improvement to our law on the limitation of actions and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Opposition welcome the Bill and wish it a speedy passage on to the statute book. It attempts to strike as fair a balance as can be struck between the interests of plaintiffs and those of defendants. That has been achieved by our efforts and, as I have said, I wish the Bill a speedy passage into law.

Mr. Thurnham: Perhaps my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General will comment on whether the burden that he kindly referred to my carrying through the heat of our proceedings in Committee might have been shared a little earlier with the Government Department which it is intended should lift the burden from business in general.

11.29 pm

Mr. Neil Thorne: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for his unfailing courtesy during our consideration of the Bill, as in all matters with which he deals, and for drawing the attention of the House to the fact that every hon. Member who has contributed to our debates on the Bill has had the interests of the consumer at heart. His acknowledgement of that fact is important, because it is ultimately the consumer who pays the bill. If professional advisers are not forthcoming because they find the burdens too great or because they cannot find adequate insurance, as has happened in certain spheres in the United States over recent years, it is the consumer who suffers. Perhaps on some future occasion it will be necessary to look into whether 15 years or 10 years is the right figure, because I understand that in the European Community there is a figure of 10 years. That is a matter for the future, and I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend and his colleagues will follow that important aspect most carefully.

Mr. Moate: During these proceedings some of us have made specific criticisms and suggestions in relation to the Bill. However, I hope that we will not lose sight of the fact that I and everybody else initially warmly welcomed the Bill in principle and welcome the new precision that is brought into matters that have been somewhat confused by various judgments in past years. Whether it remains precise once the courts have had yet further bites of the cherry remains to be seen.

I should like to address a specific question to my right hon. and learned Friend, and I am sure that, as usual, he will give me a specific answer. Will one of the implications be that henceforth all persons in commerce and Government should keep full records for a 15-year period? If that is so, can he confirm that Government Departments will, in future, keep all records for 15 years?

The Solicitor-General: In answer to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham), I have already confirmed that all relevant Government Departments were apprised of the provisions of the Bill before its introduction by my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor in another place and over a substantial period of years, there has been ample opportunity to comment upon matters that were within the purview of the Law Reform Committee.

The keeping of records is a matter of prudence. I am a humble representative of the smallest Department in Government. Therefore, it is not for me to lay down rules of practice for greater Departments of State than any for which I have responsibility. It is obviously a matter of prudence for those who are responsible for work which may be liable to latent defect.

[The Solicitor-General]

I am not terribly moved by criticism of a provision which, for the first time, brings a long-stop into our law. Under the present law, in theory it is possible for anybody who is responsible for a latent defect in work done for a consumer to be liable indefinitely. The Bill provides a long-stop. After 15 years, red railway signals flash and they prevent the plaintiff's train from leaving the marshalling yard from then on, subject to the one exception concerning concealment which we have already discussed.

This is a benefit to employers and those who are in business. Everything that has been said has tended to suggest that it is some wicked imposition upon them. It is a benefit for which I feel that the Government have had scant credit——

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Not from me.

The Solicitor-General: From Conservative Members then. I am grateful for what has been said and for the care with which is has been expressed. I hope that what I have been able to say in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) will satisfy him, at least for the moment.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Education (No. 2) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

REGULARISATION OF POOLING ARRANGEMENTS

'(1) The Secretary of State shall make proposals, and any necessary consequential regulations required to implement such proposals, to ensure that the ILEA receives financial compensation for the difference between the contributions it has been required to make to the costs of advanced further education on the basis:—

(a) as prescribed by section 6 of the Block Grant (Education Adjustment) (England) Regulations 1984; and

(b) as prescribed by the equivalent regulations for earlier years;

and those that would have been payable for those years had the basis of calculation for those years been that provided for in section 6 of the Block Grant (Education Adjustment) (England) Regulations 1986.

(2) Subsection (1) above has effect in relation to the year 1982-83 or any subsequent year.'. — [Mr. Andrew F. Bennett.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I was told when I started to look at the Bill that it was a simple Bill, that it was non-controversial and that it was merely there to rectify anomalies. I accept that it is non-controversial. However, I do not accept that it is all that simple. What is a little more worrying is that it does not seem to have rectified all the anomalies which exist, especially in the pooling arrangements. For example, the 1981-82 pool has not yet been closed because there is doubt as to whether the Government have the legal powers to do it. In spite of pressure from the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Association of County Councils, the Government are still dithering. Will the Minister tell us whether he intends to deal with that in the House of Lords? It is an example of the way in which some local education authorities have been unfairly left worse off as a result of the pooling arrangements.

The new clause deals with the specific way in which the Inner London education authority has lost out within the pooling arrangements since April 1982. In fact, after quite a lot of pressure from the ILEA, through the various committees that deal with pooling, it finally took action in the courts in 1985 and, of course, it won. In Committee, the Minister said that ILEA had not complained before it took court action. I am sure that he realises now that that was nonsense, and that the ILEA had raised that issue much earlier. I have letters to establish that, but I do not think that I need to read them to the House. I am sure that the Minister will accept that point.

Since then, ILEA has been pressing not only that it should have got the money, which it did get, from the courts but that it should have got money for earlier years. Apparently the Government's argument is that they are not sure about whether they have the legal powers to make those retrospective payments. I hope that the Minister will accept that ILEA has been pressing for some time, and that letters went backwards and forwards between the Department and ILEA as early as 1983. The earlier representation was referred to in the court case, when it came on. Since ILEA was pressing much earlier, it has a strong moral case for some retrospective payment. At least the new clause is an attempt to deal with the problem. The Government do not now have the excuse that there is no legislation. There is legislation before the House now. The Government have the chance to deal with it, and I hope that they will.

I hope that the Government will also make it clear that they will use the Bill to clear up the rest of the pooling problems, particularly the 1981-82 pool, either now by accepting the new clause, or in the House of Lords, where the Government could draft it in a different form but retain the spirit of it. Perhaps by introducing another new clause to deal with the 1981-82 pooling arrangements, they can get rid of all the nagging anomalies in pooling and make good use of the measure.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) has ingeniously raised two points under one new clause, but as I am in a generous mood, I shall deal with both.

The first point concerning the 1981-82 pool. As the hon. Gentleman knows, advanced further education is financed through the AFE capped pool. The Secretary of State determines in advance of each financial year the total of AFE expenditure eligible for pooling. He also decides on how much of that total should be allocated to each local education authority following advice from the National Advisory Body. Exceptionally, in 1981-82, the method used involved the recalculation of the allocations once authorities' actual expenditure on AFE was known. The relevant information is now availble. But in the meantime it has come to light — this is the point that the hon. Gentleman made — that the legislation under which the capped pool is operated may not allow the recalculation to be carried through in the way that was originally envisaged. My Department is therefore examining ways forward in consultation with representatives of the local authorities in the pooling committee.

The hon. Gentleman's point was: why should we not clear up the matter in the Bill? The problem over the 1981-82 AFE capped pool has come to light only recently. The Department put a proposal to the most recent meeting of the pooling committee, which did not find favour with local authority representatives. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was asked to look again, and that consideration is now under way. It may or may not point to a need for new legislation in due course. I hope that the hon. Member will note that. Therefore, it would be premature to seek to cover the point in the Bill. We are seeking much more important changes to pooling legislation — changes that are needed urgently if the pooling system is to continue its function.

In other words, we must decide, first, whether legislation is needed, which is not yet established, and, secondly, whether time will allow that legislation to be appended, as it were, in another place to the Bill. Thirdly, we must beware of doing anything that for the reasons that the hon. Gentleman will be aware of could delay the progress of the Bill. There is a question of urgency which we discussed in Committee.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: It seems to me that it would be possible to take powers to make regulations. I am not a great enthusiast for regulations. The Minister must accept that, in sorting out local government finance in the year 1981-82, there is a certain measure of urgency that we do it within five or six years of the expenditure occurring.

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman is drawing a fine distinction between retrospective urgency and the more pressing urgency today, to which we are all subjected. I hope that he will take notice that we are having discussions on the subject. The real point of the hon. Gentleman's amendment lies elsewhere.

Last year, ILEA obtained judicial review of the decision of my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) not to change, in respect of 1985-86, the formula which apportions contributions to the AFE pools among local education authorities. The Divisional Court ruled that that was an unlawful decision in that my right hon. Friend had had regard to an irrelevant consideration. In recognition of that judgment, my right hon. Friend amended the relevant regulations to produce a new formula with effect from 1985-86. The new formula apportioned the contributions pro rata to the number of AFE students originating from each LEA area. That change had the effect of reducing ILEA's contribution by £31 million in 1985-86, and will have continuing effect. I should note, for completeness, that the new regulations are the Block Grant (Education Adjustment) (England) Regulations 1985, not 1986 as the new clause states.

Last August, ILEA asked the Department to incorporate in the new formula to be applied in 1985-86 an allowance to rectify the injustice which the authority claimed to have suffered over a number of years as a result of the operation of the formula which the court had held to be unlawful. I describe that request in the authority's terms, not my own. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East refused. It has been asserted today that he did so on grounds that he lacked the powers to meet the request. The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish has moved the new clause to provide the necessary powers. However, I tell the House that my right hon. Friend considered ILEA's request carefully at the time. He refused it not only because he lacked the power to accede to it, but because he did not think it right to accede to it.

Let me take the issues of law first. The primary legislation governing the education pools is schedule 10 to the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. The schedule empowers the Secretary of State to make regulations specifying the "appropriate contribution" of each local eduction authority to the pools. The Secretary of State does not enjoy an unfettered discretion to determine what may be appropriate. The principle which the Divisional Court decided should be used in respect of 1985-86 was that the contribution should be related to the demand for AFE which an authority met in the discharge of its statutory responsibility. It is incompatible with that principle to incorporate in the formula a notional assessment relating to earlier years. That is not within the spirit of the court judgment which ILEA prays in aid.

A further objection in law is that schedule 10 envisages the making of regulations to deal with AFE expenditure and contributions thereto year on year. It makes no provision for re-specification of contributions paid in respect of past years. The new clause is intended to change the position, but I ask the House to consider the consequences of a change with the retrospective effect which ILEA desires. First, there would be the technical difficulty — perhaps impossibility — of collecting the data necessary to re-specify contributions originally made on a different basis. Then there would be financial disruption to all other local education authorities as a result of the financial transfers stemming from the revised contributions.

What is the justification for asking other LEAs to put up with this disruption? I doubt whether the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish really means that the Secretary of State should ask them to do so. True, the new clause would put the Secretary of State under a duty to make proposals but he is under a duty also to implement them, apparently irrespective of the views of the parties to whom they are addressed. In all events, the Government must consider the effect on other LEAs, even if the Opposition apparently do not.

The regulations in force in the years before 1985-86 were made in good faith and were laid before Parliament. They were not subject to legal challenge at the time. I should like to clarify what I said in Committee. I meant that the regulations were not challenged during the year when they were in force.

Local authorities, including ILEA, took account of the pooling adjustments due under those regulations in fixing budgets and issuing rates or precepts for the years in question.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will accept that he received a series of letters from ILEA about that point before the court judgment. Surely, he would not expect local authorities to go to court first in such a complicated matter. They would normally make representations first, and only if they did not succeed would they go to court.

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman has answered his own question. I am grateful to him for doing so.

The Government consulted the associations of county councils and of metropolitan authorities on the matter at the time. They were clear that a retrospective refund for ILEA from the pools would disrupt the finances of their members. In the light of their responses, we do not think it right to ask other LEAs to bear this burden, which would amount in total to a loss of about £75 million for all other authorities.

The hon. Member implied that there would be no need to affect other LEAs if the Government made a special payment to ILEA from the Exchequer. But pooling is a system of inter-authority payments and an Exchequer payment of the kind envisaged would be unprecedented. If, as I have argued, there is no justificaton for asking other LEAs to bear this burden, still less would there be justification for imposing such an obligation on the taxpayer.

Clauses 2 to 4 are essentially designed to enable the pooling system to continue to operate in a way that enjoys a consensus of support among local education authorities. The Bill as a whole is uncontentious and the House has treated it as such. It is not a suitable vehicle for enacting provisions which would be highly controversial among those whom they would effect, even if there were a case in principle for doing that.

For those reasons, I ask the House to reject the motion.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I have listened to the Under-Secretary of State with considerable interest. I am not certain that he is being fair to the Inner London education authority. The authority does not get credit for the good educational provision that it makes which benefits other people through the United Kingdom. It seems to have paid an undue proportion. It would have been helpful if the Government had considered a way of compensating it. The Government seem to be more enthusiastic about criticising the ILEA for what is provides rather than about meeting its finances.

I do not believe that it would be appropriate at this stage to press the clause. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave withdrawn.

Mr. Walden: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill deals with two separate topics. In both cases, its provisions are technical and uncontentious. I am grateful for the co-operation of the House in expediting the Bill's progress, and I shall not try hon. Members' patience by reiterating the technicalities and complexities to which the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) referred. I commend the Bill to the House.

11.50 pm

Mr. Robert Rhodes-James (Cambridge): Although I warmly welcome the Bill, I must repeat the point I made in Committee in relation to clause 1(2), which states:

"In making a grant under this section the Secretary of State may impose conditions for any purpose mentioned in subsection (3)"— which are detailed—

"and may also impose such other conditions as he thinks fit."

As I said in Committee, that gives a Secretary of State excessive powers.

My hon. Friend the Minister may say that there are precedents. Many years ago, when I was a Clerk in the House, I was on the Consolidation Bill Committee, which discovered that there was a precedent for the £5 note being illegal. It had been made illegal in 1914 and Parliament had forgotten to repeal the legislation. Millions of people had been illegally trading in £5 notes. This is not a trivial point. Giving powers to any Secretary of State in such terms requires careful consideration. Of course, I shall support this fine Bill, but I ask my hon. Friend the Minister seriously to consider with his colleagues whether, in the future, such powers should be incorporated into any Bill.

Mr. Walden: I am aware from the remarks made in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes-James) and his anxiety about this phrase. In raising this matter, he is demonstrating a characteristic and commendable vigilance in relation to the way in which such phrases are used, and I sympathise with his sensibilities, to the point where I went back to my Department and asked why that wide-ranging phrase was used.

In Committee, I tried to explain that the conditions in question are set out in the financial memoranda mentioned in the Bill. The Department draws up those memoranda in advance of the payment of grant to which they relate in consultation with the bodies concerned and with the agreement of the Treasury. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State needs power to vary the conditions over time, because the circumstances—financial and other—of the grant recipient may change. So, too, may the administrative and financial practices applicable to the expenditure of public funds. But I assure my hon. Friend that the Government do not make arbitrary or retrospective changes in conditions, nor would we alter the financial memoranda without giving the body concerned an opportunity to make representations on the proposed change.

I hope that, with that assurance, my hon. Friend will be content with the clause. I have before me a formidable list of precedents with which I shall not bore the House, save to mention that the Education Act 1944 states that payment by the Secretary of State may be dependent on the fulfilment,

"of such conditions as may be determined by or in accordance with the regulations."

Mr. Rhodes-James: That is different.

Mr. Walden: My hon. Friend says that that is different. I refer him—it will be very much to the forefront of his mind—to section 45 of the Sea Fish Industry Act 1970, concerning the herring industry board, which may make grants,

"subject to such conditions as may be determined."

I hope that I need not continue with the three pages of precedents and that my hon. Friend will be reassured by my remarks.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, notwithstanding the practice of the House as to the intervals between stages of Bills brought in upon Ways and Means Resolutions, more than one stage of the Finance Bill may be taken at any sitting of the House.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Horticulture (Lea Valley)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

11.54 pm

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): I sought this debate to draw attention to a number of important matters that affect the horticulture industry and particularly the glasshouse sector in the Lea Valley in which my constituency lies.

The fortunes of the glasshouse industry have been steadily improving since the disastrous year of 1981 when all commodities in the sector traded very badly. Despite the fact that current trading profits are marginal, significant renovation and rebuilding of glasshouse structures, improvements in the efficient use of fuel and advances in marketing initiatives and co-operation have helped the industry to face the future with increased confidence. Much of that has been the result of enterprise by growers, but I stress that Government grant aid to the industry has also played a significant part.

However, the trading position of growers is getting worse in relation to foreign competition. The figures for penetration of imports are worrying. Between 1976 and 1985, imports of cucumbers and tomatoes nearly doubled and those of lettuces and endives became seven times as great.

The Lea Valley produces 43 per cent. of the United Kingdom's output of cucumbers. Indeed, two thirds of growers' acreage is given over to them and such an increase in imports is bound to damage the industry. Similar figures can be given for imports of carnations, chrysanthemums, roses and other cut flowers.

The biggest worry for growers is the accession of Spain and Portugal to the EC. Although there will be a 10-year transitional period, during which the trade barriers between Spain and the Community will be dismantled, the horticulture industry still feels that it will be at a significant disadvantage at the end of that period. The reasons are obvious. The Spanish industry is far larger, Spain enjoys substantial climatic advantages, so crop heating is not significant, and labour costs are lower.

Ancillary to the problems caused by the enlargement of the EC are the additional arrangements being made with Mediterranean countries outside the EC in respect of imports of horticultural produce into the Community. That adds problems to a situation in which many horticultural products in this country are often in a state of seasonal oversupply.

Two examples illustrate the difficulty. In early April this year, the Community reference price for tomatoes was not published. A large quantity of Canary Islands and other third country tomatoes flooded our market at a time when demand was low owing to exceptionally cold weather and at precisely the time that the United Kingdom grower requires high prices to compensate him for the high energy use that winter and spring necessitate. The high countervailing duties now imposed illustrate the degree to which those imports were undercutting United Kingdom prices. Added to that problem was the fact that there were insufficient Her Majesty's inspectorate staff to ensure that the quality of tomatoes was properly maintained.

Secondly, in the week before St. Valentine's day, such large numbers of flowers were imported from Israel that the market for United Kingdom growers was ruined and it has also been regularly disrupted on other occasions. It was an extreme example of the difficulties faced by growers when imports depress prices to such an extent that those growers cannot compete and stay in business.

The accession of Spain and Portugal to the EC is a fact. There can be no question of trade barriers within the Community. But the industry needs to know what attitude the Government have towards EEC Commission proposals to give further concessions to non-EEC Mediterranean countries. In order to give sufficient protection to Community growers, there should be quantity limits on all products which benefit from tariff concessions and there should be an effective price safeguard for those products not covered by the reference price system.

With regard to the expansion of the EEC, it is worth examining in what ways the industry can be assisted so that when the full impact of the membership of Spain and Portugal is apparent, growers are in the best position to compete.

There are already a number of mechanisms for the support of United Kingdom horticulture. United Kingdom growers voted substantially in favour of a Horticulture Development Council, and I welcome the setting up of the council to finance horticultural research and development. The council will have a majority of grower members—that is only right since it is growers who will pay the levy. It is heartening to see the commitment that growers have shown to the future by investing in research and development. Horticulture is setting an example to the rest of agriculture.

The Government, too, should demonstrate their commitment to the industry's future through publicly funded research, development and advisory activities. The Lea Valley growers very much regretted that the Government did not fully consult the industry before making cuts in ADAS activities such as the recently announced closure of the plant pathology unit and a reduction in other work at the Lea Valley Research Station. They hope that in future there will be close co-operation between the public sector decision takers and the industry—as represented by the National Farmers Union and the Horticulture Development Council—over such matters.

As I mentioned earlier, schemes for grant aid have been a crucial factor encouraging investment in the glasshouse industry over the last five years. Current schemes come to an end in 1988, and while much work has been done, the task of bringing the industry up to date will take much longer. I hope that arrangements to provide grant aid beyond 1988 can be made. I should like to raise one point for consideration within that.

There is a trend towards rationalisation in the industry, as larger operations are more competitive and are better placed to face the future. Given this, the current investment limit, for the purposes of grant, of £136,009 is not appropriate. It is barely enough to rebuild one and a half acres of glass, which is not significant for growers with a larger acreage. I therefore urge the Government to try to persuade other Community members to adopt a more realistic grant ceiling.

Other incentives should be given through the tax system. In the United Kingdom, the depreciation allowance for tax purposes of glasshouses is set at an annual rate of 4 per cent.; for plant and equipment, it is fixed at 25 per cent. The small budget concession that on sale or destruction the remaining value of buildings can be written off is welcome for agriculture, but it is not significant for the glasshouse sector, especially when placed alongside arrangements that exist in competitor countries.

In Holland, the Dutch may write down annually 18 per cent. on glasshouses, 23 per cent. on heating systems, irrigation and other machinery, and 30 per cent. on lighting, CO_2 generators, thermal screens and climate control computers. Those figures give a proper incentive to gear up and modernise, and we would do well to consider something similar. Perhaps this problem can be addressed in conjunction with the discussions between glasshouse manufacturers and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food relating to a new British Standard for glasshouses which will redefine both specifications and the life-span of buildings.

A final point needs to be addressed. With the defeat of the Shops Bill recently, hopes for sensible arrangements for nursery and garden centre trading hours received a severe setback. I need not run through the arguments with which we are all too familiar. Suffice it to say that Sunday is the most important day of the week for garden centres.

Gardening is a major leisure activity, a fundamental part of the modern family Sunday. The enterprise of growers who sell their produce and the so-called inanimate products that go with it such as peat, compost, tools, fencing and other things, should not be stifled under the weight of more contentious arguments. The expansion of the industry, the jobs of those who work in it and the satisfaction and pleasure that their produce bring, all depend upon reform. I hope that the Ministry of Agriculture will give firm backing to any proposal to achieve such reform.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the hon. Gentleman have the consent of the Minister and the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe)?

12.3 am

Sir John Wells (Maidstone): Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall be brief.

I support my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) in all that she has said. She has described her Adjournment debate as being limited to her own constituency, but everything she has touched upon affects horticulture throughout Britain.

Although under the rules of the Adjournment debate we cannot ask for legislation, it is open to Back Benchers to bring in ten-minute Bills or behind-the-Chair Bills and such like under our own steam. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne or some other hon. Member will endeavour to remedy the defects that my hon. Friend spoke about in the last few sentences of her admirable speech.

The present Sunday trading ban is deplorable in its effect on horticulture, because horticulture is suffering from increasing competition from agriculture generally, and all our friends in horticulture are fearful of the pressures coming upon them. It behoves the House as a legislature in whatever sphere of activity it is operating to assist that sector of agriculture that gets minimal support from Government. The people in the industry are not using taxpayers' money but are doing a good job and they need our support.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on her fine speech and on the skilful way in which she brought the glasshouse industry in the Lea valley and the challenges it is facing to the attention the House.

I am also mindful of the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir J. Wells). He was assiduous, as was my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne, in defence and support of horticulture. The Government are, of course, aware of many of the points mentioned by my hon. Friends and I am glad to have this opportunity to explain the Government's attitude to them.

I assure the House that the Government are fully aware of the value of a healthy and prosperous glasshouse industry, both nationally and particularly to the local economy of the Lea valley. Of course, the industry operates within a market economy and the prime determinant of its success is the ability and enterprise of those directly engaged in it. I congratulate the industry on its contribution to our economy, both nationally and in the Lea valley, where it is especially important. While the Government can help in particular ways, I regard our role mainly as one of ensuring that the industry is able to operate in conditions of fair competiton to meet the demands of the market place in terms of both quality and quantity.

I should like to mention some of the specific ways in which the Government provide help to the glasshouse industry. They provide capital grants, the full repayment of excise duty on oil used for glasshouse heating and soil sterilisation, a concession not available to any other sector, a comprehensive programme of research and development and technical advice through ADAS.

In the context of Government aid I should like to dwell a little on capital grant schemes. In our manifesto we made a particular commitment to "help the glasshouse industry to sell more fruit and vegetables, and to make use of the best possible arrangements for heating and insulation".

In November 1983, my right hon. Friend announced that enhanced rates of grant would be available for a limited period to encourage the more efficient use of energy in the glasshouse sector. Such grants cover the replacement or improvement of existing heated glasshouses, including thermal insulation. Grants of up to 50 per cent. are available for this work within an investment ceiling, as my hon. Friend quoted, of up to £136,000. Although grants on machinery and plant and equipment generally were removed at that time, those for boilers and energy-saving equipment for glasshouses and facilities for the market preparation of harvested horticultural produce being sold fresh were retained. The House will be aware that last October new capital grant regulations were introduced to implement the new EC structures directives. Although the general rate is 15 per cent., with an investment ceiling of £50,000, we were very pleased to be able to continue the favourable rates and the ceiling available to horticulture.

We introduced these grants in recognition of the special needs of the glasshouse industry to re-equip itself with modern energy-efficient glasshouses. The situation of our glasshouse industry did improve, as my hon. Friend agreed, but last year I am afraid that it suffered from the poor summer. The demand for salad crops depends very much on the weather, and last year's miserable summer made one more inclined to eat hot-pot than salads. The poor demand led to low prices in 1985; and with the sharp rise in energy costs during the heating season of 1984 it was a poor year and many growers lost money on the crop. This season's growing costs have been reduced by the substantial reduction in oil prices, and with normal market conditions we would expect financial returns to be significantly better. The cool weather up to a few weeks ago gave the growers a poor start, but the great improvement in the last few weeks has made the salad crop very popular. I am sure we all hope that the summer continues to favour that crop, for the growers' sakes as well as for our own.

My hon. Friend mentioned one particular concern of the glasshouse industry: the effect of the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Community. We are mainly concerned here with the beginning and the end of our growers' marketing season for protected crops, when there is an overlap with production in the Iberian peninsula. As my hon. Friend is aware, various measures have been taken to ensure a smooth transition to full membership of the Community for Spain and Portugal. The main element of these measures is an extended transition period of 10 years for fruit and vegetables, as opposed to seven years for most other sectors.

During the first four years of this transition there will be annual reductions of 10 per cent. in tariffs, but the reference price system, which is effectively a minimum import price system, will continue to apply. In the second phase of six years the reference price system will be phased out in six stages. However, I hope that my hon. Friend will draw reassurance from the fact that during this second phase there is provision for what is described as a "supplementary trade mechanism" to be introduced so as to regulate any increase in Spanish and Portuguese exports of fruit and vegetables into the Community to avoid disruption to markets.

Those of us who know the horticulture industry are constantly impressed by the innovation and enterprise shown by our leading growers, and I feel confident that they will meet the challenges of competition from Iberia.

I know, too that some growers are concerned about the negotiations going on in Brussels about the trade agreements with Mediterranean third countries. As the House will know, the Community has close political and economic links with non-member countries in the Mediterranean area. Last year the European Council issued a declaration that the Community would seek to negotiate revisions to the agreements aimed at maintaining traditional trade flows. The discussions going on now are to prepare a revised mandate for the Commission's second round of negotiations with Mediterranean third countries.

I know that some concern has been expressed that these discussions are going on behind closed doors, but I am sure the House will appreciate that details of the Community's negotiating position have to be kept confidential. Nevertheless, my officials have met the NFU to show the way in which the discussions are going and to ensure that we are fully aware of its particular concerns. The point I should like to emphasise most strongly to my hon. Friends is that we have been very mindful of our growers' interests in the negotiations. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State has taken a close personal interest in the progress of these negotiations—as I may say he does in all matters horticultural. At present the negotiations have become bogged down by Spanish demands for special measures to help the Canary Islands. I can assure the House that on this, as on other aspects of the negotiations, we shall take all possible steps to safeguard our growers' position.

I applaud my hon. Friend's support for what the Government regard as a major development in the horticulture industry. I refer to the establishment of the Horticultural Development Council. Less than two weeks ago the order setting up the council received support from both sides of both Houses, and I and my right hon. Friends are delighted that Mr. Frank Thomlinson has agreed to become the first chairman. We are in the process of appointing other members, and we hope that the council will be able to have its first meeting within the next two or three weeks. I wish the council well in the task of commissioning research and development work to benefit the horticultural industry, including the glasshouse sector.

My hon. Friend mentioned the Commission's failure to set a reference price for tomatoes on 1 April. The Commission claims that, because of the Easter holiday, it was unable to have the regulations translated and published in time, and we have left it in no doubt that we are not impressed by its performance. As it happens, the Canary tomatoes that came to the United Kingdom when the reference price should have been in operation were not sold below the reference price levels.

My hon. Friend was concerned about the flower prices in the run-up to St. Valentine's day, and she was right to say that they were poor. The Israeli suppliers were partly to blame, and this was a misjudgement on their part. They have no interest in selling at very low prices, because they have to pay a tariff of 17 per cent.

My hon. Friend was concerned about the changes at the Cheshunt pathology unit. I can assure her that that work will in future be provided from the regional office in Cambridge. There are good communications between these two centres, so the quality and the speed of service will not be affected. The Cheshunt office, although it loses a scientific officer, has three horticultural advisers, who will be retained, and thus the unit will continue to provide a full glasshouse advisory service to growers in the Lea valley.

My hon. Friend referred to the Sunday trading Bill, but she will not expect me to enlarge on that, as the House has defeated the Bill, and it is not for me now to be defending it.

I hope that what I have said goes some way to assuring the House and my hon. Friends about our concern that horticulture in the Lea valley continues and its profitability improves. The hard work and enterprise of those with businesses there certainly deserves success, and I have no hesitation in joining my hon. Friends in wishing them that success.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

School Books

1. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the amount which will be spent in the current financial year upon books in schools; how much this represents per pupil; and if he will take action to assist local authorities to increase this provision.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): Local education authorities and schools decide how much is spent on books. The plans which we published in January were consistent with an expenditure on books of £70 million or £10 per pupil. On 10 June my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced a further £20 million for books and equipment for GCSE courses.

Mr. Hardy: Is the Minister aware that the total shortfall now amounts to more than £5 million a year, that most schools lack sufficient books and that books in use are often out of date? Is he further aware that the older geography books show nothing of the industrial transformation and devastation that has completely altered many local economies, and that pupils are not only hurt by the Government's lack of vision and provision but are demonstrably ill-informed?

Mr. Patten: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman has said. [HON. MEMBERS: "HMI report".] As Opposition Members are shouting about the HMI report, I should remind them that it noted that the inadequate identification by teachers of pupils' educational needs and poor management of resources were more telling factors than the level of capitation.

Mr. Dorrell: Does my hon. Friend agree that recent developments in school management in Cambridgeshire, which offer greater discretion to school heads and governors in the use of resources, represent an interesting way forward? Could not other local education authorities usefully allow their schools more discretion and give heads more ability to decide the priorities that should be attached to the provision of textbooks and other school resources?

Mr. Patten: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I am only sorry that he is not serving on the Education Bill Committee. But, as has been said, it is never too late. If he was serving on it, he would know that clause 25 helps to promote those very activities.

Mr. Freud: Is the Minister aware that yesterday the Minister for the Arts gave a commitment that the library service would remain free? Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it would be very damaging to the public service and to education if parents had to make an input into the provision of books? Will he give an undertaking that that will not occur and that books for education will remain his Department's responsibility?

Mr. Patten: There is no such obligation on parents. I think that there is a question on the library service later on the Order Paper.

Mr. Adley: Does the Department have any policy of ensuring, as far as possible, that school books are published by British publishers? Will my hon. Friend do what he can to ensure that pirated editions of British publishers' books are not allowed into our schools?

Mr. Patten: I will certainly look into what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Radice: Does the Minister accept that the relevant facts are that there has been a reduction in book spending per pupil in primary and secondary schools in each of the past three years? That information was provided by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett). In May HMI warned the Secretary of State about the inadequacy of books provision. In case the Minister has forgotten, that appeared in paragraph 12 of the report. Why does he not simply tell the House this afternoon that the Government will provide extra resources for books in 1987-88?

Mr. Patten: As the hon. Gentleman will know, most schools are given a capitation allowance which covers books and equipment, and they make the choice between spending on books and equipment. The spending per pupil on books and equipment fell by 6 per cent. in primary schools and by 8 per cent. in secondary schools in real terms between 1975 and 1979. Under this Government, spending on books and equipment has increased by 8 per cent. for primary schools and by 5 per cent. for secondary schools. No decision has been taken on local authority spending for 1987-88, but I am sure that the report by HMI will be taken into account.

Polytechnic Courses

2. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of students currently attending polytechnic courses; and how this compares with 1979.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Baker): In 1979 there were 131,000 full-time equivalent students at polytechnics. This had risen by 1984 to just under 171,000: an increase of just over 30 per cent.

Mr. Watts: I thank my right hon. Friend for that most encouraging reply. Does he expect the growth in numbers of technically and technologically skilled students and graduates from polytechnics to continue? Will he take the opportunity to refute the wild allegations that a massive cut in pupil numbers is in prospect?

Mr. Baker: On my hon. Friend's latter point, the Government do not want to see any overall reduction in intakes to polytechnics.

On the question of technology students, I pay tribute to the excellent work of polytechnics in training for professions and careers in technology. For example, at Coventry polytechnic, only one student out of 29 who graduated from the industrial design degree course last summer was still looking for a job in December, while all those who graduated from the combined engineering and languages course obtained jobs.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a fact that the draconian cuts in universities have meant that many highly qualified young people who would otherwise have attended university have had to seek entrance to polytechnics?

Mr. Baker: Not for the first time, the hon. Gentleman has got it wrong. Under this Government there has been an unprecedented increase in the number of full-time students entering univerisities and polytechnics. As I said in the House about a fortnight ago, the total increase is 80,000 full-time students, and nearly 140,000 if one includes part-time students. That is a record of which we can be proud when it is compared with the reduction in the number of students during the period of the Labour Government.

Mr. Michael Morris: If my right hon. Friend wishes to increase the numbers still further, will he examine closely the submission to his Department of an application for polytechnic status by Nene college in Northampton, which, by any yardstick, has achieved the academic requirements for polytechnic status?

Mr. Baker: I shall consider my hon. Friend's request. I hope to visit Northampton and Northamptonshire in the not-too-distant future.

Mr. Fatchett: If the Secretary of State wanted to give a complete picture of what has happened in polytechnics during the past seven years, would he not draw the attention of the House to the fact that the amount of money spent per student has decreased by 25 per cent.? Is that not the real figure that shows the Government's record on polytechnics?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman makes the mistake of thinking that it requires only money to buy good education. The polytechnics have demonstrated that there is considerable scope for greater efficiency, not least by filling previously empty places. Nevertheless, I applaud their success in increasing the student-staff ratio from 8.4:1 in 1979 to 11.5:1 in 1984.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is considerable concern about the funding of polytechnic evening-only degree and postgraduate courses? Will he give personal and careful consideration to the representations that have been made by Professor Burlin, which are set out in a letter dated 3 June 1986, addressed to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, who has responsibility for higher education?

Mr. Baker: Yes, I shall do that. I pay tribute to the family interest of my hon. Friend, whose great, great grandfather started one of the greatest polytechnics in Britain.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Before the Secretary of State becomes too smug and rewrites history, does he recall that it was the Conservative Government who tried to cut the number of students in universities? It was fortunate that local authority control of polytechnics took up the cut in student numbers. Can he tell us what will happen for the following academic year? Will he allow the polytechnics sufficient resources so that they do not have to cut places, or will he insist that there will be a cut of 9,000 places in 1987-88?

Mr. Baker: I am not trying to rewrite history. My hon. Friend's great, great grandfather founded one of our first polytechnics. The talk of 10,000 places being cut that is being bandied around is conjecture based upon hypothesis inflamed by exaggerated anxiety. I cannot announce an expenditure figure until local authority current expenditure is agreed. I hope to be able to give a figure to the National Advisory Board by the end of August. I assure the House that the Government do not want to see an overall reduction in the intake of polytechnics.

Holidays (School Premises)

3. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about his policy on the use of educational establishments during school holidays.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): The use of school premises out of hours is a matter for local decision by authorities and governors. The Government encourage their fuller use by the community where this is practicable and justified.

Mr. Atkinson: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that the commercial potential of school premises and grounds, when they are not being used by pupils, is being exploited fully by education authorities to increase their revenue? Is he aware of the growing number of sports and activity holidays and of the thriving English language school industry, which often need venues of this kind?

Mr. Dunn: Local authorities are empowered to make an economic charge for the services that are provided. The evidence available to me of sports-centred holidays and school facilities is that they are developments that are worth watching. I shall continue to watch how this trend develops and how it can best be promoted.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Does the Minister not yet realise that the concepts enunciated in the village colleges in Cambridge well before the second world war are worthy of consideration now? Does he not recognise their importance to the community, and will he encourage them?

Mr. Dunn: I am not entirely aware of the pre-war development to which the hon. Gentleman refers. The concept of the use by the community of facilities as currently practised in Cambridgeshire — I visited Cambridgeshire a short while ago to see at first hand what it was doing — is to be encouraged and should be undertaken by other local authorities. I trust that in time the Cambridgeshire example will be followed.

Mr. Pawsey: I thank my hon. Friend for his generally helpful reply. Bearing in mind the importance of dual use to many of our communities, will he consider issuing a circular to local authorities so that this activity might be promoted?

Mr Dunn: The promotion of this activity is of great interest to the Government. A circular is one of a number of vehicles available to us. I shall bear my hon. Friend's comments in mind.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the Minister use this occasion to denounce the scheme, published in The Guardian this morning and emanating from the Department of the Environment, that local education authorities will be forced to let out schools to the highest bidder in the holidays, at weekends and in the evenings, and that parents of schoolchildren will be charged at the market rate for extra curricular activity, such as music lessons? Will he denounce this plan immediately?

Mr. Dunn: Before commenting, I should like to see the article to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for handing me a copy. I shall read it in the course of the next few questions.

The purpose of this question is to establish the Government's attitude towards the use of school facilities in the holidays and at other times. I have already said that we welcome the maximisation of the use of facilities at all times by local authorities.

Mathematics and Science

4. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he intends to take to improve recruitment of teachers of mathematics and science.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am working on a range of measures with the education service and with industry. I will publish a consultation document tomorrow.

Mr. Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the most important single cause of our present shortage of mathematics and science teachers lies in the negative attitude to salary differentiation on the part of teachers' union representatives on the Burnham committee over many years? That is the principal reason why our school leavers are now, on average, two years behind their German and Japanese counterparts in mathematical attainment, with all the handicaps that that means for them personally and for our economy. Is my right hon. Friend aware that his determination to grasp the problem and build on the initiatives taken by his predecessor will be greatly welcomed?

Mr. Baker: I shall certainly be building on the initiatives taken by my predecessor. The shortage of mathematics, physics and technology teachers is a grave crisis for our country. It has been arising for a long time. The consultation document that I shall be publishing tomorrow puts forward eight different proposals. I hope that when it has been considered by the education world and by industry there will be even more proposals. One of them is the point that my hon. Friend has addressed, the question of differentials, and whether, as there is a shortage, that should be recognised in the pay. This matter must be addressed by ACAS. I take note of the point made by my hon. Friend in recognising that some differential should be paid to encourage more people to teach in these subjects.

Mr. Dalyell: Is Sir John Mason of the Royal Society right in saying that only 40 or 50 teachers of physics will go into teaching next year? Have the Government, in their preparation of the paper, done any projections for 1992, when a lump of physics and mathematics teachers are due to retire and the number of schools requiring mathematics and physics teachers will begin to increase rather dramatically?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman will see that in the consultation document we set out the number of applications by graduates who want to take courses in teaching physics and maths. I agree that we must find ways of attracting more people into teaching physics and maths. Various ideas have been put forward to involve industry and to try to encourage people who have a mathemathical and tehnological background who want to retire early to come back and possibly teach in our schools. Surrey county council has approached the chambers of commerce and the rotary clubs to see whether they can help in that regard. I also want to involve people who retire from the services early who now have a strong technological background. I have met former officers and non-commissioned officers who are teachers in computer studies. We must explore all methods to attract more people to that area. We must also persuade children, even at the primary school level, to take an interest in these subjects so that there is a steady flow through the educational stream.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: Has my right hon. Friend heard of the scheme known as SMILE — the secondary mathematics individual learning scheme—that is used in inner London schools? Has he seen a recent report in the Daily Telegraph that children taking the CSE examination were asked to estimate the cost of providing food, housing and welfare for the world and to compare that with NATO and Warsaw pact military expenditure? Is that the sort of question that should be asked of children? Is it any surprise that mathematics is at such an appallingly low standard in inner London schools? Is it any surprise that no teacher of calibre can be recruited to those schools?

Mr. Baker: I have seen the examination paper in question, and I deplore the fact that an examination paper appeared in that form. — [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Because it has nothing to do with mathematics; it is all to do with politics. I deplore the fact that politics has been dragged in in that way. I have written to the chairman of the examinations board asking him to look into the matter.

Mr. Freud: We are pleased to hear that the Secretary of State acknowledges that the reasons for the shortage of science-skilled teachers can be found long before the teacher training college stage. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that paying one set of teachers more than another will create divisions in the teacher force? Will he bear in mind the failure of the £1,000 bounty for teachers who were to go into mathematics and science?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman was a little quick in calling it a failure. It is not £1,000, but £1,200, so he is only 20 per cent. out. The bursary to students entering postgraduate teacher training courses from this September is £1,200. I hope that more students will be persuaded to take it up. Pay differentials do operate, recognising merit, quality and responsibility. That may well be a way forward towards recognising the shortages that exist.

Mr. Radice: It is common ground that there is a major crisis of teacher supply in mathematics, physics and technology. I welcome the consultative document which the Secretary of State is to publish tomorrow. In view of the crisis and the need to act swiftly—which I think the right hon. Gentleman acknowledges — should he not now call on industry, which is always rightly asking our schools to raise their standards, to organise an immediate programme of secondment of qualified people to our schools?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman will find that there are various proposals in the consultative document which deeply involve industry. For example, GEC will find work for teachers in its factories for four or five weeks in the year. That is a step forward. The hon. Gentleman speaks of a crisis, but I hope he will recognise that it is not a crisis of the Government's making.

Mr. Sheerman: It is always someone else's fault.

Mr. Baker: In 1977 the Labour Government started a series of incentives, some of which have not worked. Over the past 30 years previous Governments have tried to solve the problem. For example, in the late 1940s some people were let off national service if they decided to teach mathematics and physics. This long-term problem requires urgent action. The document contains many proposals, and I hope that the country will consider them seriously.

Crime Prevention

5. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science to what extent the Education (Grants and Awards) Acts have been used to assist in specific programmes to help education for crime prevention.

Mr. Chris Patten: In the current year education support grants are supporting expenditure by local education authorities of up to £2 million on preventing the misuse of drugs. In 1987-88 they will, in addition, be supporting expenditure of up to £1 million on schemes to promote social responsibility among young people with a view to reducing juvenile crime.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I welcome expenditure in this area of education. Are any of these grants used to discourage vandalism? Are grants available to encourage parental responsibility in respect of this activity? My hon. Friend may be aware—if not, I will send him the details—of a great tragedy in my consitituency where young persons are causing great distress and damage. I believe that education has a role to play in improving the position.

Mr. Patten: I assure my hon. Friend that what we have in mind will include schemes designed to reduce vandalism as well as projects to involve parents. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the guide on best practice in securing education buildings against vandalism, which we have already published, and a study of the subject, which we initiated. We hope that the Education Bill, which strengthens the links between parents and schools, will help in that regard as well.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. Friend consider using the Education (Grants and Awards) Acts to stimulate team games coaching and teaching in all schools? That will give our children a chance to learn cricket, rugger, soccer and other team games which are currently denied them by many Labour authorities. Does my hon. Friend realise that Michael Gatting, who is captaining England at cricket with such distinction, was a product of a London school, and that we shall never see the like of him again if the Labour-controlled London authorities are allowed to continue as they are?

Mr. Patten: Like my hon. Friend, I deplore some of the attitudes of Labour-controlled local education authorities on team games. Like my hon. Friend, I think that there is a strong case for encouraging more coaching of cricket, especially in view of events elsewhere today.

Population Growth Areas

6. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to ensure that adequate education facilities are available in areas of population growth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: It is for the local education authority to ensure that the schools available in its area are sufficient in number, character and equipment.

Mr. Adley: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is he aware that there is a warm welcome in my constituency for his recent decision on the voluntary aided school in Verwood? I am doing nothing less than my duty in thanking him and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the speed with which they acted. However, is he aware that in east Dorset, an area of major population growth, there remain many problems about bussing and so on, which cause distress to many parents? Could he have a word with the Department of the Environment to try to ensure that, when major housing schemes are proposed, for example, under structure plan amendments, there is some input from his Department to see that schools are provided before the huge housing developments take place?

Mr. Dunn: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind words about the recent decision, published on 10 June, to establish a new voluntary aided middle school in Verwood. With regard to my hon. Friend's question about transport, I shall ensure that the comments he has made are drawn to the attention of the appropriate Department.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To what extent is the Department of Education and Science being consulted by the Department of Employment over the review of skill-centres that is currently going on, which arises in part from changes in population? In the event that the Government were to proceed with the stupid decision, or were to proceed down the route of taking a stupid decision to close the Maryport skillcentre in my constituency, may I have an assurance that the Department of Education and Science will object most vigorously, because it will affect education and training provision in west Cumbria?

Mr. Dunn: This question is about adequate education facilities in the context of school places. However, I shall undertake to ensure that the comments the hon. Gentleman has just made are drawn to the attention of the Paymaster General.

Mr. Conway: My hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) was no doubt right, in that it is the responsibility of local education authorities to establish provision, but does my hon. Friend accept that where Governments accelerate population growth, such as in the county of Shropshire, with the establishment and growth of a new town, it is incumbent upon them to ensure that sufficient resources go along with that nationally inspired growth to cope with educational demand?

Mr. Dunn: In deciding upon the distribution of financial resources available to us, we shall continue to give priority to work necessary to meet increased pupil numbers in areas of population growth. That is a guarantee that I can give to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware that in parts of a large city such as Leeds there is population growth but the overall trend is of falling rolls? Will the Minister say whether he favours a single solution for such cities, which in the case of Leeds would involve the reorganisation of all the schools, including one single tertiary college, which has been proposed by the local education authority?

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Gentleman is very seductive in trying to make me pass comment on proposals which have not yet come to the Department for deliberation and adjudication. I can assure him that any comments that he or any other Member from the city of Leeds cares to make about any proposals which may come my way will be borne in mind.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: A number of hon. Members are concerned about the amount of sports field provision within education and are deeply anxious that many sports fields are being sold off. Bearing in mind the shortage of sports field facilities in many parts of the country, does my hon. Friend not feel that it would be sensible to look at this seriously so that, before land currently used to provide sporting facilities is sold off for other purposes, the overall physical recreation requirements of all areas are properly investigated?

Mr. Dunn: School playing fields are protected by the appropriate regulations. I have just written to my hon. Friend on that very subject.

Royal Greenwich Observatory

7. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about the Science and Engineering Research Council decision to transfer the Royal Greenwich Observatory to Cambridge.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): Since the council meeting on 18 June my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have received 22 letters commenting on the decision to transfer the RGO to Cambridge.

Mr. Lloyd: Has the Minister seen the editorial in the latest edition of Nature, which surmises that the decision to refuse to transfer the Royal Greenwich Observatory to Manchester seemed to be justified by a desire to please the staff at the RGO, who felt that living north of the River Trent would be uncomfortable and a little bit like living in a foreign country? Does the Minister accept that nobody — not only those in the north of England — believes that the decision was made on technical grounds, but was simply to please the Oxbridge mafiosi? Will the hon. Gentleman now agree to publish the reports leading up to the decision so that at least he can absolve himself of the charge that he is pandering to that mafiosi?

Mr. Walden: Such decisions on scientific grounds are taken by the research councils that are appointed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to make precisely that sort of decision.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Is my hon. Friend aware that both the Royal Society and the Royal Astronomical Society have advised the SERC to leave the Royal Greenwich Observatory at Herstmonceux? Is he further aware that the chairman of the SERC said in March that the cost of the move would be £3·5 million, and now he is saying that it will cost £6 million? Will my hon. Friend examine the proposal carefully and critically, and particularly the financial reasoning that underlies it?

Mr. Walden: I can only repeat to my hon. Friend what I have just said in reply, to the first question. Those decisions are taken on scientific grounds, by people who are appointed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to take them. However, I should like to add that I am well aware of the uncertainty and, perhaps, the disruption that will be caused to the lives of some of my hon. Friend's constituents. As he knows, the SERC is anxious to do whatever it can to help in that regard.

Mr. Faulds: Is the hon. Gentleman not aware that there is widespread and near total opposition—[Interruption.] I will get on when people shut up and let people be heard——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I can hear the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Faulds: For the benefit of these loons, I will repeat the question. Is the hon. Gentleman unaware that there is widespread and near total opposition to the move from Herstmonceux by those in the astronomical world who actually know something about this problem, unlike the majority of the members of the SERC? Will the hon. Gentleman get his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to review this decision before the damaging implications become too obvious?

Mr. Walden: I am not aware of near total opposition to the decision. What I am aware of, as in any such decision, is very healthy and natural public discussion and public dissent.

Mr. Silvester: Will my hon. Friend make it clear, because it is not altogether clear from his answers, whether he is simply taking the decision of the SERC at face value, or reviewing it? If he is reviewing it, will he make sure that before the review he publishes the facts on which the council's decision and statement are based, particularly in respect of the Herschel development?

Mr. Walden: The position is as follows. The council is required to seek my right hon. Friend's approval to the capital expenditure at Cambridge, and through him, the Treasury, for the retention of the receipts from the sale of the Herstmonceux estate. Apart from those financial approvals, there is a long-standing practice over many years, observed by Governments of both complexions, not to overturn a decision by a research council made on scientific grounds.

Dr. Bray: Is the Minister aware that the SERC in fact said that Manchester as well as Cambridge "would be very satisfactory from scientific, technological and administrative viewpoints"?
Is he further aware that the decision to send the observatory to Cambridge greatly increases the claims that Manchester will have for the next research institute, which will perhaps create more employment in Greater Manchester than in La Palma or Hawaii?

Mr. Walden: I note the hon. Gentleman's advance lobbying.

Mr. Gow: Is my hon. Friend aware that among the 22 letters which he has received about the recommendations of the research council there is a particularly powerful one from the hon. Member for Eastbourne? Following the answer that he has just given to my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) will my hon. Friend make it clear that the Secretary of State does not have in mind even the possibility that the Government will reject the recommendations of the research council?

Mr. Walden: Among the other letters, I am aware, of course, of the powerful points that have been put by my hon. Friend. I can only repeat that there is a long-standing practice, observed by all Governments, not to question decisions by research councils which are taken on scientific grounds.

Polytechnics

9. Mr. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received in the past month from directors of polytechnics about the National Advisory Body's planning exercise for 1987-88.

13. Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received in the past month from directors of polytechnics about the National Advisory Body's planning exercise for 1987-88.

I have received one letter. During the past month I have also visited five polytechnics and my right hon. Friend has also visited one. The National Advisory Body's planning exercise was among the subjects discussed on each occasion.

Mr. Brown: When the hon. Gentleman responds to the representations made to him by the directors of the polytechnics in the northern region — Teesside, Middlesbrough, and Newcastle—will he give due weight to the representations that have been made by major private sector employers in the northern region, including Alcan and Swan Hunters, which have protested most vigorously to the cuts that he proposes?

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman's question is based on a total misconception. I propose no cuts and the Government propose no cuts. As it happens, I have visited the polytechnics to which the hon. Gentleman refers and I have therefore had a recent opportunity to leave people on the spot in no doubt about the inaccurate and misleading information which has been put about and which has been encouraged by the hon. Gentleman.

Mrs. Currie: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the excellent results which were announced earlier this afternoon of the increase under the Government in the numbers of polytechnic students. Does that not show the Conservative Government's considerable support and commitment to the growth of this particular sector of higher education, which now rivals the universities in the quality of the work that it does?

Mr. Walden: I am glad that my hon. Friend made that intervention, because it will help to counter some of the nonsense that is put about by the Opposition. I am never surprised when the Opposition flog a dead horse, but "Poly Cuts" expired before it even got to the starting line.

School Reorganisation Plans

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to speed up the work of his Department in considering school reorganisation plans submitted to him.

Mr. Baker: I have appointed Mr. J. A. M. Mitchell to undertake a scrutiny of the Department's procedures on school closures, with the purpose of speeding those procedures up.

Mr. Stern: May I assure my right hon. Friend that that is a most welcome answer especially in a politically volatile area such as the county of Avon, where the disadvantage of delays in the programme of school reorganisation means that the beneficiary is often the successor administration?

Mr. Baker: I agree with my hon. Friend. There have been quite unacceptable delays in coming to decisions. There is a proposal before me from the Avon local education authority, and I shall try to deal with it as expeditiously as I can.

University of Edinburgh

11. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had from the vice-chancellor and principal of the University of Edinburgh on the issue of research funds.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend has received a letter from Dr. Burnett describing some of the implications for Edinburgh university of the University Grants Committee's grant allocations for 1986-87 and expressing concern about future funding prospects.

Mr. Dalyell: May I ask two questions, of which I have given the Minister's office notice? On what proportion of the total grant did the UGC exercise research selectivity? Was it 15 per cent., 30 per cent. or 100 per cent.? On what proportion of the total grant was the new common funding base applied?

Mr. Walden: The proportions of the resources allocated notionally for teaching and research purposes were determined by the UGC sub-committees and varied between subjects. I understand that, overall, about two thirds of the resources were allocated on a common basis to teaching purposes and that one third was allocated to research purposes. Obviously the effects in each university will be different according to the different mix of subjects.

School Reorganisation Plans

12. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many proposals for major reorganisation of secondary education he has received from local authorities since 1979; and how many he has approved.

Mr. Dunn: Detailed records of proposals for major reorganisation of secondary education are available only in respect of those published since August 1980, when sections 12 to 15 of the Education Act 1980 came into force. Of the 73 such proposals received since that date, 45 have been approved, nine are undecided, and 19 were rejected.

Mr. Taylor: Is my hon. Friend aware from his highly successful visit to Southend last week of the damaging educational uncertainty created by county councils which put forward major reorganisation plans, in this case twice within a period of three years, to take away the sixth forms from comprehensives and to abolish two excellent grammar schools? Will he urge local councils not to produce a large number of secondary school reorganisations within a short time, thereby creating massive uncertainty for teachers, parents and pupils?

Mr. Dunn: We are fully aware of the reputation at present enjoyed by Southend's grammar schools and the other schools which my hon. Friend mentioned. His comments will be fully taken into account if and when proposals come before us.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Evennett asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall have further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen.

Mr. Evennett: Will my right hon. Friend reassure the House and the nation that the wild allegations circulating about the supposed state of health of the British people are wholly false, and that the incidence of major and killer diseases, such as cancer and heart disease, is no higher in this country than in other Western industrial nations?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to say that this country has an excellent Health Service, which serves its people well. There may be many causes of heart disease, but the number of heart bypass operations has trebled since 1979.

Mr. Kinnock: When P. W. Botha cannot find time to see the Foreign Secretary this week, when black leaders in South Africa will not see him, and when the attitude of both the African National Congress and the leaders of the front-line states could not be more plain or more opposed to the Prime Minister's attitude to sanctions, what exactly is the purpose of sending the Foreign Secretary to southern Africa this week?

The Prime Minister: President Botha will see my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on a date which has now been arranged in July, convenient to both of them. My right hon. and learned Friend will visit the front-line states before then and will hope to see some Heads of Government or Heads of State. I rather thought that the right hon. Gentleman was supporting my right hon. and learned Friend in his mission. Last week the right hon. Gentleman said that he wished my right hon. and learned Friend well, but at present the right hon. Gentleman is doing everything that he can to undermine him.

Mr. Kinnock: That is impossible when the Prime Minister has done such an effective job on scuppering her right hon. and learned Friend. In any case, it is not my enthusiasm that is required, but the response of P. W. Botha. Why is it that the Prime Minister wants to wait upon the convenience of P. W. Botha? Does she not realise that people of all parties in this country take it ill that our Foreign Secretary should be regarded with such contempt by a bunch of racist gangsters in South Africa?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman must be hard up for a question if he asks such bunkum.

Mr. Kinnock: May I then ask the Prime Minister what, precisely, is the purpose of the Foreign Secretary going to southern Africa this week? Is he not filling in time on a fool's errand?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. and learned Friend goes to South Africa representing the 12 Governments of Europe. He is representing not only this country, but the 12 Governments of Europe, which have said:

"The European Council decided to ask the future UK Presidency Foreign Minister to visit southern Africa, in a further effort to establish conditions in which the necessary dialogue can commence."

Twelve Governments, 12 Heads of Government, 12 Foreign Secretaries have great faith in my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Q2. Mr. Hayward asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hayward: Will my right hon. Friend, during her busy day, consider, in her role as Head of the Civil Service, the recent election as general secretary of the Civil and Public Services Association of a gentleman who does not support the constitution or the monarchy and opposes the independence of the Civil Service? Is it not astonishing that such a man should—according to The Guardian—be a lifelong member of the Labour party? Is it not members such as him who cause the Labour party to lose by-elections in such places as Filton in Bristol North-West, because while they belong to the party, people do not believe that it has rid itself of the Militants?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes his own point very effectively. The election within the CPSA is a matter for that union. If there were any allegations of irregularity, that would be a matter for the courts.

Mr. Heffer: If the Foreign Secretary is not successful in the mission on which the right hon. Lady and the other Governments have sent him, if Nelson Mandela is not released from prison and there is no end to apartheid, will the right hon. Lady assure us that there will then be economic sanctions against South Africa?

The Prime Minister: The position is set out in the communiqué issued by the 12 Governments, which states:

"In the meantime in the next three months the Community will enter into consultations with the other industrialised countries on further measures which might be needed covering in particular a ban on new investments, the import of coal, iron, steel and gold coins from South Africa."

There is nothing automatic about that, but contingency plans are being made and other countries are being consulted. I remind the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. and learned Friend is going as the representative of all the nations of the European Community, which have great confidence in my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will the Prime Minister consider today the continued deterioration in the competitiveness of British industry as measured by unit labour costs? Does she not agree that the deterioration is in large part due to increases in pay led by the private sector and that it will inevitably lead to further job losses? Will she tell the House what, apart from uttering exhortations, the Government intend to do to prevent this?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the crucial figure is the unit labour cost. If unit labour costs rise faster here than in other countries, I agree that we are in danger of losing trade, and if we lose trade because we are not competitive, we lose jobs. It is, therefore, vital that wage negotiations should be conducted in such a way as to produce the result that our unit labour costs stay down.

Q3. Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Has my right hon. Friend had time today to see reports of a quite outrageous, vicious and brutal attack upon a News International distribution depot in Eastleigh, Hampshire? Has she also seen police reports that members of SOGAT '82 were involved? Will my right hon. Friend, before the House, condemn that action as the outrage that it is?

The Prime Minister: I believe that criminal behaviour of that sort will be condemned by decent people everywhere. I understand that the raid on Sunday was the tenth made so far on TNT premises around the country since the printing dispute between News International and the print unions began in January this year. It is part of an attack made by some people. The Hampshire police are conducting an urgent investigation so that those responsible can be brought before the courts. This is no way in which to conduct an industrial dispute.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: On 24 April the Prime Minister gave an assurance that Harland and Wolff's bid for AOR 1 had been comprehensively costed. Why are the designs for that ship still being reviewed at the Ministry of Defence?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, we have done everything to facilitate the transfer of designs and we shall continue to do so. He also knows that we have done a great deal to enable Swan Hunter to obtain orders and to bring them forward so that it could do so.

Q4. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Even if some Boers have been boorish, will Her Majesty's Government not be deterred from playing a helpful role in South Africa? Will my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary consider suggesting to Bishop Tutu that it would be helpful if he would denounce the politics of the necklace? Will he also suggest to the ANC that it would be helpful if it were to suspend its death threats against two other bishops who, with millions of black Africans not of the ANC, stand for non-violence and dialogue with the state President?

The Prime Minister: Again I believe that most decent people everywhere totally and utterly condemn the necklace and the use to which it has been put in South Africa. It was for that and other reasons that the Commonwealth conference called upon both sides for the suspension of violence—the precise thing for which my hon. Friend is calling—to bring about the conditions under which a dialogue can take place between the Government of South Africa and proper and full representatives of black South Africans. That is the way in the end that the problem will be solved, and in none other.

Mr. Pike: When the Prime Minister said last week that it was for the South African people to determine what type of Government they wanted in South Africa and that that Government had to be acceptable to all people of whatever background, did she mean that she was prepared to support black majority rule? Will she spell that out clearly and support the line taken by the Church of England Synod yesterday in calling for sanctions?

The Prime Minister: The Commonwealth conference and the communiqué have taken a similar view. Our role is to try to bring about the necessary negotiations and dialogue between the Government and the black South African people, and, indeed, all people in South Africa. If there were to be a constitutional convention, it would be for them to decide what kind of constitution would emerge and not for us to predetermine it for them.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about economic sanctions. No, I will not support full economic sanctions. I know of very few people who do, except those on the Labour Benches. I find it ironic that on the one hand people, including the Church, are calling for all help to end starvation, famine and poverty in South Africa, and on the other hand are calling for the very economic sanctions that would increase that.

Q5. Mr. Michael Colvin asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Colvin: Has my right hon. Friend noted that BBC television has at last presented the other side of the South African sanctions equation by reporting last night that some 450,000 young blacks in the Homelands may well die of starvation if the faltering economy of South Africa does not soon recover? Does she agree that positive measures to aid all South Africans would do much more to assist that country to a true democracy than would wielding a big stick? Does she also agree that it is high time that leaders on all sides in South Africa learnt who their real friends were and stopped indulging in their favourite pastime of shooting themselves in the foot?

The Prime Minister: I heard of the broadcast to which I think my hon. Friend is referring. It was a BBC report on Operation Hunger in South Africa and a Mrs. Pearlman who runs it was broadcasting and pointed out the difficulties already in South Africa where some people, with the uncertainty of the present economic circumstances, are returning to the Homelands and are not able to support their families as they have done. She went on to say:

> "Sanctions would probably immediately double our normal death rate of 50,000 children under the age of 5 per year, and they could be placing at least another 400,000 children under 15 at risk."

We do not wish to go that way.

Mr. Ewing: Is the Prime Minister aware that tomorrow her predecessor as leader of the Tory party the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) will celebrate his 70th birthday? Will the Prime Minister convey our good wishes that the right hon. Gentleman will long continue to represent with strength and vigour the human face of the Conservative party, which is more important now than ever in view of her inhuman approach to almost every subject?

The Prime Minister: I gladly wish my right hon. Friend well, and a very happy birthday. He is as much against economic sanctions as I am.

European Community (Agricultural Spending)

3.31 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the decision of the Council of Finance Ministers yesterday to approve substantial additional agricultural spending in breach of the budgetary limits agreed by the European Council on 4 December 1984."

While EEC spending is a continuing issue, yesterday's decision is in a different category and strikes at the heart of this House's control of spending. The House agreed in 1985 to increase the VAT contribution to the EEC by 40 per cent. in real terms following a specific agreement concluded by the Prime Minister which provided, first, that the additional resources would last for several years, secondly, that strict budgetary controls would be applied, and, thirdly, that the rate of increase in farm spending would be limited to the natural increase in own resources. But the Commission has since advised in document 7113 that the 40 per cent. increase will be exhausted this year, and yesterday's unanimous decision of the Council of Finance Ministers proves that strict budgetary limits are dead and that farm spending arrears are out of control in relation to the agreement which was solemnly concluded.

If there is no debate today or tomorrow, our Chancellor and other Finance Ministers will conclude by Wednesday an agreement that ignores the December 1984 agreement which this House was advised was binding on the Council of Finance Ministers. If no debate is held, Parliament will have surrendered a huge area of control over spending. I therefore conclude that this is an important, urgent and serious matter that should have the immediate attention of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the decision of the Council of Finance Ministers yesterday to approve substantial additional agricultural spending in breach of the budgetary limits agreed by the European Council on 4 December 1984."

I have listened with great care to what the hon. Gentleman has said. As he knows, my duty in considering an application under Standing Order No. 10 is to decide whether it should be given priority over the business already set down for today or tomorrow. I regret that I cannot find that the matter that he has raised meets all the criteria laid down in the Standing Order, and I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Nevertheless, I say to the hon. Gentleman that I hope that even this week he will find other opportunities of raising this matter in the House.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I will put together the Questions on the two motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Job Release Act 1977 (Continuation) Order 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Air Navigation (Noise Certification) Order 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Scottish Bank Notes

3.45 pm

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make Scottish pound notes and other Scottish bank notes legal tender throughout the United Kingdom and to facilitate the issue and distribution of Scottish pound notes and other Scottish bank notes throughout the United Kingdom; and for related purposes.

At present, three Scottish clearing banks—the Bank of Scotland, the Royal Bank of Scotland and the Clydesdale Bank—are allowed to issue their own bank notes in Scotland, but strictly speaking they are not classified as legal tender, even within Scotland. The only exception to this was during the two world wars earlier this century when, as an emergency measure, Scottish bank notes were classified as legal tender.

I still receive complaints from some Scottish visitors to England about the difficulty or embarrassment that they experience when they tender Scottish bank notes in a shop or a pub, or to a taxi driver, or elsewhere. At present, because of the law, there is no obligation to accept Scottish bank notes. My Bill would make them legal tender, not just in Scotland but throughout the United Kingdom. It would also enable the three Scottish banks to issue their pound notes and other bank notes throughout the United Kingdom. At present, for example, the Royal Bank of Scotland operates on both sides of the border, with branches down here, even in London. It has its own bank notes. The bank is allowed to issue them north of the border, but it is not allowed to issue them through its branches down here. My Bill would enable it to do so.

A few years ago my Bill would not have been all that popular, perhaps, down here. It might have added a little confusion, because at one time a larger number of Scottish bank notes was issued than is issued at present by those three banks. Also the Bank of England pound note was competing. However, since the Bank of England made what, to my mind, was the daft mistake of withdrawing its pound note completely in favour of the pound coin, my feeling is that many people down here are envious of what we in Scotland have—a choice between the pound coin and the pound note.

In Scotland, the pound note is far more popular than the pound coin. I submit that the reasons for this are obvious. If somebody changes a fiver or a tenner down here, he invariably receives a fistful of change. Sometimes it is very heavy change. Heavy, unwieldy coinage tends to make holes in men's pockets. Because the pound note is more popular than the pound coin north of the border, it is much easier for men to slip notes into their wallets or and for women to slip them into their handbags, or whatever.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Or sporran.

Mr. Canavan: My hon. Friend is quite right.

The pound coin is particularly confusing for some old people because the pound coin does not even look like a pound. It looks like one of the old threepenny bits, without the sawn-off edges. Old people were confused enough about decimalisation. Now that there are no pound notes at all, the pound coin adds to the confusion.

If Scottish pound notes and other Scottish bank notes could be issued here they would soon catch on and would be as popular as they are north of the border. That was borne out by an experimental walkabout that I had through the streets of London this morning. I asked various people and traders what they thought about Scottish bank notes. I told them who I was and said that I was introducing this Bill, and virtually everybody that I spoke to supported my Bill. Even people who expressed a preference for the pound coin—and they were in the minority—agreed that there should be a choice between the coin and the note. I sensed that overseas visitors were completely confused and outraged by the lack of opportunity to have pound notes in England. I told them that they could come to Scotland and that there they would get as many pound notes as they wanted, provided they paid for them.

I know of no other currency in the world where the lowest denomination note is valued at £5. I am glad to see that the Economic Secretary to the Treasury is in the House to hear what I have to say, because the Treasury and the Bank of England made a gross mistake in abolishing the pound note. However, it is not too late to correct it. The Economic Secretary is of Scottish ancestry; I think he was born in Scotland. I hope that he will bear in mind the points tnat I am making and will try to facilitate the distribution and exchange of Scottish pound notes and other bank notes in England. I hope that he will also facilitate the passage of the Bill.

The universal popularity of my Bill is reflected in the breadth of the sponsorship. Sometimes when I wish to introduce a Bill I am almost on my knees looking for 12 sponsors. This time I have been so inundated with requests that I have even had to turn down my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who normally sponsors all my Bills. This time all the places were filled before he got in. When I read out the names, my hon. Friend will probably be grateful that he did not add his name to the list, because I have hon. Members from all parts of the House, from one extreme to the other, including a few moderates like myself.

The list contains hon. Members from Scotland, Wales and England and includes my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), who is well known and well admired as a great supporter of all things Scottish. He tells me that when he used to return from his frequent forays across Hadrian's wall he had his pockets full of Scottish bank notes. To his dismay, he found that some of the Geordie money traders would offer him only 19s 6d for a Scottish pound. My Bill would help to eradicate that kind of unfair exchange and injustice, and would help people north and south of the border.

The Bill is not a retrograde nationalist measure; rather it is an attempt to give a degree of international recognition to something that is part of the Scottish heritage. It would be of considerable benefit to many of Scotland's friends in other parts of the United Kingdom. I ask the House to support it.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Dennis Canavan, Mr. William McKelvey, Mr. Gerald Bermingham, Mr. Tom Clarke, Mr. Nicholas Winterton, Mr. Allen Adams, Mr. Ted Garrett, Mr. Ron Davies, Mr. Bill Walker, Mr. David Lambie, Mr. Ron Brown and Mr. Don Dixon.

SCOTTISH BANK NOTES

Mr. Dennis Canavan accordingly presented a Bill to make Scottish pound notes and other Scottish bank notes legal tender throughout the United Kingdom and to facilitate the issue and distribution of Scottish pound notes and other Scottish bank notes throughout the United Kingdom; and for related purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 201].

Schedule 8

PERSONAL EQUITY PLANS

3.46 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): I beg to move amendment No. 37, in page 119, line 4, leave out

'in shares under a plan (a personal equity plan)' and insert 'under a plan'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 38 to 47.

Mr. Lamont: The amendments refer to the personal equity plan. Under our original proposals, investment in unit and investment trusts was excluded from the personal equity plan scheme. That was because, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made clear, the scheme was primarily designed to encourage direct investment in equities. However, it was put to us that many people, particularly small investors, might not be able to spread their risks as widely as they might wish, at least in the early years of the scheme. The Government accepted that there was some substance in that point, and that the needs of such investors should be catered for.

The purpose of the amendments is to enable a modest proportion of investment in unit and investment trusts to be allowed under personal equity plans. That was made clear in the consultative document that we published, but the Bill, as originally drafted, contained references only to "shares" rather than "investments". In Committee, it was said that schedule 8 would be amended if necessary. As originally drafted, the schedule referred to "shares", which does not cover investment in unit trusts.

I hope that the change will be seen as fairly non-controversial and that the reasons for it are clear.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): As the Financial Secretary has said, the amendment is non-controversial, as it has been moved in response to pressure and representations from several parties on this side of the House. We welcome the amendment and certainly do not seek to divide the House against it.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): I, too, welcome the amendment, as I regard it as rather important. The previous restrictions confining the scheme to shares were undesirable, because they would have limited the range and type of investor. As one of the Government's aims is to encourage wider ownership in investments generally, this move is both dramatic and welcome, and I hope that it will receive wide publicity.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 38, in page 119, line 6, leave out 'shares' and insert 'investments'.

No. 39, in page 119, line 12, leave out

'shares in which they may invest' and insert 'investments they may make'.

No. 40, in page 119, line 14, leave out 'shares' and insert 'investments'.

No. 41, in page 119, line 15, leave out 'shares' and insert 'investments'.

No. 42, in page 119, line 25, leave out 'in shares'.

No. 43, in page 119, line 27, leave out 'them' and insert 'the investments'.

No. 44, in page 119, line 32, leave out 'in shares'.

No. 45, in page 119, line 41, leave out 'shares' and insert 'investments'.

No. 46, in page 120, line 8, leave out 'shares' and insert 'investments'.

No. 47, in page 120, line 12, leave out 'shares' and insert 'investments'. [Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Terry Davis: I beg to move amendment No. 49, in page 120, line 13, at end insert

'(4A) The regulations shall provide that an investor shall not be entitled to relief from tax in respect of shares in a company the whole or part of whose income derives

(a) from a trade or business carried out in whole or part in the Republic of South Africa; or

(c) from transactions undertaken with or in connection with a company or companies the whole or part of whose income is derived from a trade or business carried out in whole or part in the Republic of South Africa; or

(4B) The regulations shall provide that an investor shall not be entitled to relief from tax in respect of shares in a company which controls either directly or indirectly another company the whole or part of whose income is derived in the manner set out in subparagraphs (a), (b), (c) or (d) of paragraph (4A).'.

I begin by putting the amendment in context. I must emphasise that the Labour party objects most strongly to the inclusion of clause 39 and schedule 8 in the Bill, because it completely opposes the idea of the personal equity plan on grounds of principle and priority.

When the scheme was announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Budget on 18 March, he claimed that the scheme would help to make "The British people a nation of share owners."

He went on to claim that it was,

"Specially designed to encourage smaller savers." — [Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 177-78.]

As we established in Committee, the scheme is worth very little to the smaller investor, but it is worth a lot to the big investor, especially the investor who has capital gains of more than £6,300 a year. The personal equity plan has little or nothing to offer to the genuine small investor. Frankly, we regard it as bogus.

We also oppose the scheme on the ground of priority. If the Chancellor can afford to give away £25 million a year, we could all think of many more deserving groups of people than those who can afford to invest in shares.

This afternoon, we are concerned about a different point. In the prospectus for potential plan managers issued by the Board of Inland Revenue, there is only one restriction on the shares which will qualify for tax relief. The investment must be confined to ordinary shares in United Kingdom incorporated companies quoted on the stock exchange. My amendment seeks to introduce another restriction — to ensure that the shares are not in a company whose income derives from conducting business in South Africa, or a company with investments in South Africa, or a company which conducts business with the South African Government.

The position in South Africa is well known to the Government and to all hon. Members; it does not need a detailed exposition from me. I simply remind the House that in South Africa only 15 per cent. of the population — the white people — are treated as full citizens and 85 per cent. — the black, Asian and coloured people — are treated as second-class citizens or worse. The system of apartheid is abhorred by the overwhelming majority of people in Britain. Hardly anyone on the House will stoop to defend it. But it is not enough o condemn apartheid The question is what should be done about it and what the British Government should do.

There is a clear difference between the Conservative Government and the Conservative party — or the Prime Minister and her friends — on the one hand, and the Labour party, all other political parties, even some Conservative Members and most of the people outside the House, on the other. Only the Prime Minister and her more extreme supporters are resisting the call for international economic sanctions to be applied against South Africa, and the Prime Minister and those who think like her are rapidly becoming as isolated at home as they have become isolated abroad.

The amendment is concerned with a slightly different, although related, point. As matters stand, the Government are planning to encourage investment in South Africa by giving tax relief on the income derived from shares in companies investing in South Africa doing business in South Africa or doing business with the South African Government. Surely we can all agree that this policy is morally wrong and politically mistaken.

Surely even this Government would accept that the introduction of new tax incentives for investing in companies which are in turn investing in South Africa must constitute the wrong message to send to the South African Government now. Surely we must agree that, whatever our differences about the concept of the personal equity plan, we should exclude investors in companies conducting business in South Africa. I hope very much that the Government will accept the amendment.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I hope that the Government will not accept the amendment. It is, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) has been frank enough to admit, an attempt to introduce sanctions by the back door.

[Mr. Douglas Hogg]

The Labour party has no monopoly of concern about the policies of the South African Government. I am deeply opposed to the policies of the South African Government and I suspect that that is the position of almost the entirety of the members of my party. I support the mission of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, and I agree entirely with those who say that we should introduce additional measures if it does not bring about any substantial concession.

The Government have already introduced measures against the South African Government and I feel certain that additional measures will be forthcoming if they are necessary. That, however, does not mean that the approach that is set out in the amendment is right. Indeed, it is wrong on at least two grounds. First, it is wrong to adopt a piecemeal policy. If Governments are to introduce measures against the South African Government, they must be part of a concerted approach and a general policy. I think that that is best done in concert with other EEC and western countries. Secondly, a policy of the sort that is set out in the amendment is curiously inflexible. A sanction that is incorporated in statute law is difficult to change. Therefore, it is not an especially effective method of inducing concessions. It is not something that can be used flexibly.

If the South African Government seek to make concessions, they will still be affected by the amendment if it is incorporated in legislation. On the grounds that we should not approach the problem of South Africa in a piecemeal fashion or adopt an inflexible method of the sort that is advocated by the hon. Member for Hodge Hill, I hope that the Government will not support the amendment.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): No one can doubt that it would be far better to have a list of sanctions separate from the Bill. That is the obvious approach. No one would be happier than myself if the Prime Minister or the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to say that the amendment is not a suitable way of introducing sanctions, that there are many other and better ways and that the Government intend to implement them. Unfortunately, we do not have that option before us. However, we have the amendment.

We can express through the amendment our need to consider whatever sanctions it might be possible to introduce to bring pressure to bear upon the South African Government. There will be many flaws in any amendment of the sort that is before us — for example, it is hard to determine the limits of involvement of South African companies — but the view that is expressed in the amendment is important.

The clause represents the great hope of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring about a body of knowledgeable shareholders throughout the country that will bring pressure to bear upon certain companies and improve their performance by causing them to respond to it. I do not believe that it will have anything like that effect. The British people are not the same as the people of the United States. There are many in the United States who spend a great deal of their time investing and switching their investments from one company to another. They are extremely knowledgeable about their investments. I do not think that most of the British work force would take that approach. We are likely always to find that those who invest in shares in Britain will be a rather more knowledgeable part of the population than the majority and rather wealthier than the average person. The clause will not have anything like its intended effect.

The hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) speaks with great concern, interest and understanding on these matters. He said that the amendment is an attempt to introduce sanctions by the back door. I do not agree. It is unfortunate that we do not have a front door. If we had a front door, I would be delighted to discuss much more effective methods of introducing sanctions. The amendment can be said to constitute a piecemeal approach, but if it were passed we could express in the Bill the fact that we shall use whatever means is available to us to show our detestation of the South African regime.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's position. I am not trying to denigrate the position he has adopted. Will he tell the House what would happen if the amendment were passed and it was incorporated into statute law and the South African Government made major concessions in their policy? Would we have to introduce primary legislation to delete the amendment?

Mr. Sheldon: That would be a most happy occasion. There are not many opportunities for a Finance (No. 2) Bill. If we were to see in South Africa a position of one man, one vote, I should be pleased to be one of the signatories to such a Bill. Let us be realistic; that will not happen.

Mr. Hogg: The right hon. Gentleman is quite right. We shall not see a one man, one vote position in South Africa in the foreseeable future. However, we might see substantial concessions — for example, the freeing of Mandela and negotiations with the ANC. There comes a point when some concessions are so significant as to require this House and the Government to make changes in the statute law, which the right hon. Gentleman advocates.

Mr. Sheldon: I should be happy to negotiate with the hon. Gentleman if such an eventuality came about. I should be pleased to consider where, how and in what circumstances we might repeal the legislation.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Would the simple guide be that, when the representative organisations of the African majority and their white and coloured allies in South Africa say that no economic measures should be taken, it would be right for us to respond in the manner outlined by my right hon. Friend?

Mr. Sheldon: My hon. Friend has a most practical approach to such matters. At such a time when good fortune were to attend our labours, I do not think that there would be any problem about the repeal of a limited piece of legislation which the amendment proposes. We are concerned to express a clear view to put to disadvantage those companies that trade with and get a great deal of their profits from South Africa, and meet the conditions of the amendment. It is a muted clarion call, but at least it shows the views of my hon. Friends. It is a way in which we can bring to bear in some small way the revulsion that we feel about the events taking place in South Africa. This is a limited but useful amendment, and I hope that it will be supported.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): The amendment is undoubtedly a foolish piece of ideology. It is objectionable that Labour Members should try to pretend that they have a monopoly of concern to see the end of apartheid. When one looks back at speeches made by Labour right hon. and hon. Gentlemen, one may ask what they did in government to bring about the ending of apartheid.

I find it curious that the amendment is tabled in the name of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), because when the Prime Minister challenged him on economic sanctions at Question Time a few weeks ago, he wriggled out of giving any commitment to imposing economic sanctions and said that he wold prefer to think about other measures — measures short of economic sanctions. Yet he is the lead signatory on an amendment which, in its most naked form, intends to introduce such sanctions.

The wording of the amendment is ludicrous. Any company, any quoted security that invests, trades or invests in another group of companies that trades with South Africa would be excluded from PEP. There is hardly a leading British company quoted on the stock exchange in London — the sorts of investment that people would put by in their PEP — that does not have some form of investment in or trade with South Africa or with a third party that in turn trades with South Africa. I commend the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) for having the honesty to admit that the effect of such an amendment would be to emasculate PEP. I believe that I speak for my colleagues who welcome PEP. We certainly do not want to see the introduction of any wrecking amendments.

I had the opportunity to visit South Africa. Before I went, I condemned apartheid. I went there with an open mind, which is more than the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has done. I am tired of people with open mouths and closed minds who will not see things for themselves. In the course of that visit, I looked at one of the investments of a British leading company — BP. BP has a substantial interest in coal mining. That interest produces a substantial number of jobs and a great deal of wealth for the people who work in those mines.

Moreover, the conditions in such mines are superior to anything that I have seen in mines in this country or those which I have visited in Europe. I was proud of the fact that a British company had set the highest standard of living and working conditions of its black African employees and that it was giving a standard to which other South African companies could aspire. I have no doubt that, if economic sanctions were introduced against South Africa, the jobs of a successful work force in that mine would come to an end overnight.

I do not believe that the amendment is likely to deter any company from trading with or investing in South Africa. It is likely to prevent people from taking advantage of what was intended in the Budget proposal for a personal equity plan. As such, I find it objectionable. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will call upon his colleagues in the Government to oppose the amendment, should the Opposition choose to press it to a vote.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I share the anxiety that has been expressed on the Opposition Benches about putting economic pressure on the South African regime to change their policies. The amendment is drawn so widely that I think that there is virtually no organisation in the land that carries out business that would not be covered by it. I must say to the Labour Front Bench that that probably includes the Co-operative bank, Unity Trust and the other organisations to which they may be close. If transactions as well as investments are included, any organisation or company — not to mention Mr. Maxwell and Pergamon printers, and so on — that is trading in almost any market, but especially internationally, if not directly, will be caught by the amendment. If the amendment had been better targeted and more tightly drawn, it would have been more effective and would have gathered wider support.

As I said in the Standing Committee, the PEP scheme is a poor scheme. In our view, it will not extend share ownership in this country in the way that the Chancellor trumpeted forth in his speech. It is a mouse of a scheme. I regret that the Government were not prepared to accept amendments that I and others tabled to make it a more effective and catch-all scheme that people could take up as small investors in the way that the Chancellor said he hoped would happen.

In my view, the amendment would not only undermine the scheme completely, because I can think of virtually no business organisation that would not be hit by it, but it would not achieve the purpose that the Opposition intend. I think that there are much more direct economic actions that can be taken and should be taken by the Government to persuade the South African Government to change their policies.

Mr. Winnick: My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) has explained the criticisms that we have of the scheme. He went into considerable detail when the Bill was in Committee. Despite all the ministerial optimism about helping the small investor and what is described as "people's capitalism" and other propaganda, the plain truth is that the scheme will help those with substantial incomes. The Government are perfectly aware of that. The Chief Secretary admitted as much when he replied at the Committee stage.

Far too many people in our community have been penalised as a result of Government action in the past few years. In more recent times, owner occupiers who become unemployed will face difficulties because the assistance that they receive towards mortgage interest will be reduced. That was the subject of a debate initiated by the Labour party.

Of course, no one is surprised when a Tory Administration substantially assist the most prosperous in the community. The Government have tried to cover it up, giving the impression that they wanted to help the ordinary person but, as with the tax concessions, those who have benefited in some cases in terms of thousands of pounds a week have been the most prosperous. That is the function and role of the Tory Government and only the most naive person would expect them to act otherwise.

It is even more unacceptable that such tax relief is given for any form of investment in respect of shares in a company with South African involvement. The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) echoed the comments of Tory Members. Of course, the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) said that he was against apartheid. I had not heard a single Conservative Member – even the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) – argue otherwise. I shall pay the hon. Member for Grantham the compliment of not putting him in the same category as the hon. Member for Luton, North and one or two other Conservative Members who might be associated with the South African lobby on the Tory Benches. I must say, with respect, that it is not sufficient to say that one is against the system in South Africa. The obvious question, which the Church of England debated yesterday with great seriousness, as one would expect, is: what does one intend to do about the events in South Africa? It is not sufficient to say, in effect, that one is opposed to the system and to leave it at that.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I do not want the hon. Gentleman to misrepresent my position. I have made it clear, especially in this debate, that, if the concessions are not forthcoming as a result of the visit by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, I hope that additional sanctions or measures will be imposed.

Mr. Winnick: That is a step forward, and it is about time, after all the years of tyranny. It is fortunate that, at long last, there are Conservative Members who take that line. I should be out of order if I were to discuss the Foreign Secretary's proposed trip.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Does the hon. Gentleman know the policy of the Church Commissioners on their investments in South Africa?

Mr. Winnick: I am sure the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to take up that matter as soon as he can with the Church of England authorities. It would be inappropriate for me to act as a spokesman on behalf of the Church Commissioners. After all, a Conservative Member answers in the House for the Church Commissioners. I see no reason why the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) should not table a written question for priority answer on Thursday or Friday, and he would then be satisfied.

The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) has said that we have closed minds. Presumably, anyone who is against apartheid, including the hon. Gentleman, has a closed mind. It would be odd if we had an open mind in view of the type of racial tyranny and oppression that exists in South Africa.

It is unfortunate that so many leading British companies have substantial holdings in South Africa. I have a list of category A companies, which are British companies holding 50 per cent. or more of the equity of a South African company. That is a fairly large equity. Those companies are household names – Barclays bank, BAT Industries, the Beecham group, Blue Circle, the BOC group, Boots, Brooke Bond, Cadbury Schweppes, Dunlop Holdings, GEC, Great Universal Stores, Rio Tinto-Zinc, Rank Xerox, Plessey, Rowntree Mackintosh, Tate and Lyle, Vickers, Wilkinson Sword and Wimpey. They are all leading British companies.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) is correct in saying that Barclays bank holds a substantial interest in South African companies, I fancy that the representative of the Social Democratic party – the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) – should have declared an interest. As I understand it, he is a paid representative of Barclays bank.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): It is a point of debate rather than a point of order. The House knows that, if an hon. Member has an interest to declare, he should declare it.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am not a paid representative of Barclays bank, as I think the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) knows. I am an adviser to Barclays bank. That is well known in the House. I have, of course, no hesitation in declaring that position.

4.15 pm

Mr. Winnick: Not only am I not the representative of the Church Commissioners but I am not, in any circumstances, a representative of or spokesman for that wretched group, the SDP. I leave it to the hon. Member for Stockton, South to square his conscience. No doubt he will do so in a way that is appropriate to him.

It is unfortunate that so many leading British companies have such a huge stake in the South African economy. Although Conservative Members – no doubt including the Financial Secretary to the Treasury – will tell us that this is all to the good for South Africa, I, like my right hon. and hon. Friends, have a different attitude. I believe that such involvement by leading British companies can do nothing but strengthen the South African economy and help the South African authorities to remain in power. The fact that some of those companies pursue a fairer employment policy than native companies in South Africa is beside the point. They play a leading role in the apartheid system, no matter how they argue otherwise. It is understandable that the South African authorities are so anxious that these British companies retain their stake in South Africa. We shall be taken seriously in our arguments against apartheid only when economic measures and sanctions are imposed, as inevitably they will be, and when British companies are clearly told by the Government of the day that their involvement in South Africa must end or be substantially reduced as I believe it should be.

The Labour party knows that the amendment will be voted down. The SDP and, no doubt, the Liberals will vote with the Tories. We are under no illusions. Anyone who believes that this is just a propaganda ploy and that, if the Labour party were in office, we would act differently does not understand. The other day, the Prime Minister baited my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) about what he did or did not do in Cabinet in 1967 in respect of selling arms to South Africa, but 140 Labour Members of Parliament made it clear then that in no circumstances would they allow their Government to change their policy. That policy was retained as a result either of the view of the 140 Labour Members of Parliament or of the way in which our views were made clear to the Whips. I was a Member at that time. We made it clear that we were not willing to support any Government, including our own, who pursued a policy of selling arms to South Africa. It is understandable that in 1967 the Labour Cabinet decided to continue their policy.

During the emergency debate on 19 December 1967, under Standing Order No. 9, Conservative Members were highly critical of the Labour Government for pursuing a policy of not selling arms to South Africa.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is straying from the subject. He must relate his comments to personal equity plans.

Mr. Winnick: I appreciate your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We demonstrated in 1967 that we were not playing with words. We do not have to wait many years to understand the tyranny in South Africa. Although the amendment will be voted down, we shall have established an important principle. Other sections of the community here are making it clear that economic measures and sanctions should be imposed on South Africa. We say, as Labour Members of Parliament in a Tory-dominated House of Commons, that that should be done. That is the way in which we can associate ourselves with those in South Africa fighting tyranny who want us to take those economic measures. I am sure that people will understand what we are trying to do. In effect, we are saying to the country, "We totally oppose the Tory Government's collaboration policy. We are for sanctions and effective measures against South Africa." This is one way in which we are illustrating that measures could be taken, but will not be taken because of the Government's action.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am sorry that the personal equity plan has received such a sour response from Opposition Members. The purpose of the personal equity plan is to increase share ownership and make it available to people of modest means. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) seemed to pooh-pooh the whole idea. He said that he did not think that the United Kingdom could acquire the same interest in investment as the United States. It may be difficult to get that sort of popular interest, but I think that most of my hon. Friends would agree that it would be excellent if we could imitate that part of American culture and that our economic success would be more likely to be assured if people took a close interest in the fortunes of individual companies.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) almost openly admitted that his amendment would have a severe effect on the personal equity plan. The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) agreed with the hon. Member for Hodge Hill that he did not think it was a satisfactory scheme because it did not go far enough. However, at least he had the grace not to want to wreck the scheme. He at least wanted to preserve it and enable it to get off the ground. It may be a modest start, but it could be the modest start of something very significant and far-reaching.

The hon. Member for Hodge Hill said that the scheme would benefit the wealthier investor. That was echoed by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). At times there seemed to be a conflict between Opposition Members. Some were saying that it was a mouse of a scheme and did not amount to anything and others were saying that it gave too much benefit to the rich. We believe that it can benefit the small investor. I imagine that Opposition Members think that it may not because they believe that it is unlikely that a capital gain will arise which is anywhere near the indexed rate of £6,300 a year. However, that does not take account of two factors. The first is the relief that is available on dividends that are re-invested and the second is the gearing effect that will have over time as the portfolio and the value of the portfolio build up. I believe—I am sure that I carry my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) with me—that it could be significant for the smaller investor.

Mr. Terry Davis: I believe that the Financial Secretary missed the discussion on this schedule in Committee. At that time he had not been appointed as Financial Secretary. May I assume that he has taken the trouble to read our proceedings in Committee? Will he answer the point that I made in Committee about the comparison between the tax benefit and the cost of paying the manager of the PEP to run the plan? As the Financial Secretary will remember, in Committee I showed that the charge to be expected for the management of a PEP would exceed the income tax refund.

Mr. Lamont: Not having been in the Standing Committee, I do not know what the hon. Gentleman said about that.

Mr. Davis: Has the Financial Secretary not taken the trouble to read our debates? Perhaps that is why he has been put up to reply to this debate.

Mr. Lamont: I may have read innumerable copies of Standing Committee proceedings on the Finance Bill before I appeared on that Committee myself. If the hon. Gentleman will excuse me, I certainly do not carry in my head every argument that he puts when I am not present. I know that he expects me to follow his speeches very closely, and indeed I do. I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman has made because he has put it to me. However, the effect of the rolled-up relief available to dividends and the effect of the cumulative investment over the period of a plan could be significant to the small investor. That is the only point that I make, and I think it is important because an attempt has been made to suggest that the scheme is not important for the small investor. We intend it to be designed for the small investor and we intend to do what we can to encourage wider share ownership.

Most of the debate has been about South Africa. The purpose of the amendment is to take measures which, it has been argued, might have some effect on the problems in South Africa. I would like to explain to the House why the amendment would be quite unworkable. Apart from any other objection I might have to it—the amendment may give Opposition Members some moral satisfaction; it may be a moral free lunch—it is unworkable.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden pointed out, the amendment would exclude from the personal equity plan proposal not merely any company or its subsidiary which traded or invested in South Africa, but any company which had any transactions with such a company. That would be a far-reaching and wholly unenforceable provision. Who would enforce it? Would plan managers have to seek an assurance from companies that they would not trade with or invest in South Africa? Would United Kingdom companies have to check, before conducting any transaction with any other company in the world, that neither it nor any of its subsidiaries derived any income from South Africa? How, in the real world, would failures to comply with this restriction be discovered, either by plan managers or the Inland Revenue?

Secondly, is it fair that a personal equity plan holder should be denied his or her tax relief however much Opposition Members may not sympathise with the concept because, without his or her or the plan manager's knowledge, the company in which the money was invested turned out to have South African connections? What possible explanation would the hon. Member for Hodge Hill give to a widow who suddenly found herself subjected to unforeseen capital gains tax? How would the hon. Gentleman justify to any investor with a modest income that he would be presented with an unforeseen capital gains tax liability for which there were no funds?

As my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) said, it is the introduction of sanctions by the back door. It is penalising the wrong people because it is putting the penalty on the investor and the plan manager for investing in companies which would be doing something of which they had no knowledge and no way of finding out and something which was not illegal. If that is not sanctions by the back door, I do not know what is. My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham was right to describe it in that way.

Even if we accepted the principle of this amendment, which we certainly do not, we could not advise the House to enact legislation which is impracticable and cannot be enforced. The hon. Member for Walsall, North said that this concerns a matter of principle. The amendment is not about a matter of principle; it is about a gesture that the hon. Member for Hodge Hill is anxious to make. For that reason, I advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to reject the amendment.

Mr. Terry Davis: Once again, we have found that the Financial Secretary has been careless in his homework. I did not expect him to read all the reports of our proceedings before he joined the Committee after his appointment as Financial Secretary in succession to the right hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore), but he could have taken the trouble to read our discussion about PEP before he responded to the debate today. It is clear from what he has said that he has not taken the trouble to read the reports of the proceedings when we debated the schedule in Committee. If he had, he would not have dared to describe the investors who will benefit from the personal equity plan as "small investors of modest means".

The right hon. Gentleman would have known that we showed to the satisfaction, not only of my hon. Friends but of many people sitting in the Public Gallery listening to the debate, that the people who will benefit will be those whose income exceeds £25,000 a year. I am prepared to admit that the Financial Secretary may regard that as modest means, but I do not think that any Opposition Member would regard an income of £25,000 a year as modest. He talks about the classic Conservative widow and cries at the Dispatch Box about the widow of modest means who suddenly discovers that she has become liable for capital gains tax because she has invested in a company trading with South Africa. Elsewhere, in other investment, she will already have had to make a capital gain of £6,300 in that year alone, but that widow of modest means was not sharp enough to know that she was investing in South African companies. We recognise that the Financial Secretary, unfortunately, has maintained his usual standard in replying to the debate.

4.30 pm

The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) fell below his usual standard in his contribution to the debate. Clearly he has not listened to what I said in moving the amendment. He said that he regarded it as objectionable that Opposition Members should claim a monopoly of concern over what is happening in South Africa. I specifically said, and took care to say, that I recognised that some Conservative Members were concerned about South Africa. The hon. Gentleman did not listen. I accepted that some Conservative Members, such as the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), who may be a Johnny-come-lately, said today for the first time that he shared the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) about what is happening in South Africa.

I was careful not to claim a monopoly of concern. The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden is prepared to complain about what is happening in South Africa, like the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). In fact, I am not sure about the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden. His hon. Friend the Member for Grantham was prepared to condemn what was happening, but he said that he took pride in some of the things that were happening. I see very little in which to take pride in South Africa.

Mr. Hirst: The hon. Gentleman, in turn, is falling short of his usual standard. I made it absolutely plain that I admired the positive and progressive way in which British investments in South Africa had advanced the economic and, in turn, political rights and conditions of people who work in South Africa. I fear that the hon. Gentleman has misconstrued my words. I should be interested to hear him say whether he accepts my proposition that his amendment will wreck the prospect of personal equity plans being successful in this country.

Mr. Davis: If I misconstrued what the hon. Gentleman said, I apologise unreservedly, because that is not my wont. Nevertheless, he objected to the alleged claim of a monopoly of concern by the Opposition. That has not occurred during debate. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will find an opportunity to apologise for that.

The hon. Gentleman made an important and interesting point about the effect on the British economy, which I shall deal with later. However, first, I should like to deal with the hon. Member for Grantham, who told us that he is deeply opposed to the policies of the South African Government and that he could conceive that additional measures I think that he meant sanctions may be necessary if his right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary returns empty-handed from South Africa, and there are not improvements in the situation there.

The hon. Member for Grantham said that the amendment represented sanctions by the back door. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), I would much prefer sanctions by the front door. Unfortunately, we are not getting sanctions by the front door. We must look for other ways in which to express our concern and dissociate ourselves from economic policies that are bolstering and supporting the South African Government.

The hon. Member for Grantham also said that it was wrong to approach the matter in a piecemeal way. Again, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said, I would prefer it if we could approach the matter in a comprehensive way and had a list of sanctions to be imposed upon the South African Government. Unfortunately, that matter is not before us. We have to deal with matters as they come before us and in the form in which they come before us. Today we are dealing with the Finance Bill and a schedule in it.

This Bill extends economic involvement in South Africa, and we say that it is wrong to increase the involvement of British investors in South Africa at present. If my amendment were accepted, it would still remain legal for people to invest in South Africa, but they would not get tax incentives to do so. Surely it is wrong for the British Government to give tax relief to people, to encourage them to invest, when that investment may go into companies that are taking part in economic suppression in South Africa.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The hon. Gentleman's argument is most eloquent. He will recognise that his amendment would penalise companies that are trading with other companies that have an interest in South Africa. Was that a drafting mistake on his part, or was it intended?

Mr. Davis: It was my intention to avoid any loopholes. If the hon. Gentleman co-operated with us, in his new enthusiasm for measures to cope with the situation in South Africa, in drafting amendments that will not penalise companies that inadvertently do small business with other companies that are active in South Africa, we would welcome his assistance. That assumes that we share the ultimate objective. I do not think that we do. Unfortunately, that is the problem. Therefore, we must rely on my poor efforts of draftsmanship, which will encompass companies that do business with other companies that are active in South Africa.

The hon. Member for Grantham also said that it was wrong to approach the matter by way of statute law because statute is inflexible. I have a great deal of sympathy with that point. However, the answer lies in the hands of the Government. They have put a restriction on personal equity plans, but they have not put it in the Bill. It is not in the schedule. They have put it in a green document called "Prospectus for Potential Plan Managers". The Government have included in that prospectus, published by the Board of Inland Revenue, a restriction that requires that the shares must be in a company which is a United Kingdom incorporated company quoted on the stock exchange. If it would be inflexible to put the measure into statute law, as the hon. Member for Grantham said, let us have something in the prospectus instead. We should tell the potential plan managers that the measure will be included in regulations, which will be published, so that they can be amended when, on the happy day that cannot come too quickly for my hon. Friends and myself, the South African Government change. I fear that it will have to be the South African Government who change. The present one will not change their policies. On that day we can drop this little sanction. If the Government said that, I would withdraw my amendment. I appreciate the point that was made by the hon. Member for Grantham, but that is not what the Government said. The Financial Secretary did not give us that olive branch. He did not say, "We did not want to be so inflexible by writing the measure into the statute book." He has left us with no alternative. The Government will not do anything. They will not introduce any such restriction.

If the Government had said, "We shall let the measure go into statute law," of course, the situation might change and the hon. Member for Grantham would say to the House of Commons, "We must remove that restriction." Then it would be open for the Government to bring in one of their famous retrospective Bills. We are now used to dealing with their retrospective Bills. We have the retrospective Rate Support Grants Bill, which makes legal something which was illegal. It was admitted to be illegal by the Secretary of State for the Environment in a court of law. Yet, retrospectively, the Government will make it legal.

Similarly, the Government could introduce a Bill that retrospectively gave tax relief on investments in South Africa for the period between the change in the South African Government or in their policies and when the Government were able to get the Bill through Parliament. In the meantime, the Government could give us one of their extra-statutory concessions that we heard about in Committee. We can have an extra-statutory concession to exempt American service men from paying road tax while the Finance Bill goes through the House of Commons. I would not oppose a similar extra-statutory concession in these circumstances. Therefore, we shall not take too seriously that objection from the hon. Member for Grantham. This is not a case of imposing sanctions on people who are already doing business in South Africa.

Mr. Hirst: How does the hon. Gentleman propose to enforce the amendment? Upon whom will the obligation fall to determine whether a group has or has not traded with South Africa, or has or has not invested in South Africa and, more particularly, has or has not traded with a connected party that may or may not have traded with South Africa?

Mr. Davis: That is a fair point. I would envisage the measure working in this way. The plan manager, who has responsibility for the administration of the personal equity plan, would be responsible for ensuring that investments took place only in the shares of companies that were not disqualified, in the same way in which he must take care that investment takes place only in shares in United Kingdom incorporated companies quoted on the stock exchange. Of course, he would depend on the information provided by the companies. That is what I would expect. If companies in this country are as anxious as they should be to ensure changes in South Africa, to honour the law and to honour the wishes of Parliament, I would expect them to be able to provide that information which, in my experience, is not difficult to provide. The amendment would ensure that tax incentives should not be given to people to encourage them to invest in South Africa.

Mr. Hirst rose

Mr. Davis: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman several times.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for trying to tell the House how he would enforce the amendment. I ask him to address himself to one further point: how would he deal with a situation in which a fund manager, in good faith, invests in a company which has no such dealings in South Africa, but which, in the same tax year as the tax allowance is given, suddenly discovers that the company has subsequently some transaction in South Africa? What is the position of the personal equity plan holder in those circumstances?

Mr. Davis: I would be prepared to accept a plea of good faith as a defence in any sort of proceedings.

The hon. Members for Stockton, South and for Strathkelvin and Bearsden gave the game away because it was they who said it was difficult to find any leading company which was not involved in South Africa. The hon. Member for Stockton, South went further because he told the House that he regarded the personal equity plan as a poor scheme — a mouse of a scheme. When the Financial Secretary used those words in his speech, he was quoting from the hon. Gentleman. I must tell the Financial Secretary that I do not attach too much importance to those criticisms. The Minister should not take such criticism seriously because, if he took the trouble to read reports of our previous proceedings, he would know that, at one time, the hon. Member welcomed the personal equity plan. I do not mean that another spokesman for the alliance welcomed the plan — I will come to that later — but the hon. Member for Stockton, South told the House that he was "pleased . . . to welcome the Government's announced intention to examine the possibility of giving tax relief on profit-sharing".

I think he was referring to this personal equity plan because he went on to say:

"Similarly, we support in principle the Government's proposals for tax relief and other benefits for people buying shares for the personal equity plan." [Official Report, 20 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 456.]

What was pleasure has now become a criticism of this mouse of a scheme. But even pleasure was something of a change because the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) had previously said that he gave the personal equity plan an unqualified welcome.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will the hon. Gentleman at least have the good grace to read the whole of the speech? Perhaps he will read the remarks which I made in the Budget debate wherein, as the Minister rightly said, I welcomed the principle — I still do — of the plan. But it is being introduced in such an ineffective way that it can rightly be described as a mouse of a scheme. That does not mean that the principle is wrong and that is why, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, I sought to move amendments in Committee.

Mr. Davis: I believe we are getting closer to the heart of alliance policy, which is that it wishes to give more tax relief.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Yes.

Mr. Davis: The hon. Gentleman says yes, but his party opposed taking a penny off income tax. It objected to taking a penny off the income tax of those on low earnings, yet it wishes to give more money to people who earn £25,000 a year and invest in shares on the stock exchange. That is its priority.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is beginning to sound very much like a regurgitation of a Committee stage debate. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will return to the amendment.

Mr. Davis: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: As I am sure the hon. Gentleman has studied the Order Paper closely, and as he participated in last year's debate, he will be aware that our proposals are contained clearly in an amendment to the Finance Bill. It outlines the scheme that we would introduce.

Mr. Davis: I thank the hon. Member for that trailer. Now we all know where the hon. Member for Stockton, South stands.

I wish to deal with the more serious remarks of the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden. He told us that there was hardly a leading company which did not trade with South Africa and he argued that the House should oppose the amendment because it would emasculate the personal equity plan. I did not make that claim; I am not going to describe the amendment as a mouse, but I did not claim that it would emasculate the personal equity plan. However, having listened to the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), I realise that it is clear that British business is so deeply enmeshed in the South African economy that it would be difficult for savers — these people of modest means, £25,000 a year — to invest in the shares of companies which are not undertaking business in South Africa, trading with companies undertaking business in South Africa or doing business with the South African Government.

4.45 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North came to the heart of the matter when he said that it is not enough to say that one is opposed to the system in South Africa; the question is, what are we to do about it? This is one small measure, but at least it sends a message to the South African Government. We are not prepared to allow the British Government to give tax relief to people who invest in the economy of that most evil regime. Therefore, I ask my hon. Friends to support me in the Division Lobby.

Question put, That the amendment be made:

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Archie Hamilton and
Mr. Gerald Malone.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move amendment No. 49A, in page 120, line 16, after 'income tax', insert ', corporation tax'.

This is a technical amendment which is necessary if the Government should decide to allow dividends from personal equity plan shares to be paid gross. This point has arisen from the proposal that such dividends can be rolled up tax free in the plan. The original intention was that dividends should be subject to the normal advance corporation tax rules, and that plan managers would reclaim the tax credits from the Revenue in the normal way.

Some potential plan managers have argued that this could increase the costs of administration and, therefore, the cost of personal equity plans to investors. It has been claimed that that problem could be solved by allowing companies to pay dividends gross in those circumstances. At present we are considering that in consultation with the various interested parties which would be affected by the procedure, but we are not yet able to make an announcement.

Therefore, we are moving this amendment in case we decide in due course that allowing payment of dividends gross would be the right course. The amendment enables the regulations to include provision for the purpose of the administration of corporation tax because we would be changing a detailed aspect of the ACT rules. If the Government decide against gross payments, the amendment would not be needed. Schedule 8 enables the Treasury to make regulations setting out the detailed rules of the scheme. The amendment enables the regulations to cover the ACT provisions for dividends and the gross or net point.

I stress to the House that, although we are taking this power, no decision has been made. We felt it right to make the amendment at this stage because we want the scheme to be launched on 1 January. We are considering this and consulting on it.

Mr. Terry Davis: Before the Minister sits down, can he give us an assurance that whichever course the Government follow it will not make any difference to the cost to the Revenue, and that it is simply a matter of administration?

Mr. Lamont: That is right.

Amendment agreed to.

New Clause 2

VALUE-ADDED TAX—PENALTIES

'In section 15 of the Finance Act 1985 (value-added tax: failure to notify liability for registration) after subsection (4) there shall be added the following subsection:

"(4A) Any penalty imposed by this section may be reduced to such lesser amount as appears to the Commissioners or, on appeal, to a value-added tax tribunal to be just and reasonable in all the circumstances of the case."'—[Mr. Blair.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 2 is of major importance to small traders. It is widely supported by groups representing the self-employed and small business men and it will be a crucial test of whether the Government's proclamations about the worth of small businesses are rooted in propaganda or practice.

The Keith committee, which reported in 1983, effectively recommended that value added tax offences should be decriminalised but that a system of automatic penalties should be brought into being. The sanction of the criminal law was to be taken away, but there were to be automatic penalties, in order to speed up the process of bringing to justice those in default of VAT.

It was pointed out in volume 2, chapter 20 of the report that the Inland Revenue had the power of mitigation in respect of income tax offences and that that power was useful as a bargaining counter and in order to avoid hardship. In chapter 18, the Keith committee recommended extending that power of mitigation to VAT offences and penalties. The Keith committee—the body that gave rise to the provisions in last year's Finance Act in relation to VAT—recommended that there be a power of mitigation for all VAT penalties, including the new offence of civil fraud, in which case the committee recommended the power to mitigate down to 50 per cent. of the penalty.

The Government rejected the view of the Keith committee and rejected a new clause tabled by Labour last year. At present, therefore, there is no mitigation in the case of VAT offences and someone who is in breach of the VAT regulations can escape penalty only if he can show a defence of reasonable excuse. Only in those circumstances can he escape the full rigour of the law. The effect is, for example, that someone who deliberately fails to register for VAT is treated in exactly the same way as someone who innocently fails to register.

The new clause is a very modest proposal. It would allow the power of mitigation, but only on late registrations for VAT, where someone's turnover exceeds the requisite level for VAT but he fails to register in time. That power of mitigation would be given both to the commissioners for Customs and Excise and to the VAT tribunal.

The need for action is both urgent and easily demonstrable.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Am I right in thinking that the penalty imposed for a default is a fixed penalty, fixed either by statute or by statutory instrument, and the commissioners or the tribunal have no power to impose a different penalty?

Mr. Blair: There is a fixed penalty referable to 30 per cent. of the amount of VAT in, say, the quarter in which the person should have registered. The penalty is fixed in that sense by reference to a percentage of the amount of tax due. At present there is no power to abate that in circumstances in which the commissioners or the tribunal might think it reasonable to do so. In a number of cases that have appeared before it, the VAT tribunal has drawn attention to the substantial injustice to small traders that arises from an absence of a power of mitigation.

The Rhodes case came before the VAT tribunal on 31 March 1986. In that case Lord Grantchester, the president of the tribunal, said in express terms that he regretted the absence of any power of mitigation. That case precisely illustrates the problems faced by small traders because of the absence of the power of mitigation. A small trader started a debt collection agency. In the year to 31 March 1985 the amount of turnover was well below the registration limit for VAT. In the following quarter the turnover exceeded £6,500, the level above which one should register for VAT. The trader did not know that she had to register her agency when that limit was exceeded. She found out only during a conversation with her accountant, a quarter later. As soon as she told the accountant what the turnover was, he told her to apply for registration. She did so immediately, received a form from Customs and Excise and replied by return. She then issued back invoices to all the customers with reference to the quarter during which she should have registered for VAT, so ensuring that no tax was lost to Customs and Excise.

The VAT tribunal accepted that she had behaved entirely innocently. There had been no loss to Customs and Excise and, indeed, the trader herself had volunteered the information to Customs and Excise that enabled the penalty to be levied. In his judgment, Lord Grantchester said that he had to dismiss the appeal because the trader's innocence did not amount to a reasonable excuse in law and so she had no defence for her failure to register in time. However, he continued:

"I dismiss this appeal. I do so with regret. Had there been criminal proceedings requiring the imposition of a fine, I would have taken full account of the mitigating circumstances. Little or no tax has been lost and all books and documents have been adjusted retrospectively so that for practical purposes, they now record what they would have recorded if the Appellant had duly complied with the relevant requirements. But neither the Commissioners nor this Tribunal has been entrusted with such a power to mitigate a fixed penalty."

In successive cases, other chairmen of VAT tribunals have made the same point. No fewer than three VAT tribunal chairmen, other than the president of the VAT tribunal, have drawn attention to the injustice that has occurred.

These traders are all people who run very small businesses. They are usually self-employed. A French polisher may be involved, or a small furniture business. In the last couple of weeks, the case of Mr. Pearson has been decided. Mr. Pearson is a decorator who failed to register for VAT in time. The chairman of the VAT tribunal, having said that again he could not say that there was a defence, because ignorance of the law is no defence, then said:

"Since I have no power to mitigate the penalty, I did not explore matters which went solely to mitigation. It was apparent that there were many such matters, in particular the transparent honesty of the Appellant, his (and his accountant's) prompt and full disclosure of the facts to the Commissioners and, subject to clearance of the Appellant's cheque, the fact that no tax has been lost to the Commissioners."

I understand that many more cases are pending before the VAT tribunal. It is clear that the absence of any power of mitigation is causing substantial injustice. All the cases before the VAT tribunal have features in common. First, it is accepted that all the people acted in good faith and honesty. Secondly, their only fault was ignorance of the law. Thirdly, there has been no loss to Customs and Excise, and fourthly, and perhaps most importantly, the people involved are all small traders in a very small way of business.

It is generally accepted in the House that there is, and will continue to be, a growth in the number of small businesses and self-employed people. In my own constituency, many people have used redundancy money from their factories to start up their own businesses. Such people are often not aware of all the intricacies of form-filling, VAT and so on and they can get into difficulties. The absence of any power for the VAT commissioners or the tribunal to mitigate penalties is a substantial block on the establishment of new businesses.

The Government have put forward only two arguments why such a power of mitigation should not be accepted. First, the Government say that there has been a considerable increase in the speed of registration since the system of automatic penalties was introduced. In other words, there has been a diminution in the amount of late registrations.

I accept that that is the case and I welcome it. But, with great respect, there has been a speeding up of registrations for VAT because of the introduction of automatic penalties. It has nothing to do with the absence of the power of mitigation. I can see no logical or practical reason why the absence of a power of mitigation should speed up VAT registrations. Indeed, many of the cases before the VAT tribunal involve people who have been ignorant of the fact that they have to register for VAT. So automatic penalties were not a factor governing whether they registered.

The second and perhaps more surprising argument that was put forward in Committee in answer to the clause moved by the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) was that a power of mitigation would increase the number of civil servants that were needed to deal with mitigation. That is a classic example of how, as so often, the Government misunderstand the nature of the problems of bureaucracy. It is not civil servants who cause problems of bureaucracy but unnecessary rules of civil servants doing work with no useful purpose. Civil servants properly used, for example, assisting small businesses in setting up and overcoming their problems, are a positive bonus to small businesses and should not be regarded as some obstruction.

The Financial Secretary should consider the new clause, from the point of view of cutting not the costs of the Civil Service, but the burdens on small businesses. I use the words "cutting the burdens" because we have heard a lot from the Government about how they want to lift the burdens on small businesses. They have published two White Papers in the past two years, one called "Lifting the Burdens" and one called "Building Businesses — Not Barriers".

The Government introduced legislation on small businesses because a Department of Trade and Industry survey said that red tape was a problem, and the single most important item of red tape to which small businesses referred was value added tax. There was huge concern among small traders about the injustice of automatic penalties with no power of mitigation.

I have been through the White Paper "Building Businesses — Not Barriers" and as a piece of second-rate propaganda it takes some beating. When one looks at the Government's proposals on value added tax, most are elementary, such as allowing traders to make monthly rather than three-monthly accounts. I do not know how that is of great assistance to the small trader, but it is put forward as a great proposal by the Government.

[Mr. Blair]

Hon Members will find it amusing that the Government also include as one of the great steps that they have taken for small businesses the fact that they have revised guidance on the treatment of motoring costs after full consultation with business. A naive person reading those lines would think that the Government have helped to simplify the problems of VAT on fuel for motorists, but, as we learnt in Committee, what has actually happened is that the Government have introduced a system of standard computations of VAT on fuel which has saved the Government about £50 million. The notion that sucking £50 million out of the ordinary trader and motorist is some great bonus to small businesses is laughable. The truth is that when the Government are presented with a small but practical instance of how they can help small traders such as is suggested in new clause 2, they do not seem to be interested.

New clause 2 is a test for the Government. It has widespread support and it is difficult to see what coherent arguments there are against it. It is supported by those who specialise in value added tax work. It has been tacitly recommended by the tribunal chairmen who have to administer the system and it is widely supported by small businesses and the self-employed.

The test for the Government is whether they are more interested in headlines for themselves than in help for the small businesses, in publishing White Papers that are long on promises and short on practice, or in doing something that is really worthwhile for Britain's self-employed and small businesses. New clause 2 is such a clause and I recommend it to the House.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I shall not speak for long because I am looking forward to hearing my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary's reasons for not accepting the new clause. Looking at it in general terms, I think that the new clause is good and that it requires support.

As a general principle I have always been against fixed penalties. I have also been against minimum penalties. Indeed, that is the view that the Government have adopted in the criminal law ever since I have been in the House. On various occasions some of my hon. Friends have called for minimum penalties for this or that offence under the criminal law and the Government have always resisted, in my view rightly. The same general principle applies to fixed penalties.

5.15 pm

All penalties — whether minimum penalties, fixed penalties or penalties of any kind — must have some regard to the degree of culpability involved. Failure of registration in VAT cases may be a deliberate act of fraud. That is an extreme degree of culpability. On the other hand, failure to register might come about from a much smaller degree of culpability — for example, illness, the destruction of documents or ignorance. That is another and quite different degree of culpability.

It is wrong in principle that a penalty should be imposed that does not reflect the degree of culpability involved on the part of the person who has offended. Therefore, as a matter of general principle, I am highly sympathetic to new clause 2.

I am aware that the Government say that fixed penalties have necessarily resulted in an increase in the number of registrations. I have two comments to make on that. First, I suspect that the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is right in his explanation for the increase in the number of registrations, but there is another point, too. There is always a natural tension between the desire on the part of the Executive to do those things that are convenient to it, on the one hand, and the desire of the legislature to ensure natural justice, on the other. If I hear that argument advanced by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary today — I fancy that I shall, although he will cloak it in his usual eloquent and charming manner — I must tell him that I am in favour of natural justice, not the Executive.

Having made those few remarks, I look forward to hearing my right hon. Friend tell us why we should not support new clause 2.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I echo what the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) has said. There is no logic in having a mitigation procedure for income tax but not for value added tax. One is aware of income tax procedures from one's constituency work. I have occasionally helped a constituent and been surprised at the outcome. At the end of the day a constituent often seems to have been rather well treated. In such circumstances one tends to claim some credit for such things.

A system of mitigation does exist and is operated in such circumstances. Therefore, I do not see why the powers of discretion and intelligent analysis of the background cannot be given to somebody within the area dealt with by the new clause. It is a power that cannot be unduly abused. If the Minister believes that it can be used as an excuse for putting off the payment of the tax even further, no doubt his Department, with its ingenuity, will find some way to deal with that.

The law, as it currently stands, says that there is never a harsh word within the worlds of justice, right and reason. The Government should give serious consideration to the new clause or, if an opportunity exists, at least to introduce something that approximates closely to it.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): When I first came to the House, I was told — I suppose correctly — by the Conservative Whips that it was always dangerous to listen to arguments in debate. One was supposed just to vote. To my great surprise, I discovered myself listening to the debate and, therefore, listening to the arguments of the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and of my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). I have been convinced by the arguments that the Government must be wrong if they do not accept new clause 2.

For some years, we have been saying, first, that there will be a big expansion of new businesses, which will be the Government's salvation and will do us much good at the geneal election because it will provide jobs; secondly, that we should do everything we can to support new businesses in every way. We have produced various documents, as my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and the hon. Member for Sedgefield have mentioned. We wanted to get off the backs of small businesses. We know that our constituents have problems with VAT from time to time. VAT must be collected and no one wants to make it easy for people to get out of paying it. I am not on the side of those who want to try to get round paying the tax.

We have a tribunal procedure. Presumably the merit of the tribunal is that it is flexible. If it is to make decisions on the basis of hard lines – where it does not get the chance to mitigate – it will not have the opportunity to deal with cases that may be different. If it must simply take a hard line, because that is what the Act says – the idea of the tribunal is to help businesses and to help the Government to get their proper tax income – it will be put into a difficult position and will not be able to do its job properly.

My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury should consider that and concede the new clause, or at least propose one in its place, for two reasons. First, it will help the tribunal to provide justice. Secondly, it will help small businesses, which may have made errors and which may have sought to put those errors right, when they come to the tribunal. The tribunal will be able to recognise that fact and deal with those businesses and business men differently from those who have skived and got round the VAT regulations.

If we wish to help small businesses, we must be seen to help them. The Treasury has an opportunity to do that today. I hope that it will take that opportunity, because it is within the guidelines of the Government's policy. If it does not take that opportunity, it will lead people to say, "What is all this talk about? When a Minister gets the chance to turn talk into action, he does not do it."

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I do not wish to repeat the excellent points that have already been made. On the point of small businesses being affected and the Government's claims, I would point out that there have been record bankruptcies of small businesses under this Government. The imposition and high increase of VAT has been a factor in that.

A letter from the Minister of State, Treasury went out to hon. Members only this week. In effect, it said "You will have complaints about VAT. Here is the answer." It is a complicated letter which deals with many complicated issues. Yet here we are penalising people because they honestly fall foul of the law. It might often be a matter of ignorance. Tribunal officials acknowledge that the mistakes are often innocent mistakes, yet people are penalised for them. The letter from the Minister of State is a case for the clause being accepted. As has been stated, there should be the opportunity for mitigating circumstances to be taken into account by the tribunal or the commissioners where the circumstances are just and reasonable. That is what is contained in the amendment.

The tribunal must also take into account the hardship that small businesses face. I began by mentioning the record number of bankruptcies. Some small businesses are close to bankruptcy, and the penalties might tilt them over the edge, as several hundreds of pounds can be involved in each case.

I endorse and repeat the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield and by Conservative Members. In the interests of natural justice, the Government should accept the new clause.

Mr. Norman Lamont: This subject was debated several times in Standing Committee and at the Report stage of the Finance Bill 1985, and again in Committee this year. The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) reminded the House that the Keith committee on the enforcement powers of the Revenue Departments, which was set up by my right hon. and learned Friend, the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he was Chancellor, reported on VAT in early 1983. The present position is based on the recommendations of the Keith committee, and its conclusions, which were generally in favour, after examining the subject, of fixing penalties for specific defaults. That is the position now and that is how we arrived at the decision to decriminalise offences.

As the hon. Member for Sedgefield recalled, the Government held a consultation exercise on the Keith committee's recommendations. In November 1984, we issued a consultation document which explained our intention to legislate in 1985. We put forward detailed clauses for comment.

The Keith committee wanted to balance the proposed strengthening of some of the powers of the Customs and Excise with the decriminalisation of most VAT offences and other forms of increased protection for the taxpayer. In preparing the 1984 consultation document, and between the consultation exercise and the publication of the 1985 Finance Bill, we made some important changes to the Keith proposals in favour of the taxpayer, including perhaps the most important change, the introduction of the statutory defence of reasonable excuse, which had not been generally recommended by Keith. The Finance Act 1985 was, therefore, a carefully balanced package which was introduced after full consultation with taxpayers and their representatives.

In its balanced approach, the Keith committee recognised that two particular problems concerning VAT for the Government were late payment and inaccurate accounting for the tax. The two best-known examples of these are that the average amount of VAT outstanding at any one time is about £1,200 million and the net underdeclarations of VAT found by Customs and Excise officials on control visits to business premises amounted to almost £500 million in 1985-86. Customs and Excise needed to have effective powers to encourage more timely and accurate compliance on these and other important aspects of the tax. The Keith committee therefore proposed a regime of surcharge, interest and civil penalties specifically for that purpose. Today we are discussing the civil penalties charged under section 15 of the Finance Act 1985 and especially the penalty on belated notification of liability to register for VAT.

Consistently with the Keith committee's other compliance proposals, the belated registration penalty is dependent, not on subjective factors, but on an objective test as to whether the registration is late. There is a right to appeal to the VAT tribunals on grounds of reasonable excuse or against the liability to register, or if Customs and Excise appears to have made an error in its calculation of the penalty assessment. Beyond that the penalty is fixed at the rate of 30 per cent. of the tax liability for the period by which the registration is late. There is no provision for mitigation.

5.30 pm

The hon. Member for Sedgefield referred to Keith's views on mitigation. It is true that Keith recommended that Customs and Excise should have the general power to mitigate penalties, but he also said that the use of that power should be restricted to exceptional cases. Keith had proposed that mitigation should be limited to exceptional cases of financial hardship, injustice or difficult points of tax liability. The last item on that list is fully covered by "reasonable excuse". For the other two, as my right hon.

[Mr. Norman Lamont]

Friend explained last year, Customs and Excise already have the power, subject to the supervision of the Public Accounts Committee and the Comptroller and Auditor General, to remit tax extra-statutorily in wholly exceptional cases on grounds of equity or compassion. It is the Government's view that those powers should be adequate similarly to cover penalties, interest and surcharge in such exceptional circumstances.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield has argued that there should be a power to reduce the penalty in particular circumstances to recognise the different weights of offence, including the question of the taxpayers' co-operation with the Customs and Excise investigation. I can assure him that any liability to late registration penalty – and, indeed, most of the other civil penalties – will be decided by simple objective tests concerned with the lateness of the registration. It follows that the quicker the taxpayer co-operates with Customs and Excise and discloses his late registration, the less will be the turnover that he will have accumulated while unregistered. The hon. Member for Sedgefield may not have said this today, but he will forgive me if I have been reading in Hansard some of the speeches that he made on other occasions. I observe that the hon. Gentleman nods. I am sure that he thinks that it is not a very good argument – indeed, I agree with him in that – but he will forgive me for having knocked down the argument that he put forward.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In almost every penalty that I can think of within the criminal or civil law, the authority that has the power to impose the penalty has the power to vary a penalty in accordance with the degree of culpability involved. For the life of me, I cannot see why that general principle should not apply to late registration.

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend has made his position very clear on this. That is the view that he has taken, and he says that there should be no exception to that principle. This departure from that principle was fully debated and paraded with the Keith recommendations. Although my hon. Friend does not like the situation, it should not be a novelty to him. It has been in position since the recommendations of Keith, and it was because of the need to achieve greater compliance that the regime was adopted.

As my hon. Friend may know, I pick up this point simply because the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) referred to the difference between the treatment of VAT and the treatment of income tax. Keith is being implemented in stages. There are other parts of Keith that the Government are still considering and that will be implemented this year. The question of the Keith recommendations on income tax is being examined by the Government. The implementation of Keith is happening by stages.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Time has moved on since then. We do not stick to a line if a position is reached where we think that modification might be an advantage. It is some time now since Keith. We have decided as a Government that we are going to be as helpful as we can to small businesses. Surely the Government can decide that, although they took a line at the time which they say was effective, they do not now need to stick to that line because time has moved on, and they can give the tribunal the flexibility that it says it would like.

Mr. Lamont: I note what my hon. Friend says, but not very much time has moved on. I shall be coming to the question of a review of these procedures later in my remarks, if my hon. Friend will bear with me.

I certainly agree that the effects would be limited if the power of mitigation was limited to section 15 penalties alone, as proposed in the new clause. I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Sedgefield would go further and would want to see mitigation much more widely. I ask the House to remember that there are two sides to the question of non-compliance with VAT-registration requirements. We have heard about certain cases in which penalties for late registration have been imposed. The hon. Gentleman may care to reflect that, while these businesses remained unregistered, many of their commercial competitors were already registered and having to account for VAT. We receive many complaints, particularly from the building and catering industries, about the problems that VAT-registered traders can face in competing for business with unregistered competitors. There is a great deal of pressure from the business community for compliance and fair competition. Non-compliance is not fair competition. That has to be borne in mind.

Mr. Blair: Nobody is suggesting that there should not be compliance with VAT regulations – of course there should be. The situations with which we are dealing are those in which there has been an innocent non-compliance. It should always be borne in mind that the power of mitigation depends precisely on the VAT tribunal commissioners thinking it right to exercise it.

Mr. Lamont: I agree with what the hon. Gentleman was saying, and I was not in any way suggesting that he felt otherwise. The question is whether effective compliance can be achieved if we abandon the method that Keith concluded was necessary. Keith recommended mitigation in a very prescribed circumstance. The Government came to the conclusion that was not necessary after giving effect to the other alteration involving "reasonable excuse" that the Minister of State announced in Committee last year.

We have had now almost a full year's experience in the operation of belated registration penalties. In the period from Royal Assent last year to 30 June this year there were about 172,000 new registrations for VAT. Belated registration penalties under section 15 have been imposed in about 3,700 cases, a rate of just over 2 per cent. of all new registrations in the period. Customs and Excise has accepted pleas of reasonable excuse for late registration in a further 187 cases.

That brings me to the purpose of the new system, which sometimes seems to be overlooked. The purpose is not, of course, to see how many penalties can be imposed but to improve compliance with the law. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) was sceptical about it, Customs and Excise says that it has detected a marked improvement in compliance during the last year. There is no doubt that many potential taxpayers and, perhaps more importantly, their professional advisers are increasingly realising that timely compliance with the registration requirements is important. It is by the yardstick of improvement in compliance that the penalty system must be ultimately judged.

My hon. Friends the Members for Grantham and for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) said that sufficient time had elapsed and that the time had come for modification. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Hayhoe) was Minister of State last year he gave an undertaking that the new penalty system would be carefully monitored. That reassurance was reiterated in the White Paper. Indeed, in paragraph 6.5 there is a specific commitment that

"the system as a whole, including the operation of penalties and of reasonable excuse, will be reviewed by Ministers, before the 1988 budget, after a full year's practical experience."

I repeat that the review will be after a full year's practical experience, because we wish also to examine the effects of the surcharge that is to be applied in the case of persistent underpayment as from 1 October 1986. A single review covering both phases is justifiable, since a commitment has been given that both of these matters, taken together, will be reviewed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the review will extend not only to the mechanics but to the justice of what is being done?

Mr. Lamont: I am sure that that will be very carefully considered. We shall pay careful attention to all the representations.

We stand by that commitment, which offers safeguards for the long-term interests of the taxpayer. In the meantime, the taxpayer is benefiting substantially from the reasonable excuse provisions that were introduced, even though they had not been generally recommended by Keith.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: I believe that 136 out of 3,000 appeals were allowed under the reasonable excuse provisions. That is not a very high figure. Will my right hon. Friend try to persuade the commissioners to be more realistic in placing reasonable excuse at the forefront of their considerations?

Mr. Lamont: About 5 per cent. of potential cases were allowed, but what has been said in this debate will certainly be noted.

The pursuit of the alternative of mitigation is not right. Mitigation would serve only to erode the valuable tax compliance benefits of the package and would open the gates to appeals. We should then lose many of the benefits that we are now beginning to gain.

I understand the unease and the points that have been made on both sides of the House. I assure my hon. Friends the Members for Grantham and for Stamford and Spalding that the commitment to a review before the 1988 Budget stands. Therefore, I cannot advise my hon. Friends to accept the Opposition's new clause.

Mr. Blair: The Financial Secretary to the Treasury says that there has been much greater compliance with VAT registration since the introduction of the Keith committee's recommendations. With respect, I do not understand how the absence of the power of mitigation can be said to have affected compliance under the VAT regulations. The point made by the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) is fundamental, but I hope he will forgive me if I do not pursue it.

I realise that the existence of automatic penalties means that there has been an increase in compliance, but the new clause does not touch the automatic penalties system. That remains in being. Therefore, the Keith committee's fundamental proposal will be untouched by the new clause. It is ludicrous to suggest that the existence of a power of mitigation will encourage people not to comply with the original law, yet that is the effect of what the Financial Secretary has said.

It is not the case that we have no experience upon which to form a judgment. During the last few months there have been cases before the value added tax tribunal in which not just the president but the president and three different chairmen have specifically pointed to the injustice of the absence of a power to mitigate.

As the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir. K. Lewis) said, we have the benefit of experience. We know that there is an injustice here. That injustice is recognised not merely by traders but by those who practise in the value added tax area. It is not good enough to ask us to await the outcome of a review that is to take place in a few months' time which will cover a whole range of different matters. An injustice exists now and we have been provided with an opportunity to remedy it.

If we really care about small businesses and if what we are saying is not mere rhetoric but has a touch of reality about it, those who go through the Lobby and vote for the new clause will be pinning their colours to the mast of small businesses, while those who do not will forfeit their right to be called the friends of small businesses.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 4

CAPITAL ALLOWANCES—RELIEF FOR EXPENDITURE TO PROVIDE ACCESS FOR DISABLED WORKERS

"(1) If a person carrying on a trade or profession has on or after 1st August 1986 incurred expenditure on building works or equipment designed to facilitate access to his premises by disabled workers and an allowance or deduction in respect of the expenditure could not, apart from this section, be made in taxing the trade or profession or computing the profits or gains arising from it, Chapter I of Part III of the Finance Act 1971 shall apply as if the expenditure were capital expenditure incurred on the provision of plant or machinery for the purposes of the trade or profession, and as if the machinery or plant had, in consequence of his incurring the expenditure, belonged to him; and as if the disposal value of the plant or machinery were nil.

(2) This section shall be construed as if contained in Chapter I of Part III of the Finance Act 1971.

(3) In this section "disabled workers" means persons, being registered disabled under the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944, who are engaged or employed to work on the premises in question, or who could be engaged or employed to work on the premises in question but for being disabled, and whose mobility is restricted by physical injury or infirmity."

[Mr. Blair.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Blair: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause will enable an employer to claim capital allowances for alterations to his premises or for the construction of premises designed to assist access to the workplace for disabled workers. The capital allowance given under the new clause would be 25 per cent. on a reducing balance basis. This clause is limited in scope, but it is extremely important for the rights of disabled people. It covers only access, but access is an important element in disabled people being able to obtain and retain employment. For example, it would cover the installation of wheel ramps, specially widened doors, grab rails and braille signs.

At present, capital allowance relief is given to an employer for plant and machinery. That covers everything. It could, for example, cover the installation of a lift for the use of disabled people. That is merely coincidental, because the relief is given for plant and machinery generally. Alternatively, an employer could claim an industrial buildings allowance, and that would give him some form of tax relief for the construction of a building. That simply coincides with general relief, but it may contain some element of help for disabled people. However, it does not cover, for example, shop or office units and it does not apply if an industrial building is already in use. The new clause would allow the employer to claim capital allowance relief if he was altering or constructing premises so that disabled people could gain access to them. We believe that it would be of significant benefit to disabled people.

It is worth pointing to the items upon which employers already claim capital allowance relief. The chairman's company car is treated as an item of plant and machinery for which capital allowances are available. The chairman's cocktail cabinet, and the Wedgwood or Royal Doulton teacups in his room can be treated as items for which capital allowances are available. Apparently, even the potted plants can be designated as plant and machinery and are thus eligible for capital allowance relief. If capital allowance relief can be claimed on all those things, why should specially constructed access for the disabled fall outside the scope of that tax relief? Grants of up to £6 000 are already available to provide access for the disabled, and grants can be claimed through the disablement advisory service. Thus, some help is already given to disabled people when it comes to obtaining access to their places of employment.

Perhaps I could point to the limitations on the grant system operated through the Manpower Services Commission. First, those grants are available only if access is being specially constructed in order to retain or recruit a specific person. In other words, a grant towards constructing access to the workplace can be obtained only if a specific person is targeted, either because the employer wants to employ him or because he wants to retain him. Thus, the employer has to have a person in mind before he can apply for the grant. If the grant is obtained, the works must be carried out before the person can gain access to the workplace.

Secondly, I should be grateful if the Financial Secretary could confirm that those disablement grants can be sanctioned up to a limit of only £500 at local level. I understand that for sums above that level there must be referral to headquarters, which requires at least three estimates of the work proposed before allowing the employer to carry it out.

There is a general feeling among disabled groups that there are significant bureaucratic obstructions to access to the workplace being provided. I understand from the figures that I have obtained from the MSC that, in the last year for which figures are available, only 165 such applications were granted. We therefore believe that a more general approach is necessary.

There is a twofold advantage to using capital allowances. First, an employer can change the work premises or construct access for the disabled without having to target a particular person. In other words, he could alter his premises, and the disabled person would then compete for a job within an environment of equality of opportunity. That is an important reason for seeing the capital allowance system as a useful complement to the grants that are already available through the MSC.

The second advantage may seem somewhat esoteric to my hon. Friends, but it is important. At present, the grant system operated through the MSC is advertised in a series of booklets put out by the MSC or by the Department of Employment. But there might be more of an incentive if accountants knew that capital allowance relief was available to employers if they wanted to take advantage of it. If an employer was thinking of altering his premises, the accountant might suggest that special access for the disabled could be included as plant and machinery. That employer would then create the premises that would enable a disabled person to compete for a job on equal terms with a person who does not suffer from any disability. There would also be an advantage in the by-product for the customer.

It is worth noting the number of people who suffer from some disability. The 1983 household survey showed that about 19 per cent. of working people reckoned that they were limited in some way through disability. I understand that the number of those registered disabled under the 1944 Act is well in excess of 400,000. That puts into perspective the 165 applications for special grants made through the MSC.

Some of my hon. Friends may raise the question of quotas, so I shall say only that it is extraordinary that there have been 10 prosecutions since 1944 for breaching statutory obligations in relation to the quota system. Since March 1979 there has not been a single prosecution for breach of the quota regulations. Therefore, one is entitled to say that we must not be complacent about the incentives given to disabled people.

Thanks in great measure to the activities of my hon. Friends, the profile of the disabled and public awareness of the problems that they face have been heightened. I make no apology for saying that this is the right time for this new clause. Today, Royal Assent has been given to the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill, which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). There is no more fitting time to move this new clause. It is an earnest of our good intentions towards the disabled, and I have pleasure in commending it to the House.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I am pleased to support the new clause. If I had seen it early enough, I would have added my name to it. It represents a step in the right direction, although its scope within this Bill must of necessity be limited.

The question of developing policies to help to integrate disabled people into the workplace has been underlined over the years. It was highlighted in section 8(2)(a) of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970, which the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) did so much work to promote. It was also highlighted in the Snowdon report on integrating the disabled. It is worth quoting the recommendations of the Snowdon working party. No. 20 says:

"The premise on which our Sub-Committee's philosophy is based is that employment itself is crucial to the integration of disabled persons of employable age within the life of the community, and that such employment should, so far as is practicable, be as similar as possible to that of able-bodied people in respect of conditions of work, status and pay."

Recommendation No. 37 stated:

"There is need to improve the access of places to work for disabled people. In some instances the provision of hostel accommodation is advocated – in others financial assistance to make it easier for the disabled people to move nearer to their place of work."

Obviously, the ability of disabled people to get to their places of work and to be taken on was a major factor in the working party's thinking. The report was published in 1976, yet we have made relatively little progress.

There have been changes in building regulations, and so on, but there is a general feeling that the time may be right to look to the carrot as well as to the whip of regulations and restrictive legislation. Whether the carrot consists of grants or tax incentives, it must be considered. The legislation that has been put on the statute book in recent years has largely dealt with existing factories, offices or shops, and has sought to ensure that new buildings provide access for disabled people.

However, we have not been able to attack in as meaningful a way as we should have the problem of existing buildings. As they represent 95 per cent. of all construction, we must consider ways of improving access to them for disabled people. That may be one important way to help, although it is not the only way. If the allowances which the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) referred to when moving the new clause are available for the range of expenditures that he highlighted, both sides of the House would feel that the grants should be available to improve facilities for disabled people.

The point made by the hon. Member for Sedgefield about the need to get this right before individuals' specific problems are highlighted is most important. It is wrong that disabled people should be helped only when the problem arises. By definition, that makes disabled people abnormal. We should have met their needs before a question of non-discrimination or discrimination arose.

I have drawn the attention of the House previously to the slogan used in Sweden and I make no apologies for referring to it again. In Sweden they say that handicap is a relationship between a disabled person and his or her environment, be that the physical environment, social environment or the psychological environment. We may not be able to do much about a disability, but by tackling the physical environment in the context of the new clause we can do something to prevent that disability from becoming a handicap. We have an opportunity in the Bill to do something about this problem. There is a need for an attack on the problem in existing buildings, and I commend the new clause to the House.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): I hope that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will not be misled by his officials in this matter. Some of us have lived with this problem for 22 years. We are surprised when these matters are brought before us and the interpretation of these problems by officers and officials differs from our own. That is why it is important that we should accept the new clause. The Minister of State, Treasury, who handles VAT problems in the Treasury, can relate alarming cases where VAT has applied to appliances and building regulations in relation to disability. I pay tribute to the Financial Secretary's colleague for his efforts to undo the evil that has been done by officials misinterpreting the regulations in that respect. That is why the problem must be countered by a copper-bottomed new clause as part of the Bill.

I hope that the Financial Secretary will not turn down this new clause on the ground that it is unnecessary. That was the excuse used when we tried to get on to company records the provision that a statement by the directors must be contained in the annual report as to what they are doing on behalf of disabled people. The Financial Secretary is a kindly man and will think that my remarks are unnecessary. I can assure him on behalf of my hon. Friends and on behalf of his Conservative colleagues that the interpretation happens far too often to the disadvantage of the disabled.

I should like to define the nature of the problem for the benefit of the Financial Secretary. Unemployment among young people with handicap is twice that of their non-handicapped peers. The national child development study found that over a two-year period 10 times as many young handicapped people had been out of work for six months or more than had their non-handicapped fellows.

I am wearing the Rehab International tie. The symbol on the tie has become the symbol of disability in Britain. In truth, when Rehab International developed this symbol it was meant to be a symbol of access. Access is the most important factor involved in obtaining a job. There is the main problem of access to premises and the problem of access to toilets. There is also a problem about providing training areas and training equipment.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury may do his right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General a favour if he allows the new clause to be passed because it may relieve the pressure on the quota system for the employment of disabled people. That might indirectly help the Paymaster General to sustain the quota and so avoid attacks from both sides of the House because the 3 per cent. rule is not being implemented.

My hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr Clarke) has asked me to apologise to the House for his absence. He had a great success today as the Royal Assent was given to his Bill. I gather that he has been asked to account for that in another place. I hope that the House will accept his profuse apologies. I would like to deal briefly with the problem of access for mentally handicapped people.

MENCAP has a scheme called the Pathway employment services. That accounts for a substantial number of new jobs for mentally and physically handicapped people. MENCAP argues that the new clause is absolutely essential for that purpose. Let me quote what Mary Holland of MENCAP said in a letter to me:

"Physical barriers to employment for people with handicap can be overturned; social barriers created by ignorance and myth will take longer. The first step must be to ensure that people with disabilities are encouraged positively to take their place in the work force. Financial incentives will help employers to provide suitable working environments which will in turn ensure that we practise rather than preach the reality of finding work for disabled people."

6.15 pm

The new clause encapsulates the feelings of many of us about the opportunities of work for disabled people. The Government have contributed to that and the Council of Europe has produced a coherent policy for the rehabilitation of disabled people. Experts from this country and Northern Ireland have played a part in this.

MIND states that if we are to encourage employers and workers to help disabled people to enter employment and rehabilitation, we have

"to encourage employers generally to facilitate the rehabilitation of disabled workers by making suitable work available to them, if necessary after making adaptations to machinery or equipment and by giving them the opportunity to return to suitable types of employment as soon as they are medically fit for work, although not necessarily fit enough to resume their former occupation."

I do not know what messages the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is receiving from elsewhere in the House. However, I hope that those messages do not encourage him to turn down the new clause. Many of us, as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, must try, with heavy hearts, to influence Ministers who mean well but who are told by their advisers that they cannot do something because it is not in the Act. The new clause offers the Financial Secretary the chance to get this provision in the Act.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): I am sure that the new clause will be commended by all the organisations representing disabled people as a much needed clause to enable the 3 per cent. quota under the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944 to be more readily achieved. At present, more than 65 per cent. of firms in this country are outside of the law. They are not taking the 3 per cent. quota. Indeed, not one Government Department abides by the quota set in the 1944 Act.

One of the arguments often put forward by the Government when disabled people are discussed and efforts are being made to help them is that the term "disabled workers" needs to be defined. It is defined on this occasion. My hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has said that there are 430,000 registered disabled, but there are more than 5·5 million who are either physically or mentally handicapped. At present, there is no incentive to register. Nothing is gained by registering. If the new clause were accepted and implemented, it would provide encouragement to register if nothing else.

There is a wide variety of housing grants available to the disabled but there is no comprehensive scheme available to the employers of the disabled, and that is what the new clause will provide. Capital grants of up to £6,000 are available for adaptions and special equipment. Unfortunately, the take-up has been abysmal. In answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 9 February 1983, at column 392, it was revealed that there was no year between 1971-78 and 1981-82 when the estimate of the capital grant that should be made available was equalled by the level of take-up. For example, £500,000 was allocated in the Estimates of 1977-78 and the take-up was only £11,040. Only 21 firms were involved. In 1981-82, there was a much reduced estimate by the Government of £150,000. However, only £71,469 was taken up by 93 firms. There are more than 93 firms within a mile of this building.

The sum that is allocated each year is underspent and the reasons are simple. There is a lack of knowledge, just as in our previous debate it was said that many of those who are taking redundancy pay and setting up their own small businesses are not au fait with the problems or difficulties that will confront them and with what will be available to them.

A company which wants to take on a worker will want to employ him or her as soon as possible, and it will need to ascertain what will be available to it if it decides to take on a disabled worker. If the firm is asked to make an application, it will have to supply estimates of the cost of any construction work or equipment that will be required if the disabled worker is to be taken on before it is informed of the size of the grant that will be made available. This process involves an inordinate amount of delay, and fairly often the job will be taken by someone else who is not disabled — that is discrimination against the disabled — or the firm will go out of business by the time that the grant is awarded.

The quota scheme can be made more effective without even changing the law. If the House were to accept the new clause and it were incorporated in the Bill, the law would be changed only slightly.

In 1976, the Snowdon working party on the integration of the disabled recommended the levying of a disablement employment tax, the revenue from which would go into a disablement employment fund. It was proposed that the fund should be used to compensate employers for the expenditure entailed in assisting disabled workers. It was a form of capital tax relief. The new clause is in the spirit of that recommendation of the Snowdon working party. It would provide real encouragement to employers not to discriminate against the disabled. Instead, it would encourage employers to take them on. The clause would not incur any additional expenditure. If the Minister reads the answer that was given to my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South, which appeared in Hansard some years ago, he will find that the grants are not taken up. There is plenty of leeway to enable the Government to provide the wherewithal to counteract any possible loss in tax as a result of the implementation of the new clause.

The new clause would encourage the disabled to register and would provide much needed statistics. We would know the number of handicapped people within the community. That statistic is needed for many vital purposes. For most firms the clause would involve only a once-and-for-all expenditure. That is because the capital tax relief would not accrue every year. The Government are always prating that we should widen and extend choice, and here is an opportunity for them to widen the choice of employment that is available to the disabled. The new clause would give employers the chance to show their good will towards the disabled community, which constitutes a sizable constituency. The Government are being given the opportunity to demonstrate their good will be accepting this proposal.

Mr. Cohen: This a sensible new clause and will facilitate access to employment for the disabled. The clause is well drafted. I understand that its wording follows quite closely the provisions on fire precaution expenditure in section 17 of the Finance Act 1974. It has sound antecedents, which should encourage the Government to adopt it.

The tax laws that relate to the disabled are a mess. If a lift is installed, the expenditure will probably qualify for a grant or allowance, but the provision of ramps and widened doors to permit wheelchair access will not. The cost of constructing a new factory that has design features to permit access to the disabled will qualify for grant, but alterations to an existing building will not.

It has already been said that perks often have little connection with the real interests and activities of a business. Two examples are the chairman's new Rolls-Royce and the managing director's cocktail cabinet. Such perks qualify for an allowance from the Revenue but the provision of access for disabled workers will not. That is a gross contradiction. Why should the chairman of a company enjoy tax relief on the purchase of a Rolls-Royce to facilitate his mobility when disabled workers do not get any relief of that sort? The managing director receives a cocktail cabinet, but many disabled workers will not be able to enter the place of work, let alone reach the room where the cocktail cabinet is sited.

The new clause is a sensible provision to counter the discrimination against disabled workers that stems from access problems. The recent survey of the National Child Development Council reveals that young people who are handicapped are 10 times more likely to be unemployed for six months or more than their counterparts who are handicapped. That is shocking. The Government should be doing much more directly to counter discrimination in employment against the disabled. At least the new clause would provide a small encouragement to employers and I hope that it will be accepted by the Government.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We have had an informed debate, not least because several of those who have spoken, especially the hon. Members for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones), Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), take an extremely long-term and consistent interest in the subject. Their remarks today were interesting and informing. I appreciated the spirit in which the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) moved his new clause. I certainly appreciate his motives for doing so, because obviously the question of access is of great importance to disabled people.

The purpose of the new clause, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield outlined, is to give tax relief through the capital allowance system to employers who would not otherwise get relief for expenditure incurred on or after 1 August 1986 on building works or equipment designed to facilitate access to their premises by disabled employees.

The underlying question raised by the clause is, what is the best way to help and encourage provision and access for the disabled? Is it by grants, tax relief, or a combination of the two, bearing in mind the statutory obligation imposed on people in the construction of new buildings to which the hon. Member for Caernarfon referred? The Government believe that we should do so by both methods, but that the first line of assistance should be by grants and, after they have been taken into account, the normal tax rules should apply—that is to say, the rules for machinery and plant, industrial buildings, hotels, buildings in enterprise zones, and so on. Those allowances can help in certain ways.

I shall deal with the question of grants, to which the hon. Member for Sedgefield referred. The Manpower Services Commission can pay grants of up to a maximum of £6,000 to eligible employers, who are the great majority, who make essential adaptations to their premises or equipment to enable them to engage and retain specific disabled employees.

The hon. Gentleman referred to restrictions on the grants. As I understand it, those restrictions are there because until the nature of the specific disability is known it cannot be known what precise alterations are needed. As I understand it, that is the nature of the restrictions to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

I think that the hon. Gentleman referred to the bureaucracy in the MSC procedures. I do not mean to misrepresent the hon. Gentleman, but I thought I heard him refer to that. I shall draw the attention of Ministers at the DHSS to what the hon. Gentleman has said. I have not been advised of such complaints, but perhaps the hon. Gentleman will enlighten me.

Mr. Alfred Morris: The Minister will be aware that I was involved in legislating for the grants to which he referred. Can he tell me how much has been spent in the past few years on publicising those grants to improve the take-up?

Mr. Lamont: I do not know the answer to that question. I intended to refer to what the right hon. Gentleman's hon. Friend the Member for West Derby said. He said that the grants have been undersubscribed, even by the amounts that the Government have put by. That is an important point. I shall draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security to what I think has been the feeling in the debate that if we are to rest the argument of grants, the grants should be publicised. There has been a poor uptake of the grants in the past few years.

Perhaps it is worth mentioning, in passing, the job introduction scheme which is run by the MSC, under which grants of £45 a week can be paid to employers to take on a disabled person for a trial period giving him a chance to prove that he can do the job. Under that scheme, nearly 8,500 disabled people have been helped over the past five years by way of grants totalling about £2·7 million. There are other schemes of assistance for the disabled.

The normal tax reliefs apply on top of the grants to the net amount — the cost, less any grant, of the employer's expenditure; that is, the normal rules for machinery and plant and the fabric of qualifying buildings apply to the expenditure which the employer incurs. If, for the purposes of his business, an employer spends money on equipment for the benefit of his disabled employees which consists of machinery or plant, the equipment will qualify for an annual allowance of 25 per cent. on the reducing balance basis. The hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) spoke on that point. The capital allowance system already provides relief at the rate proposed by new clause 4 for an employer's expenditure on, for example, lifts, other types of mechanical hoist and special toilet facilities. The relief extends to the cost of any alterations to an existing building which are incidental to the installation of such equipment. So, for equipment, it is unlikely that new clause 4 would represent a new relief.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Very often, an employer buys standard equipment and the opportunity comes along to employ a disabled person. Is the Financial Secretary spelling out to the House that whatever modifications are made to such equipment which allows a disabled person to operate it they will count under the category?

Mr. Lamont: I was saying that if an employer buys a piece of captial equipment, it will qualify for the 25 per cent. allowance. The cost of any alterations to the building that are incidental to the installation of that equipment that qualifies for the 25 per cent. would qualify for the 25 per cent. I am not saying that alterations to buildings for the purpose of access qualify for 25 per cent. That was the point on which I wished to develop my remarks.

Mr. Carter-Jones: The Financial Secretary has now come into the cloudy area which I and my right hon. and hon. Friends and his right hon. and hon. Friends have come across from time to time. Will the Financial Secretary clear the cloudy area, which seems to give officials the right to make interpretations which he never intended?

Mr. Lamont: I shall see whether any further clarification can be given. I shall look at the point that the hon. Gentleman has made to me. I wanted to be careful not to use other than the precise words which I know represent the position legally. I follow the point that the hon. Gentleman has made. I shall look at it further. I can see that it can give rise to a grey area and that it may be difficult to draw the line as to where the end of the 25 per cent. allowance comes. If I can give any further clarification, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman. Indeed, I shall write to him anyway.

We have said that the grant is the first line of assistance. However, if the premises to be adapted are industrial or agricultural buildings, capital expenditure on altering them will qualify for an annual allowance of 4 per cent. The same will apply in the case of certain hotels. If the premises are used for the purposes of scientific research or are in an enterprise zone and qualify for the special allowances there, capital allowances of 100 per cent. will be available.

I recognise what hon. Gentlemen wish to do. I am afraid that I cannot go as far as they would like, but I hope that they recognise that the existing arrangements, which are primarily outside the tax system although some are within it, provide a degree of assistance and encouragement to employers to take on disabled people.

Mr. Wigley: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman correctly? Is he saying that adaptations to buildings to meet the needs of disabled people — for example, ramps — would qualify for a 4 per cent. rate but could not qualify for 25 per cent.? Are the Government against changing that 4 per cent. to 25 per cent. as a matter of policy, not because there is a technical reason why it should not be changed?

Mr. Lamont: The position is as I have said with regard to industrial and agricultural buildings, hotels, premises used for scientific research or buildings in an enterprise zone. There have not been capital allowances for commercial buildings, as I am sure the hon. Member for Caernarfon appreciates, for obvious reasons. Capital allowances have, in general, been provided on assets that depreciate rather than on those that appreciate. That is the distinction which has been drawn between commercial buildings and other buildings.

I should like to draw attention to one point concerning the new clause, although I make no complaint about it. As drafted, the new clause would give employers capital allowances at the 25 per cent. rate in respect of qualifying expenditure on adapting commercial buildings, because capital expenditure on such buildings outside enterprise zones does not attract tax relief. On the other hand, similar expenditure on industrial and agricultural buildings and hotels would not qualify for allowances at this rate under the new clause, because it is likely that the expenditure already qualifies for allowance, but at 4 per cent. There is a difference of treatment in the present system. The new clause is a move towards greater differences in tax allowances on buildings. I drew that point to the attention of the hon. Member for Sedgefield because I was not sure that that was his deliberate intention.

Although there are points which I shall pursue and points to which I will return — in the case of the hon. Member for Eccles — and others to which I shall draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security, especially those concerning publicity for the grants system, we think that we should look largely to the grants in respect of conversion of buildings. We think that the existing arrangements both outside and inside the tax system provide a degree of assistance.

Mr. Blair: This point should be clarified because some Opposition Members may have misunderstood it. As I understand it, there are no allowances for alterations to industrial buildings for disabled people.

Mr. Lamont: If industrial buildings are adapted, capital expenditure on altering them qualifies for an annual allowance of 4 per cent., as I said to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Alfred Morris: This is an important debate for people with disabilities. The starting point, for both sides of the House, should be the undoubted entitlement of disabled people to count as a part of and not apart from society, which is impossible if buildings in which they could work are inaccessible to them. They want, wherever possible, to enjoy the dignity of being taxpayers, not the dependence of supplementary benefit. That means allowing them access to far more places of work than are accessible to them now. Not to do everything within our power to improve access is to pile handicap on handicap for disabled people.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury cited some statistics on the employment of disabled people. In most parts of Britain, unemployment among disabled people who are looking for work is twice as high as it is among people generally. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) said, the same is grievously true of disabled school leavers who, in so many cases, now go straight from school to scrap heap. Unemployment is bad enough among the able-bodied, but among disabled people it is a scandal which should be of surpassing concern to the House.

Not long ago, I saw a deputation from the organisations of disabled people in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. They told me that, in many parts of all three, unemployment among disabled people who are registered for work is now more than 80 per cent. That is the sombre backcloth to the debate and the justification for the new clause. How can the Government possibly justify resistance to a measure that can help to change for the better that shocking statistic from Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland? For a disabled person, unemployment is a double handicap which can lead to double despair, and reducing it should be one of our highest priorities.

The Treasury is keen enough to cost any and every claim for a new benefit. I know that as a former Minister for the Disabled. What costing has the Treasury done in relation to the new clause? What does it estimate the net cost would be? The aim of the new clause is to take people off social security by making them taxpayers. The net cost could well be negligible, while the good it can achieve will be crucially important to people with disabilities. Rejection of the measure would be seen not only as self-defeating but as hurtful to some of the most needful people in Britain today.

In granting capital allowances for expenditure on building works to provide access for disabled workers, the new clause could well have been more than self-financing. How can the Financial Secretary possibly reject the proposition which we are making in the new clause when there are tax allowances for the managing director's cocktail cabinet and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said, for the Royal Doulton in the directors' dining room?

The justification for the new clause is self-evident and its drafting closely follows that of other legislation. The Financial Secretary questioned the drafting of the new clause. If there are defects, I am sure that the combined ingenuity of both sides of the House will overcome any problem that may stand in the way of carrying through this important reform for disabled people.

The new clause is about improving access not only for physically disabled people, but for the sensorily disabled, especially the deaf and the blind. They, too, have daunting, not to say intimidating, problems of access to many public and social buildings.

The Government never tire of expressing their concern about the totally unacceptable level of unemployment among disabled people, but what is needed is practical concern and meaningful help, not the customary mixture of sympathy and sloganising. My hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield made a compelling case for a measure that is of the first importance if we are further to improve the well-being and status of people with disabilities. The new clause is not about compassion; it is about equal rights. I am delighted to support it. If, as the Financial Secretary said, this is but a modest improvement, why on earth can he not accept the new clause?

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 11

SELF EMPLOYMENT

'(1) No person shall be subjected to tax under Schedule E of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, where that person is employed otherwise than under a contract of employment and notice to that effect has been submitted to Her Majesty's Inspector of Taxes.

(2) In any determination of employment or self-employment status hereunder submission of such notice shall be conclusive evidence of self-employed status save where General Commissioners or Special Commissioners, on application by Her Majesty's Inspector of Taxes, shall determine that the taxpayer is an employee.

(3) No such determination by General Commissioners or Special Commissioners shall be made unless:

(a) the taxpayer gains earnings from one single employer under one contract of employment only; and

(b) such a contract of employment is evidenced in writing; and

(c) the taxpayer has the right under his contract of employment to be reimbursed with authorised out of pocket expenses." — [Mr. Watts.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

7 pm

Mr. John Watts (Slough): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

You will recognise the pedigree of the new clause, Mr. Speaker, because of its marked similarity to the Right to be Self-Employed Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) under the ten minutes rule on 4 February this year. Your will recall that the Bill received its First Reading by a majority of 174 to 125, which shows the widespread concern in the House about the need to clarify the status of the self-employed and, indeed, the need to encourage the further growth of self-employment.

There has been a welcome development in that area. Since 1970 the numbers of self-employed have increased by 700,000 to a new total in excess of 2·5 million, or one in 10 of the employed population—the highest level for 60 years. That growth has been encouraged by various measures promoted by the Government, notably the enterprise allowance. It has also been helped by the reduction in national insurance contributions for the self-

I believe that the growth of self-employment also reflects a substantial change in attitude and a far greater willingness to create a job for oneself. Earlier, the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) referred to many of his constituents using redundancy money to set up their own businesses. Those people are the new self-employed—those who go out and make jobs for themselves if nobody else will make a job for them.

Further growth of self-employment is obstructed unnecessarily by the arcane way in which income tax operates, and, in particular, by the difficulty that the self-employed can face in establishing their self-employed status. The new clause seeks to provide a simple mechanism whereby self-employed status can be established. Subsection (1) states that schedule E would not apply to anyone

"where that person is employed otherwise than under a contract of employment and notice to that effect has been submitted to Her Majesty's Inspector of Taxes."

The procedure for the self-employed person is simple. He has merely to notify Her Majesty's inspector of taxes that he is self-employed. If we were to leave it at that, I acknowledge that the procedure could be open to abuse. People who were not self-employed might claim that status in the belief that it would confer on them certain advantages. Therefore, subsection (2) makes the notice given to Her Majesty's inspector of taxes conclusive evidence of self-employed status, unless the inspector makes an application to the general commissioners or special commissioners, and, on the inspector's application, they determine that the taxpayer is not self-employed, but an employee. We have the balance there.

The self-employed person can make a claim to be self-employed and notify the Inland Revenue that that is so, but the Inland Revenue has the opportunity to challenge that if it does not believe the assertion to be in accordance with the facts. The matter is determined conclusively by the commissioners. It is right that there should be that independent adjudication where there is a dispute between the Inland Revenue and the taxpayer.

Subsection (3) seeks to define an employee as a taxpayer who "gains earnings from one single employer under one contract of employment only".

That contract must be evidenced in writing, and the taxpayer must be entitled "under his contract of employment to be reimbursed . . . out of pocket expenses."

It is just possible that the definition of "employee" embodied in the new clause is not perfect and that further refinements would be needed before the scheme that I have outlined could operate without giving rise to a serious risk of abuse. I am sure that if there is any imperfection in the definition in the new clause, when my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary replies to the debate, he will be quick to draw it to my attention and to suggest a constructive way in which that problem can be overcome.

I hope that there will be general recognition of the need for a method, such as I have proposed, whereby a taxpayer can establish his status as a self-employed person. At present there is no clearance procedure. There have been cases in my constituency — no doubt other hon. Members can cite similar instances in their constituencies —where taxpayers have carried out work as subcontractors for local businesses in the belief, common to the taxpayer and the company, that they were entitled to be treated as self-employed. Then, some time after the event —perhaps when those arrangements have subsisted for a year, 18 months or two years—along comes the Inland Revenue, saying, "No, you are not self-employed. You are an employee, and we will treat you as an employee from the time when you first started to treat yourself as self-employed."

It is not satisfactory that matters should reach that stage. Such problems would be resolved if the new clause, or something similar to it which was based on its underlying principles, were embodied in our tax law. Thus, taxpayers could establish their right to be treated as self-employed by a simple means of notification. The onus would be upon the Inland Revenue to challenge that claim if it seemed unjustified. Ultimately the status would be determined by the independent commissioners. That seems to me to be a good scheme.

Even if the precise form of the new clause does not commend itself to my right hon. Friend, I am sure that, as a staunch supporter of the enterprise culture, the principle will appeal to him.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I am grateful for the chance to speak in support of new clause 11.

As a Member of Parliament in Norwich, I am continually called upon to help or advise small business men or people who aspire to run a business of one sort or another. In every case; the person is confused by our system of income tax legislation and value added tax legislation. Indeed, in our local newspaper during the past 24 hours an Inland Revenue official was quoted as saying, "You cannot expect the system to be fair," or words to that effect. I hope that that is not a correct report, but that is what was said in the paper.

I know of cases of people being forced to operate PAYE in unsuitable circumstances. That is the very point that is addressed by new clause 11. I can best illustrate it by quoting from two letters that concern a constituency case. The first is a letter from Her Majesty's inspector of taxes in Norwich, dated 7 March. He says:

"Dear Sir

I refer to our previous correspondence concerning the agency operated by yourself. It is my opinion"—

note the word "opinion"—

"that this agency is caught"—

note the use of the word "caught"—

"under Finance (No. 2) Act 1975 Section 38 and as such all the earnings of the relief workers provided by the agency are chargeable under Schedule E."

In that case, I had already been in correspondence with my constituent. Not surprisingly, he was distressed by the outcome. He wrote me a letter from which I shall quote briefly because it illustrates perfectly the need for new clause 11. He starts by saying:

"If you remember my problem concerning my HGV relief driving service with the DHSS and now the Inland Revenue, I have now been given a date to start a PAYE system which I cannot do, as I have no regular work from the companies I deal with. This means that myself and about eight self employed men will now be unemployed."

He went on to say:

"I feel very sad to think that I built this business up from nothing to finding work for 9 men and be closed down with the people who should be helping me find work."

He went on to make complimentary remarks regarding the Prime Minister's belief that people should be able to build up their own businesses and thrive in this way. In conclusion, he states:

"One of these DHSS inspectors told me they would rather see men unemployed than working through my Agency. The reason being that they are losing revenue for these men and there are too many self-employed men having a go on their own."

That case illustrates perfectly the need for new clause 11 and the reason why I supported the ten-minute Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth).

I should like to quote from a letter from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport when he was the Financial Secretary to the Treasury:

"For example, I am advised that it is at least arguable that the definition in your Bill"— that is the ten-minute Bill—

"would treat as 'self-employed' the 100,000 or so school teachers marking examination papers."

I can comment on this because I was a school teacher and was marking examination papers during the time that the change was made from self-employed status or schedule D to schedule E status. It seemed at that time to be a move in the wrong direction. Nothing that has occurred since has made me change my opinion. It is just another example of our extolling the virtues of people doing their own thing while the Inland Revenue, under its masters at the Treasury, do exactly the opposite.

It is time that the Government took on board the fact that what is happening on the ground does not always follow the rhetoric that we put forward, and it is time that we did something about that. There is too much bureaucracy and the system must be simplified for the benefit and expansion of small business, and the employment of people—which is what we all want—as well as bringing about a general decrease in irritation among the business community, especially those running small businesses.

There seems to be an order of batting in these matters. At the top of the tree and most favoured are the well-established business men, advised by accountants who make the maximum, obviously legal, use of the available allowances. Second, and quite a long way behind, come those who are on PAYE and who feel burdened by the fact that there is no way in which they can claim for allowable expenses. Teachers are right when they say it is almost impossible for them to claim any type of sensible allowable expense. They have a just grievance. Finally, right at the bottom of the tree—this is the point of new clause 11—are those who are trying to start up on their own, such as the man from whose letter I have quoted. He was trying to establish himself and take on casual work in the hope that it would lead to something better, like the building worker who operates on the 715, if he is lucky enough to get one and is able to overcome all the difficulties.

For the people in the third of my classifications the situation is almost intolerable. The Government should seriously consider the new clause and the Bill which preceded and inspired it. It is no good saying that this is a problem that we can address at some other time. It is at the root of what the Government are proposing, and we must do something about it as soon as possible.

With our present system of tax and social security, we are strangling the goose that will lay the golden egg. Priority should be given to this clause. It is even more urgent than tax cuts. Something must be done to remove the stranglehold of the complexity of the regulations as well as to cut taxation. I support new clause 11 with examples taken from my constituency, and I hope that it will find favour with my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) for tabling the new clause. It is of fundamental importance and I believe that there is support from both sides of the House for the spirit behind it. Indeed, the ten-minute Bill received support from all parties.

Although the Government have had remarkable success in creating conditions for the growth of self-employement, we must recognise that they started from a low base. There is considerably more scope for its development. Although my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury may argue that at the moment every worker has the right to be self-employed, in practice, it is a heavily qualified right. There is considerable uncertainty about where the courts will draw the line between employment and self-employment. The uncertainty is compounded by what is clearly a direct interest on the part of the Inland Revenue to minimise the numbers of self-employed taxpayers. The considerable resources which are available to the Revenue to act on the conduct of appeals adds to the risks for self-employment both for the worker and for the client.

My right hon. Friend will no doubt be concerned about the costs of implementing the new clause. If there were a substantial expansion in the numbers of self-employed, which all of us on this side of the House would welcome, no doubt he would have to consider the financial implications. Certainly there would be a reduction in the national insurance revenue. That reduction would almost be matched by a reduction in liabilities on the fund. An increase in the numbers of self-employed would mean that there were fewer people claiming benefits. On the supply side, more efficient work patterns would undoubtedly increase economic performance and general tax revenue.

Many of the additional expenses which would be allowed under schedule D, such as advertising, secretarial assistance and professional fees, would represent additional taxable income in other taxpayers' hands. My hon. Friend may feel that this new clause is not as well drafted as it might be, but I hope that he can say that he will try to meet its spirit by establishing a clear definition of self-employment for all tax, national insurance and employment law purposes. That would go a long way to dispelling any remaining suspicions there might be — they come from unexpected quarters, the National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses, the Institute of Directors and the Confederation of British Industry—that the Government are not as committed to encouraging self-employment as they profess to be.

I believe that the new clause would do an immense amount to reduce the burdens on business both for the self-employed and, depending on one's perspective, the employer's clients. Much uncertainty has resulted in people being reclassified from the status of self-employed to employed. It has also resulted in employers finding themselves liable for national insurance contributions and tax which they had no reason to suspect they would have to meet. In one case that resulted in substantial financial difficulties and premises had to be sold to meet financial obligations. The new clause will enable the tax position to be determined simply and immediately at the time of contract. It would reduce the risk to businesses of incurring costs in arguing their position with the commissioners.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) mentioned examination markers. I have also been in correspondence with my hon. Friend the Minister and his predecessor. It emerged that the 100,000 examiners who were reclassified from schedule D to schedule E could not be regarded as small business men in business on their own account, so the Revenue was justified in singling out that group. Had those examination markers bothered to read the leaflet "Employed or Self Employed" produced by the Department, and had they answered the questions which help one to decide whether one is employed or self-employed, they would have found that they fitted the criteria for the self-employed more closely than those for the employed. Of the seven questions to which an employee would tend to answer yes, examination markers would definitely answer no to five of them and might answer no to the questions about the right to substitute, depending on the contract, and about working wholly or mainly for one employer, depending on the number of boards worked for and the relative duration and size of contracts.

I also understand that, in determining whether those examiners were to be reclassified, the Inland Revenue had to consider the contractual arrangement case by case, and that in some cases the matter could be resolved only by reference to the wording of university statutes under which the particular examining board was established. The tax status of the examiners was far from clear, and their case highlights the limitations of leaflet IR56 which the Department produced to make the position clear.

I suspect that the background to this has nothing to do with employment status and everything to do with ensuring that earnings are declared and taxed. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister would not argue that examination markers may not have declared their earnings which is why it is necessary to reclassify them, because that has nothing to do with the appropriate tax status for their earnings.

There is a clear need to change the burden of proof. At present tax inspectors can make arbitrary decisions about whether one is self-employed, and the literature from the Department leaves room for doubt. If we could change the burden of proof so that the onus was on the inspector to argue that the individual was not entitled to self-employed status, it would be a major step forward.

If we could make it easier for people to be self-employed, we would at a stroke achieve much of what the Government say they want to achieve in unburdening businesses. When employers take on people to carry out functions as self-employed people under contract, they do not add to their turnover, which means that they may not be required to register for VAT, and that the number of their employees who must be covered by health and safety at work regulations, employment protection and all the other burdens which add to employers costs will not increase. It would enable employers to provide employment at a lower price without depressing wage levels.

In short, as my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North pointed out, it enables us to put into practice and to establish the conditions to create the enterprise culture, the standing on one's own two feet and the entrepreneurial zeal which is so much a part of the — I hesitate to use the word "rhetoric" — philosophy and objectives of the Government. Although my hon. Friend the Minister may not be able to accept the new clause tonight, I hope that he will assure us that he will do everything possible and that he recognises the genuine problem which requires his attention.

Mr. Hanley: I wish briefly to support the amendment in the light of the cases of some of my constituents. A large number of people in my constituency are employed in the film, television and radio industries. During the past four years many have come to me, not only because I am a Member of Parliament, but because I am a chartered accountant and may understand their tax affairs on a free basis—many of them could not afford professional help — when they have found themselves arbitrarily reclassified as being in schedule E. That has often caused great hardship to them and their families. Moreover, in many cases reclassification has been so arbitrary as to be almost illogical.

On 4 February my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) mentioned that more than 7,000 self-employed taxpayers engaged in those industries between 1979 and 1983 were reclassified as schedule E, and that a further 100,000 people engaged in part-time or occasional employment were also reclassified by the Inland Revenue during that period. No one would defend those who abuse the schedule D system by trying to pretend that they are self-employed when they are employed. However, artists and technicians based at an umbrella studio used by different production companies—perhaps even one after the other—often work for separate companies and there is no guarantee of continued employment from one company to another. They are hired by film companies although they happen to work within one building. Those people have been shabbily treated. It is greatly desirable that the Inland Revenue should use a little more discretion in reclassifying individuals as schedule E, particularly because of its sudden financial effect on family life.

The Inland Revenue is tightening up on certain individuals who have paid tax under schedule D to such an extent that it is being increasingly grossly unfair. It is claiming that expenses cannot be proven for past years and, clearly, they often cannot be proven when the expenses were estimates. It is imposing back taxes and heavy penalties, and some of my constituents have suffered the loss of large sums as a result. Therefore, I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to consider whether he is being fair to self-employed people.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I was extremely interested to hear the speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Slough (Mr. Watts) and for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) because one of my first tasks as Financial Secretary to the Treasury was to read the file of letters which my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling had written on this subject. My hon. Friends have fought a doughty campaign with the Right to be Self Employed Bill and the Finance Bill. I certainly recognise, particularly from the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson), that there are some genuine anxieties about the classification of the self-employed. I hope that I shall not shock my hon. Friends by declaring immediately that, although I was extremely intrigued by their correspondence, I remained unconvinced by it, which is why I was looking forward greatly to the debate. I wondered whether I would be persuaded by them, but I am not.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North made some powerful points and I do not doubt that he represented a genuine sense of grievance. In view of what he and my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) said, I undertake to look at certain matters. I shall certainly wish to consider the implications of the cases that have been mentioned, as well as the general principles outlined by my hon. Friends.

7.30 pm

Under the new clause, the individual could, by simple notification, elect to be self-employed. That of itself would be sufficient to establish self-employed status unless the commissioners determined that the individual was an employee. As drafted, the clause would determine status only for tax purposes, although I understand that the intention is that, once self-employed status had been elected, other matters, such as national insurance contributions, would be affected. Similarly, as a self-employed person, the individual would give up entitlement to unemployment benefit and the earnings-related additions to other benefits, and of course he would no longer be covered by legislation on employment protection or health and safety at work.

In principle, it is right that people should be able to choose to be self-employed. I do not take issue with that principle. The clause is not, however, about choosing self-employment; it is about choosing self-employed status for tax and other purposes, even though in reality the engagement in question may have all the attributes of employment.

I am sympathetic to what my hon. Friends have said, but I am puzzled as to why they should wish to go so far and to give a choice almost regardless of any objective test. I am certainly prepared to look at the working of the system and at individual cases, but I am surprised that my hon. Friends should wish there to be a choice regardless of any test of objective considerations. I would not say that the test is wonderful or that it has been perfectly administered, but I am surprised at the lengths to which my hon. Friends take their argument.

It is already open to both parties to any engagement to arrange the terms so as to make the engagement one of self-employment rather than employment. Whether self-employment is achieved in a particular case will then depend upon the specific terms of the working relationship of that engagement. When in doubt, the Inland Revenue on the tax side and DHSS on the national insurance contributions side look to established case law for guidance. The courts have laid down a number of criteria, and the Revenue — as my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling acknowledged — has produced a leaflet, intended only as general guidance. However, the key question that it poses is whether the individual is in business on his own account.

The Government are committed to the growth of self-employment, and we have done much to encourage people in that direction. My hon. Friend the Member for Slough pointed out that since we took office in 1979 the number of self-employed people has risen by well over a third from 1·9 million to 2·6 million. We are extremely pleased to see that growth continuing. We welcome measures that will increase genuine self-employment. However, I do not believe that the present proposal is precisely targeted on that. I think that the main effect of the new clause would be to enable a large number of ordinary employees simply to change their status for tax and other purposes without necessarily changing their present work pattern in any way, or taking risks. Moreover, if enough people elected to change their status, there could be a heavy cost in reduced tax and national insurance contributions. My hon. Friend the Member for Stirling considers that the reduced liabilities in terms of reduced entitlements to benefit would offset that effect. I do not believe that would be so. Many people, even if they did not qualify for national insurance benefit, would still be entitled to supplementary benefit.

Not everyone who was able, under the clause, to elect for self-employed status would necessarily do so. As I have just mentioned, there would be some disadvantages to consider. However, the cost in reduced national insurance contributions could be very substantial.

Would the benefits arising from the proposal justify the cost? I do not believe so. The clause would allow virtually anyone — for example, a civil servant — to achieve self-employed status. I do not believe that much would be achieved by that in terms of increasing employment, strengthening the enterprise culture or encouraging risk taking.

Mr. Watts: I am willing to concede that the new clause may be widely drafted and would allow too easy access to self-employed status, but I cannot see how a civil servant could take such status under the new clause. When he applied to the commissioners, they would surely find that he was a taxpayer who "gains earnings from one single employer under one contract of employment only; and

(b) such a contract of employment is evidenced in writing; and

[Mr. Watts]

> "(c) the taxpayer has the right under his contract of employment to be reimbursed with authorised out of pocket expenses."

If the commissioners so found, the civil servant could not claim to be self-employed.

Mr. Lamont: I hope that I am not caricaturing my hon. Friend's argument. It is certainly not my intention to do so. However, I was advised that such is the effect of the new clause.

Mr. Patrick Thompson indicated dissent.

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North shakes his head. I can only say that having read the letters written by my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling, I did not think that that view was a caricature.

I emphasise that I wish to meet some of the genuine problems and anxieties that have been identified. However, I could not accept the new clause as drafted. I believe that, as drafted, it will have the effect that I have described.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. Friend is caricaturing the new clause to some extent. We are trying to establish the principle that one can elect to be self-employed and that it is for the tax inspector to show why one should not be. At present, the individual has to go cap-in-hand to the tax inspector, who makes an arbitrary decision. My hon. Friend says that the criteria are clear and that there is plenty of case law. For the average small business man – let alone the average tax inspector – the situation is by no means clear. Some extraordinarily diverse decisions have been made. We are asking for clearly defined criteria. At present we have none. Recourse to case law is the basis of the present uncertainty.

Mr. Lamont: I certainly do not wish to caricature the new clause, but I firmly believe that it would go rather further than I now understand my hon. Friends would intend. I do not say that there are no other matters that we could consider. I do not say that the application of the present law causes no grievances to which we should address our minds. However, the new clause goes too far. It would make possible a cosmetic adjustment to self-employment rather than promote the real growth in self-employment that we all want. We want a framework that will easily and properly allow a genuine growth in self-employment. What we do not want – and this is the effect of the amendment – is a system which would merely allow people to be reclassified when, on objective standards, they were not self-employed. That is the effect of the new clause.

I stress that I have heard what my hon. Friends have said about how the present system operates. I am new to considering the issues raised here, but I undertake to look seriously at them. However, new as I am, I could not accept the new clause as drafted. I hope that, on the basis of what I have said, my hon. Friends will withdraw the motion. My hon. Friends the Members for Stirling and for Slough are great campaigners. I have no doubt that the campaign will go on, and who knows who might be converted.

Mr. Watts: I do not wish to push to a vote a new clause which might open the floodgates. It is not our intention to do that. I take some comfort from what my right hon. Friend has said, particularly about looking at some of the problems that have been highlighted. Perhaps when we come to the Finance Bill next year we shall have a go with something rather more tightly drafted. We might even see the skill of the Treasury draftsmen with the Government coming forward with amendments to the law to meet some of the objectives that we have described.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 14

EMPLOYMENT BONDS

"1. Income from employment bonds shall be exempt from income tax and gains realised on a disposal of employment bonds shall not be chargeable gains.

2. Employment bonds are securities issued by a body corporate resident and carrying on a qualifying trade in the United Kingdom the issue of which has been approved by the Board.

3. The Board shall not approve an issue of securities for the purposes of this section unless satisfied that

(a) the proceeds of the issue will be used for the purposes of a qualifying trade carried on in the United Kingdom;

(b) the making of the issue can reasonably be expected to result in additional full time employment in the United Kingdom for a period of not less than three years being offered to and accepted by not less than one individual for every £50,000 raised by the issue before expenses;

(c) the securities will be issued to and held by a recognised institution in accordance with the regulations for the time being prescribed under subsection (5); and

(d) the amount raised by the issue will constitute a normal commercial loan within the meaning of paragraph (5) of Schedule 12 to the Finance Act 1973.

4. A trade is a qualifying trade if it complies with the requirements of paragraph 6 of Schedule 5 to the Finance Act 1983.

5. The Treasury shall by order made by statutory instruments prescribed regulations for giving effect to this section, for imposing conditions relating to the giving and withdrawal of approval under subsection (3) and containing such incidental or consequential provisions as may appear to the Treasury to be appropriate, and may from time to time in like manner vary the regulations so prescribed.

6. Any statutory instrument made in exercise of the power conferred by subsection (5) shall take effect subject to an affirmative resolution of the Commons House of Parliament.

7. This section shall have effect with respect to securities issued on or after 6th April 1986".—[Sir William Clark.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 14 stems from an idea by a Mr. Gareth Jones and a Mr. David Soskin who wrote an excellent paper on employment bonds. The new clause seeks to help unemployment in Britain.

7.45 pm

Having said that, what the Government have done for unemployment is not widely publicised. The percentage of the population of working age in work in the United Kingdom compares favourably internationally. We have just over 65 per cent. of the working population in work whereas West Germany has 59 per cent., France 60 per cent. and Italy 54 per cent. Therefore, we have a better percentage of people in work than do our three main partners in the EEC. The average in the OECD countries is 58 per cent. compared with ours of over 65 per cent. We are beaten by the United States which has 68 per cent. and Japan which has 71 per cent.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Is not the particular difference that the proportion of long-term unemployed is far higher in Britain than in any of the countries that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned? Is not that the particular problem to which we must address ourselves?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The new clause relates to employment bonds. I hope that the debate will not extend to one about unemployment.

Sir William Clark: I am grateful to you for your protection, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The employment bonds are to help unemployment. The Government have taken measures to help the long-term unemployed, to whom the hon. Gentleman has referred, such as the restart scheme, the community programme, the new worker schemes, the two-year youth training scheme, the job release schemes, the adult training schemes and the enterprise allowance. One would think, to hear Opposition Members, that the Government were doing nothing about unemployment. I remind the House that the Government are spending over £3,000 million of taxpayers' money to help unemployment. The business expansion scheme has also created many new jobs throughout the economy since March 1983. It is worth putting on record that nearly 1 million new jobs have been created by the various Government measures.

However, having said all that, there is still more to be done. One of the snags in our economy today is the high cost of borrowing. If one compares the cost of borrowing in Britain with that of our competitors, one sees that Germany has a well-developed debt market whereby long-term loans of 10 years and more are available to industry at low rates of interest. The clearing banks in Germany take equity positions in various industrial companies and that must be of assistance to German firms because there is no interest element within that. The United States of America has for many years had something called industrial development bonds, which are similar to the employment bonds that I am about to advocate. Japan, another of our competitors, has long-term low-cost finance. I do not have to remind the House that the economies of those countries is buoyant. France, one of our partners in the EEC, has direct interest subsidies.

When we look around at our international competitors we can see that we lose out on the cost of financing a development. Moreover, the cost of borrowing in the initial stages of a business is vital. Once a business is established it can afford a higher rate of interest because profits are being generated. But in the initial years it is vital for the cost of money to be as low as possible.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will not bother to criticise the wording of the new clause because all that I am asking him and the Government to do is to accept the spirit behind it.

The idea of the employment bond is to channel investment into genuine job-creation projects. Each bond will be issued by one of the clearing banks. It is suggested that for any one project there should be a maximum bond of, say, £10 million, although I am not arguing for that figure. The bank would create the bond and then sell it to investors. If it were sold to 100 people, they could take £100,000 each, or whatever it may be. Consequently, the money lent to the business would be covered by the employment bond.

There is one stipulation, and that is that the money lent from the bond would go to a project whereby genuine jobs would be guaranteed for three years and no job should cost more than £50,000 of that investment. That would mean that if there were a maximum of £10 million for one project, 200 jobs would be created. It is true that £50,000 per job is extremely high. The American experience is that in practice the figure works out very much lower. But, if one takes the worst, it would create 200 new jobs.

In order to make the bonds attractive the Government must give the interest on the bonds tax-free. If it were given tax-free any investor, particularly those at the higher rates of tax, would be attracted to them. Remember, the bonds must be directed to a genuine project which will create long-term jobs.

If one takes the example of, say, 100 units going into a bond, a taxpayer at the maximum rate of 60 per cent. will, if he gets a 10 per cent. return on his 100 units, receive 10 units of interest. But the Exchequer will take six of those units and he will be left with four. The net interest that he receives will be 4 per cent. Consequently, that investor can not only afford but it would be an incentive for him to lend his money at 6 or 7 per cent. tax-free.

We must remember that the individual employment bond scheme would be run by the banks. The banks would guarantee repayment to the investor. There could be a secondary market like the Euro dollar market in which an investor could buy and sell his bonds as and when he wished. I am sure that that would be an advantage. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government should experiment with that. I suggest that the experiment should be £1 billion worth of employment bonds. I remind my hon. Friend the Minister that £1 billion worth of employment bonds would be about one eighth of the total manufacturing investment in the economy.

Before the Inland Revenue approved a scheme, it would have to be satisfied that it was a genuine project, that it created new jobs and, of course, that it was underwritten by the banks. If one considers a £10 million project, and assumes that the interest rate on it is 10 per cent., any individual or group of people investing that sum would collect £1 million a year in interest. If those people pay tax at the maximum rate, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take 60 per cent. in tax. The loss to the revenue if the interest was tax-free would be £600,000 on £10 million invested. If one multiplied that to £1 billion the sum involved in the experiment the loss to the Exchequer would be £60 million. But we must remember that that loss of £60 million would create 20,000 new jobs. If one considers some of the job-creation schemes with which successive Governments have dabbled, that figure is small.

How successful will the scheme be? I can only remind my hon. Friend of the experience in the United States of America. An important report published recently by leading economists in the United States maintained that the success of the industrial development bond in the United States no one can say that its economy is not buoyant was shown by an increase of 4·75 per cent. in its gross national product. That 4·75 per cent. increase occurred between 1980 and 1985. If one could extrapolate that to the position in Britain, it could mean 1 million extra jobs in five years.

[Sir William Clark]

Employment bonds would be especially attractive to companies that cannot get off the ground, especially in low-return industries such as textiles, light engineering, food manufacturing and office equipment. In those industries there is a low rate of return on the capital employed. Consequently, with the base rate at 10 per cent., although one cannot borrow money at 10 per cent. anywhere and one is bound to pay two or three points above the base rate—if it is a new business, the chances are that it will pay 13 per cent.—interest charges are an enormous drain on a low-return industry, even if it is expanding.

One can compare the purchase of capital equipment in America, where, with an industrial development bond, one could borrow £1 million, £2 million or £10 million—whatever the cost of the plant and machinery was—and repay it over 10 or 15 years, with the position in Britain, where no financial institution would give those terms. The best one could get would be a leasing arrangement perhaps over five years. If an American competitor borrows £10 million, and he must pay it back in 10 years, he must find £1 million plus interest each year out of the new venture. In Britain, a £10 million loan for a similar plant to be repaid over five years means that a business man has the millstone round his neck of a £2 million repayment each year plus a much higher rate of interest than is payable abroad.

The scheme is a much better incentive for the Government to create employment at a much lower cost. No extra bureaucracy is involved except for the Inland Revenue's approval. The Inland Revenue must consider three things. Is it a genuine project? Will it create jobs? Is it underwritten? Those are three simple points. The scheme involves no bureaucracy because private enterprise will take the responsibility for its administration and the risk.

The scheme has worked well in the United States, and with unemployment at its present level it is another idea to help to solve the problem. The Government have done much to contain unemployment, despite the fact that we have been suffering, as everyone in the House knows, from many more people of school-leaving age entering the labour market and fewer people retiring.

I urge my hon. Friend not just to dismiss the scheme. I am sure that he will not criticise the wording of the clause. The spirit behind the clause is to attract investment into genuine businesses which will create genuine jobs.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): Labour Members share the anxiety of the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) about unemployment in Britain. However, he should note that in Britain the underlying trend of unemployment is still moving upwards and that there are 1 million fewer people in work now than there were in 1979 when Labour left office. Since 1979, Britain has lost more jobs more quickly than the other EEC countries put together. Since 1979, jobs have been destroyed at an alarming rate. The hon. Gentleman is right to recognise that it is a serious problem and to attempt to provide a solution. Part of the analysis that the hon. Gentleman proposed is accepted by the Labour party, but not by the Government. We agree with the hon. Gentleman's statement that high interest rates are a strong disincentive for investment and especially for investment in job creation.

There is an urgent necessity for investment in job-creating projects. The hon. Gentleman is right to urge the Government to make such investment. We would propose different measures for job creation from the ones that he has proposed in the new clause.

I have two more points to make about the new clause. The hon. Gentleman compared it with the business expansion scheme. I do not suggest that it would operate in exactly the same way, because, of course, it would not. That was not the best comparison for the hon. Gentleman to choose. The Peat Marwick report on the operation of the business expansion scheme shows clearly that, at best, that scheme has maintained some jobs rather than created new jobs. If the hon. Gentleman examines the figures, he will discover that that is the case.

Another problem with the business expansion scheme is that it benefits higher rate taxpayers. Since its inception, the Government have had to introduce one tax avoidance measure after another to prevent the use of the business expansion scheme, not for the purpose for which the Government intended — job creation — but as a tax avoidance measure by higher rate taxpayers. I can see that the same difficulty may arise for his scheme which, as he suggested, would encourage higher rate taxpayers to invest in employment bonds.

Sir William Clark: It is surely illogical to assume that. If we are endeavouring to channel investments into employment, creating jobs, all the Government can do is to give fiscal incentives to a potential investor. Those who are paying a higher rate of tax are obviously the potential investors.

Dr. McDonald: It is not at all illogical to make the point. Fiscal incentives cost the Government money. If fiscal incentives are designed for job creation, the Government need to see to it that job creation results or there is no point in giving fiscal incentives because the Government will be giving yet another tax handout.

The hon. Gentleman himself drew a comparison between the business expansion scheme and his proposal. The business expansion scheme has often been misused, as the Minister knows. It has been used for tax avoidance purposes rather than for new investment that will lead to job creation. One has only to look at agricultural property investment and the investment in fine wines that took place under the business expansion scheme. It is difficult to ensure that fiscal incentives like this go towards job creation.

I share the hon. Gentleman's concern that job creation should be the result. The method that he has chosen in proposing this kind of tax incentive for investment in employment bonds is a dubious one. He suggested that it would not cost a great deal of money. However, I shall be interested to hear the Minister's figures based on the suggested amount of £1 billion in bonds of this kind. Even if the cost is only £60 million, that money must be used for job creation. That is why, although naturally sharing the hon. Gentleman's objectives, the Opposition are dubious about the method that he has proposed.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): First, I compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) for giving us an opportunity to debate the interesting idea embodied in the new clause. He drew attention to the number of jobs generated in the economy in the last few years, but rightly said that we are all anxious to ensure that there should be as many ways as possible of encouraging the creation of new jobs. That sentiment, I think, is shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

My hon. Friend said that the high cost of borrowing in the initial stages was one of the greatest deterrents to projects that are likely to give rise to new job-creating businesses. There is certainly truth in that. It is very encouraging that longer term interest rates have for the first time in many years come down into single figures. Although there is a margin to pay on top of the strict money market costs, it has not been possible for companies to work on the basis of gilt-edged stock yielding less than 10 per cent. for many years now. If that has not created a climate in which it is easier for all businesses that want to expand to raise longer term finance, it has certainly been a substantial step in the right direction, and it is one of the important achievements of our financial policies in the last few years.

My hon. Friend may have guessed that I would not feel able to recommend to the House that the new clause be accepted. I do not want to attribute to him any great powers of clairvoyance, but there is a certain similarity between this debate and one that took place a year ago at a similar stage of the Finance Bill. I recall that the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) was involved and, although I was not called upon to respond, my right hon. Friend the former Financial Secretary did. The debate was opened by my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), and he made a number of these points. As that debate is on the record, I looked to see whether any of the arguments had changed. Following that, I had the opportunity of a meeting with my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) and the two gentlemen, Mr. Jones and Mr. Soskin, to whom my hon. Friend referred. I had an interesting discussion with them.

I shall certainly follow my hon. Friend's request that I should not dwell too much on the wording of the new clause, but deal rather with the spirit of it. Indeed, I go even further and promise not to read the Treasury brief that has been put in front of me for this occasion. I do not know that it would necessarily be conducive to the conduct of the debate at five minutes past eight this evening. I do not wish to cast any aspersions on the Treasury briefs, because they are marvellous documents. All those of us who have the opportunity to rely on Treasury briefs will bear witness to that. The points that my hon. Friend makes are really general, not detailed, about the wording of the clause, and I shall therefore try to deal with them.

The first and most important point is whether relief of this kind would be an economic use of tax revenues forgone. Would it be sufficiently targeted on the type of companies that my hon. Friend has in mind? Having thought about this, when I met my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East and again when my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South tabled the new clause, I could not convince myself that the degree of targeting of a proposal of this kind would come anywhere near a sufficiently satisfactory level to justify the introduction of such a wide-ranging relief. My hon. Friend said that these should be specific projects of a kind that would lead to the generation of new employment, in practice, but I think that it would be a great deal more difficult to achieve that with any degree of confidence and certainty in order to justify such a relief.

My second anxiety is that a great deal of investment that was going to take place anyway could be organised in such a fashion that it would qualify for relief under these arrangements. This is a factor that has always to be taken into account. Not only is there potential advantage to new activity – what is known in the jargon as additionality – but there is also the possibility that, unless such reliefs are very carefully defined, there is a great risk that, within the law, a great deal of activity that would otherwise have taken place but would not have come within the ambit of relief of this kind could be organised in such a way that it did come within its scope. That would mean an Exchequer cost that would not be related directly to the purpose that my hon. Friend has so rightly said deserves our attention.

My hon. Friend went on to say that the idea of these bonds has been inspired to some extent by experience in the United States and other countries. He made a general point about other countries, but one has to look at the financial conditions in each country and at existing markets. It is not easy to extrapolate from one country to another, regardless of the surrounding circumstances and taxation systems for companies, and say that they would operate just as efficaciously in another country.

My hon. Friend concentrated on the United States. Therefore, I ought to do so, too. Tax relief in the United States operates in a way that is bound to be popular with some of those who are involved. It is popular with the recipients because this money is a subsidy. Tax relief makes it possible to quote a lower rate of interest. Therefore, it is popular with those who are able to invest and gain a gross interest on bonds that are not liable to tax. It is also popular with those states in the United States that operate this system. They are able to offer tax subsidies to enterprises in individual states, but the cost falls on the federal Government. Ultimately, therefore, the federal Government have to bear the loss of revenue and to weigh up whether they believe they are getting a reasonable deal. The latest United States Treasury view is that "inefficient, economically distortive, and ill-targeted tax expenditures of this type should be eliminated."

Preliminary steps towards that end have been taken in the United States.

One of the reasons why the United States came to that conclusion was that a significant proportion of the tax relief was being given as a subsidy to financial intermediaries or to higher rate taxpayers. I am sure that that would happen in this country, because our rates of personal tax are higher than those in the United States. If approximately one third of the cost in the United States was used not for the creation of new jobs but as a subsidy for those other parties, I do not think we could expect that the percentage that leaked out in that way would be any lower. Indeed, it could conceivably be higher.

The United States authorities concluded that for every $2 of interest costs that are saved by the borrower, the federal Government forgo more than $3 of revenue. That is not a formula upon which we could base a similar provision. That leaves aside any possibility of exploitation or lack of targeting to which the hon. Member for Thurrock alluded. A loan guarantee scheme or a business expansion scheme needs to be as closely targeted as possible. It is inherent in any such scheme that one has to look at the limits of the target and to maintain vigilance, because the temptation for it to be used for purposes other than those that we have in mind are bound to be great.

If an experiment costing £1 billion were carried out — with an interest rate of 10 per cent. and with only top rate taxpayers at 60 per cent. involved — we should be talking of £60 million. However, it is almost impossible to quantify the cost because we do not know what rates of interest relating to the credit worthiness of the borrowers would be charged on particular bonds, and we should not know what were the individual tax rates of those who put Finally, my hon. Friend said that the experience of this scheme in the United States was that the gross national product increased within a few years by about 4·75 per cent. That is a huge figure if it can be attributed to a single measure of this kind. The paper that includes these figures refers to a sum that is quoted in dollars rather than to a percentage of GNP. The GNP percentage is nearer 0·1 per cent.

On the evidence of the figures and the American experience, I do not feel that a case has yet been made for a provision of this kind. We are always anxious to find ways in which to encourage businesses to create more job opportunities. Along the lines of employment bonds there may be a formula that would work and be economical for the general body of taxpayers, but I regret that the formula that is contained in this new clause has not found it.

Sir William Clark: That was a very disappointing reply, particularly as my hon. Friend prefaced his remarks by saying that he would not read the Treasury brief, and then proceeded to quote from the Inland Revenue brief.

My hon. Friend took me to task at the beginning of his reply on bank interest. I know that interest rates have been reduced and I congratulate the Government on that reduction. However, the idea behind employment bonds, as I tried to point out, is to obtain a lower rate for genuine projects. I do not accept my hon. Friend's assessment. If there are loopholes, it is up to the Inland Revenue to close them, as it did with the business expansion scheme. Of course, these ideas will be exploited, but it is up to the Inland Revenue to close the loopholes.

I said that the Inland Revenue would closely monitor employment bonds. The fact is that £60 million would create 20,000 jobs. The figure may be less or it may be more, but I believe that my hon. Friend agrees that a £1 billion issue of investment bonds would cost £60 million, and the risk would be taken by the banks.

In view of what my hon. Friend has said, it is obvious that this year we shall be unable to push the matter further. However, I assure him that the matter will not be forgotten and that it will be raised again. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

BINGO DUTY (NO. 2)

'(1) Schedule 3 to the Betting and Gaming Duties Act 1981 (exemptions from bingo duty) shall have effect subject to the following provision:—

(2) In subsection 2(1) (inserted by Finance Act 1982) there shall be inserted the following paragraph—

"(aa) the said bingo is played as an activity of a non-profit making members' club or society", or' [Mr. Greg Knight.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I am sure that it has not escaped your attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this clause has all-party support. Appended to the clause are the names of more hon. Members than are appended to any other new clause. The clause would remove all non-profit-making clubs from the scope of bingo duty in respect of bingo being played as an activity of the club. If the new clause were agreed to, it would cost the Treasury £2·7 million. For that reason, the House will want to know why I urge that the new clause should be approved.

Since 27 September 1982, non-profit-making clubs have been obliged to pay bingo duty in respect of bingo that exceeds certain thresholds. The decision to make clubs liable to duty is not, I understand, a cornerstone of the Government's economic strategy and it does not relate to any central Treasury principle. It was introduced, firstly, as a result of pressure from profit-making organisations that felt that they were facing unfair competition. I do not accept that point.

Secondly, I understand that at that time the then Chancellor of the Exchequer was experiencing some difficulty with Conservative Members who did not accept the Government's proposal to increase the duty on derv. Other ways had to be examined of raising finance. Because of the circumstances in which non-profit-making clubs were brought within the scope of the tax, I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that there was less consultation on this issue than I am sure he would have wished. If the new clause is accepted, non-profit-making clubs will be exempted from bingo duty.

The distinction between profit-making organisations and non-profit-making organisations is that the profit from bingo played in clubs such as Royal British Legion clubs, Conservative clubs and Labour clubs is usually used to finance other activities and does not go into the pockets of owners and shareholders.

In the Financial Times on 17 June there was an article headed:

"Ladbroke sells Rank its bingo clubs in £67m deal."

The article reads:

"Rank Organisation yesterday become the largest licensed bingo hall operator in the UK with the agreed acquisition of Ladbroke Group's 36 bingo clubs and 42 high street amusement centres in a deal worth £67·5m."

Quite rightly, these clubs have to pay tax, and I do not seek in any way to alter their tax liability, but non-profit-making clubs should be exempt. Mr. Deputy Speaker, you represent an area of Doncaster and you know that non-profit-making clubs in Great Britain provide leisure activities for approximately 10 million people. In addition to providing entertainment, the clubs often sponsor and provide sporting activities.

In my part of Britain, the east midlands, many professional musicians got their first start in the clubs. If a youngster who is learning to play an instrument wants to go on stage and perform before an audience, often the only outlets — the only places which can give him an opportunity to do so — are the working men's clubs, Royal British Legion clubs or Conservative clubs.

Boxers like Tony Sibson often receive their first encouragement by way of the help given by non-profit-making clubs. Those clubs sponsor and assist young people and it is the modest bingo profit that is invariably used to help to pay for that sort of activity, rather than lining the pockets of proprietors.

In many areas the facilities in non-profit-making clubs are of social benefit to the communities that they serve. In such places bingo is primarily a fun game, a sort of low-powered gaming. Some people might even say it is a form of no-power gaming. Members do not gamble for high stakes of the sort that we see in the clubs operated for profit, many of which have taken over disused cinemas and other high street premises.

Many hon. Members may ask why this new clause is necessary. They may say that, after all, the present law provides for exemptions where the ticket sales from bingo fall below a certain level. I shall explain to the House why the present exemptions from bingo duty are inadequate and unfair.

At present, non-profit-making members' clubs are required to register with the Customs and Excise when prize money or money collected for the purchase of bingo tickets, whichever is the greater, exceeds £400 in a day or £1,000 in a week. When a club exceeds either of these thresholds it must within the following five days register for bingo duty with the local Customs and Excise office. Duty is then payable at the rate of 10 per cent. of the prize money or ticket money, whichever is the greater, in that week and in the following 12 weeks. Payment of the duty continues until 12 consecutive weeks occur in which the thresholds are not exceeded. At that time the club has a right to be deregistered.

In a normal week the majority of unlicensed clubs— that is, working men's clubs — do not reach the thresholds. Usually it is only in weeks during which a bank holiday occurs and in which, understandably, the number of club functions is greater that the threshold is reached and the club needs to register. The clubs find that, because bank holidays occur in virtually each quarter, many of them reaching the thresholds on perhaps only five, six or seven weeks of the year require to be registered for the whole of the year.

I have a letter dated 10 April from Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. It is addressed to the secretary of the Manningham ward Labour club, Whetley lane, Bradford, west Yorkshire. The letter could equally have been written to a Royal British Legion club, a Conservative club or a Liberal club. In the letter, the senior officer says:

"Dear Sirs . . . I am writing in connection with our recent visits and discussions regarding the bingo played in the Club and the liability to Bingo Duty when the small-scale bingo exemption limits are exceeded.

Examination of your Bingo Duty Finance Record Book has shown that the small-scale bingo exemption limits were exceeded during weeks ending 30 December 1984, 6 January 1985, 29 December 1985 and 5 January 1986 thus rendering all the bingo played in the Club during those particular weeks, and in each of the twelve succeeding weeks, liable to Bingo Duty."

The senior officer goes on to tell the club that it is liable for the sum of £2,183·77.

I draw this matter to the attention of the House to show that the mechanism not only causes problems in terms of record keeping, but is inequitable because in many cases clubs breach the threshold in one week, a week in which there is a bank holiday, and are then obliged to pay bingo duty for the following 12 weeks. If the trigger mechanism operates on every bank holiday, the club may find that it has to be registered all year and has to pay bingo duty during that time when for most of the year the income from bingo falls well below the thresholds.

The other difficulty experienced by non-profit-making clubs is that, unlike the organisations that are making money for shareholders, the non-profit-making clubs are managed by unpaid volunteers and quite often the extra paper work is unduly onerous. Many clubs are finding it difficult to get officers to serve on the committee; that is because of the onerous duties placed upon them by the provisions.

I hope that the House will accept the new clause and will exclude all non-profit-making organisations from the ambit of bingo duty. If my right hon. Friend the Minister feels that he cannot accept the new clause as drafted, I ask him to consider another point. Before 27 September 1982 non-profit-making clubs were exempt from the bingo duty provisions. They were brought within the provisions on that date, as I have said, following pressure from the commercial bingo clubs.

I have looked into the matter and have found that no non-profit-making club was consulted before such clubs were brought within the ambit of bingo duty. I do not entirely blame the Government for that, because at that time the non-profit-making clubs did not have an umbrella organisation by which they could be represented nationally and through which they could let their views be known. That is no longer the case, because in the last couple of years the Committee of Registered Clubs Association was formed specifically to look after the interests of the non-profit-making clubs and especially to make representations about legislation that affects the club movement.

If my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary cannot accept the new clause today, I hope that he will give an assurance that during the next 12 months, and before next year's Finance Bill, he will meet members of the association, or at least listen to their views. If he gives that assurance, I may consider not pressing the new clause to a Division. But given the difficulties that I have outlined to the House, I hope that my right hon. Friend will at least be prepared to enter into a dialogue with the Committee

Mr. Meadowcroft: I rise to underline the point made by the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight). This is, indeed, an all-party matter. Sometimes, particularly when we discuss Treasury matters, hon. Members find that they have a collective opponent in the form of Treasury Ministers. We have to gather our strength and concentrate on the arguments that the Treasury may throw up. In this instance, we must point out that the income involved is crucial to the survival of those clubs.

The new clause may seem to involve a small issue, but I am glad that it was selected. It has enabled hon. Members to point out just how crucial non-profit-making members' clubs are to their communities. In many areas, they are vital to the fabric of society. They are one of the few institutions to be run by ordinary working people, for their benefit. It is important to stress that we are not dealing with clubs where people legitimately and deliberately wish to make a profit or with the sort of clubs that the police are often worried about, which just try to get round the licensing laws.

[Mr. Meadowcroft]

We are dealing with clubs that are run by members for the benefit of themselves and that of their local community. It is thus important to discover how best they can be assisted. During a recession, they are particularly important to the fabric of society. However, I doubt whether many clubs are now highly profitable. Of the 25 or so in my constituency, I imagine that very few of them are financially viable. If we could lift even a small burden from them, it might help them and their community to survive.

If the law on charities was not so restrictive, many of those clubs—if not all of them—would probably qualify to be regarded as charitable. Much of the work that they do is akin to being charitable. Only today a letter from the secretary of a club in my constituency raised the problem of one of his members in relation to the DHSS. That is typical of the sort of work carried out by clubs on behalf of their members.

I am not a great bingo lover, but as a politician I have learned over the years that it is fatal to stop bingo going on in a local club. In this instance, I doubt whether the loss of income to the Treasury will break the Government, but that income makes a difference between survival and closure to some of those clubs. Therefore, I hope that the Chief Secretary understands the problems faced by many of our clubs, and that he will respond sympathetically to the new clause.

Mr. Terry Davis: Hon. Members on both sides of the House—or perhaps I should describe them as all-party Members — have supported this new clause, and I listened to the speeches made with great care and interest. In fact, I have a particular interest to declare in that, no doubt like the Chief Secretary, I am a member of several clubs in my constituency. I certainly endorse the remarks made by the hon. Members for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) and for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) about the good work done by non-profit-making clubs.

I have some sympathy with non-profit-making members' clubs and with the problems that they encounter in the present economic climate. However, I am not sure that I can support the abolition of the duty on bingo in clubs. I was impressed by the arguments of the hon. Member for Derby, North, who said that the measure would cost only £2·7 million. I can see that that is a small amount of revenue for the Treasury to lose. But I am concerned about the precedents that the new clause would create. Consequently, I await with interest the Chief Secretary's reply.

I accept what the hon. Member for Derby, North said about the problems of registration. It seems grossly unfair that clubs should be required to register for 12 weeks after every bank holiday and so are always subject to that tax. But perhaps we should be pressing the Treasury to do something about the problem of registration rather than pressing for the abolition of bingo duty in respect of non-profit-making members' clubs. However, that is a matter for the consideration of those hon. Members who are most concerned about this issue on behalf of the all-party group.

On behalf of the Opposition, I express some sympathy with the pleas that have been made, but I am not prepared to recommend that my right hon. and hon. Friends go into the Lobby if the new clause is pressed to a Division—at least not until I have heard the Chief Secretary's views.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): I know of the considerable interest that has been shown in this subject by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight). He has demonstrated it not only by pressing Treasury Ministers in correspondence on the matter, but by raising the issue in the House tonight. I entirely support him in his commendations of the worthy work done, and social contribution made, by the non-profit-making clubs. I also fully understand the point made by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) about those clubs being crucial to the fabric of society in some parts of the country. Indeed, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) made the same point. Thus, there is all-party agreement on that.

The hon. Member for Hodge Hill said that he would wait until he had heard what I had to say before deciding what action to take. That is the first time that he has invited me to make up his mind for him, and I hope that he will do so again. As my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North rightly said, before September 1982 any club promoting bingo in accordance with sections 40 or 41 of the Gaming Act 1968 was automatically exempt from bingo duty. Following complaints from commercial clubs that they were facing unfair competition from exempt social clubs, the whole basis of exemption was changed in the Finance Act 1982, and then modified in the Finance Acts 1983 and 1984 so that there is now exemption for clubs where there is a £400 daily limit and a £1,000 weekly limit for stakes as well as prize values.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North advocates removing all non-profit-making clubs from the ambit of bingo duty. If exemption was given to all members' clubs or societies of this sort, the commercial promoters of bingo would again face serious competition from the clubs. The number of commercial clubs has declined year after year, and if members' clubs did not have to pay duty on similar turnovers—I shall come to that point in a moment — that decline would be accelerated.

It is also possible that members' clubs, which may have restricted their playing of bingo in order to avoid breaking the exemption limits, would increase the amount of bingo played. Some hon. Members might argue that that would be a very good thing for the clubs. I can see that argument, but it would also increase the competition with commercial clubs.

Some hon. Members may know that in its pre-Budget representations the Bingo Association of Great Britain suggested that the exemption for members' clubs should be further restricted, as it still regards those clubs as representing competing interests. The Government have recently acknowledged the industry's difficulties by facilitating the introduction of a national bingo game. The problem is that the existing exemption limits are reasonably generous. In bringing non-profit-making members' clubs within the scope of the duty, we are talking about regular, high turnover bingo at what is really a commercial rate. I understand that the stake figures for quite a number of working men's clubs go up to £1,700 or £1,800 a week. I think that the accurate, up-to-date figure is 363 for the number of non-exempt, non-profit-making clubs. That is a very small proportion of all the clubs and societies, but in comparison with the commercial operators it is quite large. There are 513 commercial operators at present, involving some 900 outlets altogether. On the assumption that the clubs and societies have one outlet each, they represent nearly one third of the total number of commercial outlets, and so there is a point to be made about commercial competition.

Commercial outlets have been under heavy pressure. Nearly 300 outlets have disappeared in the past four years. There is a question of balance. I would like to give the last figure so that all the figures have been given to the House. The cost of revenue lost would be some £3 million. That is a similar figure to that mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North.

A balance must be achieved. The changes made in 1982 and 1983 were intended to ensure fair competition between the members' clubs with a comparatively high turnover relative to the bingo promoters and the commercial bingo promoters. I am not sure that the case has been made to go back on the decisions that were taken then. There would be strong representations from those who make a profit out of bingo and who also provide a leisure facility in the community.

I would like to consider the specific points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North. I have stated the reasons why we should not accept his new clause, which would sweep away all the requirements for bingo duty from clubs and societies. My hon. Friend made two specific points. First, he said that it is the mechanism which causes the problem. The hon. Member for Hodge Hill followed that point. My hon. Friend said that the mechanism caused problems in connection with record-keeping. I understand the problem of keeping paperwork for volunteers. However, any well-ordered club will have to carry out a considerable amount of record-keeping because the Customs and Excise, legitimately, in fulfilling Parliament's obligations, will go to clubs and societies from time to time and check whether they are above the exemption limits. A certain amount of paper-work would therefore have to be carried out.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North made a second point concerning the difficulty about the way in which the exemption limit is established. He stated that there are specific parts of the year — for example, holiday periods — when some clubs suddenly find themselves above the limit and having an exceptional turnover for limited periods in the year. Under the present system, the clubs will have to register and pay duty for three months thereafter.

That provision was introduced because it would not have been practicable to treat each day or week separately. The new provisions were aimed at giving clubs the choice. It was reasonable to assume that most clubs would make the choice either to have bingo on a sufficiently substantial scale to be above the exemption limits for most parts of the year and accept that they would have to pay bingo duty, or they would wish to remain exempt throughout the year. In the latter case, when clubs ran into the specific problem — and there is evidence that many clubs do this — of the kind identified by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North of a high turnover in Christmas week or whenever, they could deal with that by reducing stakes in the Christmas period to keep below exemption limits. I am told that the number of clubs that are non-exempt has remained fairly static. That suggests that many clubs have been doing that.

Nevertheless, I accept that that does not meet the point. I stress that because it might be useful for some clubs to know that that is one way out of the difficulty. However, I can make no commitment to my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North beyond saying that I would consider his point and see whether there is a way of dealing with it to meet the problem of the very high turnover in specific parts of the year. I do not make a commitment to bring some measure on that point back to the House next year. I would like to consider it and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the matter in the House.

8.45 pm

My hon. Friend's other main point related to the umbrella organisation — the Committee of Registered Clubs Association. I would obviously be willing to receive representations about that. Whether we need to have a meeting is a matter I must leave open. These days I lead a hectic life and if necessary one of my hon. Friends may have to deal with that. I cannot make a commitment to regular meetings but I would be willing to receive representations. If we considered that a meeting would be sensible, we would have one.

I especially welcome the idea of an umbrella organisation. I would be happy for my Department and for the Inland Revenue to engage in discussions with such an organisation. In the past there have been difficulties in explaining to many smaller clubs the position on bingo duty and difficulty in publicising that position. There have been difficulties in dealing with arrears of duty when a club has strayed over the limits.

There is merit in having a body which represents, if not all clubs — as that would be difficult to achieve — many more than previously. I welcome my hon. Friend's point about the umbrella organisation and I would certainly welcome the opportunity to receive representations and consider certain points. I hope that I have explained why the new clause goes further than I would be prepared to recommend to the House that we should go tonight.

Mr. Terry Davis: I must thank the Chief Secretary for his comments as he has helped to make up my mind. He has been very forthcoming to his hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) in agreeing to receive representations and to meet representatives of clubs. The main point appears to be the requirement for registration based on a limited experience of high turnover. There are several ways in which that could be tackled. Instead of being required to register if turnover exceeds a limit in one week, the limit should have to be exceeded for three consecutive weeks or perhaps for a certain number of weeks in a year, which would take care of the peaks. There are ways around that problem. I am grateful to the Chief Secretary for agreeing to receive representations and perhaps we can return to this point next year. In the meantime, I can assure the hon. Member for Derby, North that if the Chief Secretary does not have time to meet representations from clubs the Labour party Front Bench would be delighted to do so.

Mr. MacGregor: Long may the Labour party Front Bench have plenty of time on their hands to do that.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) has made a reasonable point. We ought to see whether the mechanism is causing unnecessary problems and if there is a way around that. On that basis, I hope that my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) will understand why I cannot accept the new clause and I hope that he will be prepared to withdraw it.

Mr. Knight: I am grateful for the wide measure of support that I have received on this issue from both sides of the House. Unfortunately, many of the hon. Members who supported the clause were unable to be present this evening. I do not know whether they are out playing bingo somewhere, but I have received their apologies for absence.

I am also grateful for the comments of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis). He is correct to say that it is primarily the mechanism which is causing many of the clubs difficulty. I was sorry to hear that the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) does not like bingo. However, as the House will know, the hon. Member for Leeds, West is a musician. He must therefore appreciate that bingo in clubs has given employment to many musicians because without bingo in many cases there would be no way of funding entertainment in clubs.

I am extremely grateful to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. I do not necessarily agree with his comments on why he cannot accept the clause. I still believe that there is some merit in the clause. In view of my right hon. Friend's generous comments, however, and the welcome sign that he would be prepared to receive representations and, if necessary, to attend a meeting, I am sure that all concerned with the clubs movement will warmly welcome his comments. In the spirit of my right hon. Friend's gesture, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 21

LUNCHEON VOUCHERS

"In subsection 4 of section 36 of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1975, in the definition of "voucher", after the words "this Act", there shall be inserted the words "or a voucher exchangeable and only exchangeable for food to be consumed on the premises in which the voucher is exchanged or freshly prepared for immediate consumption, except to the extent (if any) by which the value of the voucher or vouchers given to the employee exceeds £1 for each working day."'.—[Mr. Michael Cocks.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Michael Cocks (Bristol, South): I am much encouraged by the response of the Chief Secretary to the last clause. I therefore beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Out of consideration for the House, I did not take part in the previous debate, although I was sorely tempted to do so as I am chairman of the Bristol, South Labour club and felt a great affinity with much that was said. It may not surprise the House to learn that relations between the Bristol, South Labour club and the Bristol, South constituency party are rather strained. In spite of this unfortunate lack of identity of views, I am glad to say that, unlike some of the clubs that have been described tonight, the Bristol, South Labour club is thriving and prosperous and is prepared on occasion to donate money to causes which we consider to be worthy.

I am pleased to introduce the new clause because by doing so I am giving the House an opportunity to consider and possibly to rectify an anomaly which discriminates especially against small firms, young people and lower paid workers. These are three groups which the Government, and particularly the Chancellor of the Exchequer, are always telling us that they are most anxious to assist.

The present position is probably known to right hon. and hon. Members. Everyone who is given a luncheon voucher by his employer has to pay tax on every penny that he receives above 15p a day. That tax has to be paid by the employee; it cannot be paid for him by the employer. This is in strong contrast to the treatment of those employees who eat in company canteens, which are frequently heavily subsidised. They do not have to pay any tax on the benefit that they receive. Whether it is a factory canteen or a directors' dining room, they are not liable to 1p extra on their tax. The anomaly is manifestly unfair and it is becoming increasingly unfair as the years pass as a result of inflation. The inequity puts at a disadvantage firms which are not large enough to maintain a staff canteen and which cannot afford all of the overheads that go with it when it comes to recruiting staff.

Luncheon vouchers were introduced after the war when 15p, or three shillings—or three bob, as I prefer to call it — was sufficient to buy a three-course meal. I can remember after the war having a number of substantial blowouts in the then British Restaurants, and the total bill for a good feed was no more than three shillings. At that time the value of a luncheon voucher equated roughly with the price that was being paid in factory canteens. Today, 15p will scarcely buy a cup of coffee. The value of a luncheon voucher is in no respect equal to the amount of subsidy which goes into maintaining staff canteens.

By any standards, the tax-free element of luncheon vouchers is absurd. It has been absurd for a long time and the anomaly has been recognised for a long time. In 1975, an attempt was made to make the luncheon voucher system more realistic. A number of enlightened Members tried to rectify the anomaly by supporting an amendment that was moved in Committee during the consideration of what was then the Finance (No. 2) Bill. An amendment was moved to increase the tax-free element from 15p to 50p, and the Member who moved it used words which are difficult to improve upon. He said:

"We seek the change simply on the ground of equity between the employees who have to have luncheon vouchers because their employers are either too small or do not have the premises to provide canteen facilities and those who have canteen facilities, for whom the fringe benefit has been able to keep pace with the cost of food. We seek to make the tax-free benefit more realistic in terms of current costs.

The Financial Secretary will be aware that 15p now goes not very far at all in many parts of the country, particularly in London, in assisting an employee to have a decent lunch. We seek to bring the amount into line with reality."—[Official Report, Standing Committee H, 1 July 1975; c. 649.]

Those were wise words then and they are wise words now. They were the words used by the right hon. Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor), who is now the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. I commend them to the House today. The right hon. Gentleman has a chance that is not presented to many who stay in this place for any time. He can demonstrate that he does not say one thing when he is out of office and another when in power. Two faces are not for him. He has a chance to strike a blow for consistency, honesty and sincerity.

When the issue was drawn to my attention I was tempted initially to table an amendment in the precise terms used by the Minister, as he now is, in 1975. However, I resisted what might be described as a tease. I thought that it would be better to table a new clause in words which overcame some of the objections which were raised in 1975. I succumbed to the tease in Committee, but some of my colleagues argued that I had not brought the value of luncheon vouchers in line with current practices, so I have added the words

"or freshly prepared for immediate consumption".

This relates to food which can be purchased by luncheon vouchers. I have taken into account the many snack and sandwich bars, for example, which have come into existance since 1975, when the Minister tabled his amendment, and instant food and food which is taken off the premises.

Luncheon vouchers are provided by many small employers and they are given mainly to young and lower paid workers. The tax-free element governs to a large extent the value of vouchers issued, or which in many instances can be issued. An employer who issues vouchers worth more than 15p a day has to set up machinery to deduct tax at source from each of his employees who receives more than 15p daily. This is expensive and troublesome and consequently in most instances the amount given is limited to the tax-free limit of 15p a day. I am sure that an increase in the tax-free level would result in an increase in the value of the voucher issued for the majority of recipients. Many young and low-paid workers would receive an increase and small firms would be in a better position to compete with firms large enough to run staff canteens.

About 14,000 British companies provide luncheon vouchers for about 500,000 employees. An increase in the value of vouchers would provide more employment in the catering industry, especially for small and family businesses. About 30,000 caterers are involved already. The new clause would cost money and in Committee I expressed my sympathy with the Chief Secretary for the demands which were made on him for resources from various Departments. If the new clause were to be approved, however, a good deal of benefit would be returned to the Treasury in a reduction in unemployment and extra tax revenue. Fewer low-paid people would be in the poverty trap, where it is sometimes more beneficial to be unemployed than to take a job.

t is possible also that the new clause would help to turn people away from having junk food for lunch. If they were encouraged to have something more substantial, that would be of benefit to their working ability and to their general health. Other countries have recognised the benefit of the concession. I do not normally take examples from the continent, but in France the benefit is equivalent to £1·40, and in Portugal, £1·50.

As the Chief Secretary said some time ago, the benefit increase is long overdue. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman likes the change that I have made to the clause since it appeared in Committee. I think that between us we have come up with a pretty good formula to increase the safeguards over any abuse which may be made, or thought to be made, by those who use vouchers for other purposes. I do not think that the receipt of luncheon vouchers is what is sometimes described vulgarly as a perk. It is a genuine and desirable benefit. I certainly would not support it if I thought that it was just another perk.

If we brought the value of the tax-free element to the present equivalent, having regard to inflation, the original 15p would have to go up to about £3. I do not ask for that. I think that an increase to £1 would go some way to demonstrating that the Government have the interests of small employers and young workers at heart. At a comparatively small cost to the Treasury, the Government can assist 500,000 workers. There can be few cheaper ways of showing that they mean what they say about the problems.

Since I tabled the clause, I have had a number of representations. I think that a number of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen have also had them. The interest shown by various organisations and individuals has reinforced my view that reform is long overdue. I do not want to embarrass the Chief Secretary by congratulating him too heartily on his prescience in pointing the way. He was a sort of parliamentary pathfinder in 1975, blazing the way for the reform that he now has a chance to pick up.

It is most unusual to find oneself in the position of being able to do what one was thinking about 10 or 11 years ago. If the Government accept my new clause, I should be the first to congratulate them. I would not make any cheap party points about saying one thing in opposition and doing another in government. If any of my colleagues felt inclined to go along that path, I should do my best to damp it down. It would be a most praiseworthy event if the Chief Secretary were able to cough up on this occasion.

If the Government oppose the reform, despite my best blandishments, some of my colleagues might be so churlish as to point out that one thing was said in opposition and another in government. However, the Chief Secretary can rely on me to put the best possible gloss on the outcome of the debate. He is a decent chap; I am sure that he will do his best. I am giving him an opportunity to cast an eye over a simple and inexpensive reform that would help a number of people who are probably most deserving of assistance. The measure would help entrepreneurs who are setting up small businesses and younger people going to work, possibly for the first time.

Mr. Penhaligon: Can the right hon. Gentleman say which is the most expensive proposal in real terms the proposal argued in 1974, or the proposal put so wonderfully to the House by the right hon. Gentleman? Perhaps the answer is that his proposal is the cheapest.

Mr. Cocks: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman. I was thrown a little at first because he used the superlative when he should have used the comparative. I know that he did that only to test my knowledge of English grammar. I agree entirely with the point that he made. I hope that that will be a further reinforcement to the Chief Secretary to cast a favourable eye over the new clause. However sympathetic he may be, he may feel that further consultations are required and that perhaps the net should be spread more widely. I should not be aggressive if he made such a point. I look forward with great interest to the response from the Treasury Bench.

Mr. MacGregor: As the right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) has made clear, the matter is a regular runner in Finance Bill debates. As the right hon. Gentleman pointed out, it has been run in Committee, without success, by some young Back-Benchers who have just become Members. Following representations made to them, Back-Benchers may subsequently have been converted to a different view. I shall say something about that later. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the matter has not been run only once; it has been run many times.

[Mr. MacGregor]

I am aware that the right hon. Gentleman has been prevented from making contributions to our debates for some years. He has certainly made some charming, witty and well-researched contributions to our debate this year. I can see that he has spent many years storing up his contribution. He will know, from his research, that the matter has come up regularly. Therefore, he will not be surprised at some of the points that I shall make to him in return.

As has frequently been pointed out, tax relief on luncheon vouchers was introduced in 1948. Subsequently, it was developed in a different form by way of extra-statutory concessions. It was introduced in the immediate post-war period when conditions and requirements were quite different from those which exist today. The problems were quite different. For example, the income position of employees has changed substantially since then.

The right hon. Gentleman said that one of the reasons for the introduction of tax relief on luncheon vouchers was that people who had subsidised meals in work canteens were advantaged compared with those who did not have subsidised meals at their place of work. The luncheon voucher system was intended to deal with that. Today the great majority of employees have neither luncheon vouchers nor an employer-subsidised canteen and therefore must meet the full costs of their meals from their pay net of tax. The current daily luncheon voucher with the 15p tax concession is equivalent to a tax-free payment of £40 a year. Increasing the concession on the scale suggested by the right hon. Member for Bristol, South would certainly discriminate substantially further against the vast majority of employees who have the benefit of neither provision.

I, too, have been doing research. I think that the right hon. Member for Bristol, South will remember the response to a parliamentary question in February 1979, under the previous Labour Government, when the then Financial Secretary to the Treasury — the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) — responded with these words:

"I do not think that such an increase would be justified. To increase the value of the concession would be unfair to the millions of workers who have the benefit neither of luncheon vouchers nor of subsidised canteens." — [Official Report, 12 February 1979; Vol 962, c. 423.]

That is the point I am making now and about which I am convinced. I shall be interested to know whether the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) holds the view that was held by the then Government or whether he has changed his mind.

During the period of the last Labour Goverr ient, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), the present Financial Secretary to the Treasury, put the point correctly when he said:

"I accept the case that benefits in kind should be taxable. I think that it would be far better to have lower tax rates, higher pay, and a totally sensible tax regime. But that is not the world in which we live." — [Official Report. 17 May 1976; Vol. 911, c. 1070.]

That was an accurate comment on the position under the last Labour Government. I am sure, although I cannot quite recall, that that must have been one of the reasons why I was advocating some relief for as many people as possible from the very high tax regime, the levels of which had been increased in 1975.

There are other reasons why the new clause would introduce even greater unfair discrimination against all those who do not have the benefit of these provisions. I shall refer first to perhaps the least important. The right hon. Member for Bristol, South said that, if we accepted his recommendation, it was likely that fewer people would eat junk foods in the middle of the day. There is evidence — I recall what happened when I had the benefit of luncheon vouchers and saw what happened with many people — that often luncheon vouchers are not used for the purpose intended. They are often used to purchase goods and not simply to purchase lunch-time meals. It is a problem. It is difficult to prevent that. Obviously, increasing the limit would increase the scope for misuse. However, that point is secondary to the issue of unfair discrimination.

The concession would be very costly. That is an important point. The current claim, on figures which we have been able to establish — I think they come mainly from the company that produces the luncheon vouchers — is that about 400,000 employees currently receive luncheon vouchers. If that is accepted as the normal figure and if one uses the normal calculation of the number of days in the year on which luncheon vouchers are available, the annual cost of the present 15p exemption is about £4 million. Increasing the exemption to £1 a day, as suggested by the right hon. Member for Bristol, South, would increase the cost to at least £30 million, but it could well be beyond that.

If the tax exemption were increased to £1, there would obviously be a greater incentive for more employees to request luncheon vouchers and for more employers to grant it. There could easily be a substantial increase in the number of luncheon vouchers and the cost would rise accordingly. In talking about that scale of tax relief and the costs, it becomes important to consider whether this is the right priority at this time. I do not believe that it is.

What we are endeavouring to do with the tax regime and the point made back in 1976 by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary are relevant to my next point. We believe that priority must be given to reducing the burden of taxation to the benefit of all taxpayers, rather than to extending special relief to particular groups such as those who have luncheon vouchers. Given that approach and determination, I must challenge whether it should be a priority, or an objective at all, to encourage the spread of perks and benefits in kind. Remuneration in cash rather than kind gives employees greater freedom to decide for themselves how to spend their income. There is also the point that, at the end of the day, benefits in kind are just another form of remuneration.

I do not think that the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne was in the Chamber when I referred to his response on this subject. I would be interested to know whether he agrees with himself.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: I only came into the Chamber to hear whether the arguments have altered. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not discovered anything new. I was able to discover one or two new aspects. I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman has let me down.

Mr. MacGregor: What has altered is that the cost is rising in terms of priorities. Many of the arguments have not changed. In fact, I accept the arguments. What is different is our determination to reduce the burden of taxation on employees generally. Therefore, that is why there is a point of principle here. When one accepts that benefits in kind are a form of remuneration and, in principle, should be taxed accordingly, especially in fairness to all taxpayers not in receipt of them—I know that we are not in a perfect world in that respect—I do not believe that it is right substantially to extend the benefit in kind and the tax treatment of it, as the right hon. Member for Bristol, South suggested. It would not be available to all taxpayers and, in any case, I do not believe that it is the right approach at present.

It is for that reason that I have to say to the right hon. Member for Bristol, South that I am sorry to disappoint him but we are in a different tax regime and my point of view makes sense.

Mr. Terry Davis: I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) on tabling this new clause and drawing attention to what I would describe as an obvious injustice in that the value of luncheon vouchers has not increased for many years. There was an increase at one time. It used to be 12½p, half a crown, and was then increased to 15p. That was a long time ago and there has not been an increase since. Clearly, the amount has not kept pace with inflation since luncheon vouchers were originally introduced in the 1940s.

Obviously the amount should have been increased and equally obviously the Government should accept my right hon. Friend's new clause in view of what was said by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in 1975 when he not only debated this proposal but actually moved a new clause to this effect in Committee. He tells us that he has subsequently seen the force of the arguments adduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) on that occasion. I understand that my right hon. Friend pointed out that he was not relying on the Treasury brief because he was teased by Conservative Members on the Committee that he was relying on the brief they had used during the previous Conservative Administration. Those arguments, which were so hackneyed and had such little force for the Chief Secretary in 1975, have prevailed in his mind since he came to office a few months ago.

The right hon. Gentleman described this issue as a regular runner. To my knowledge, it has not been discussed for four or five years, certainly not in this Parliament. I am not going to tease the Chief Secretary any more, but he should have been consistent and at least have expressed more sympathy with the arguments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South, even if he was not allowed to accept the new clause.

The Chief Secretary put some new arguments. He said that the world, or at least the tax regime in this country, has changed since 1975. He said that, because this country does not have what he described as a high tax regime in 1986, the force of the argument for an increase in luncheon vouchers had declined. In the days when I used to receive luncheon vouchers, they were issued to more junior people in the company. They were not given to the directors, who had rather better eating arrangements. I did not resent that. The fact is that luncheon vouchers brought particular benefit to the more junior and lower-paid people in the office.

Mr. Hanley: The Conservative principle is that those people should be taken out of tax altogether.

9.15 pm

Mr. Davis: I am delighted to hear that, but that has not happened under the present Government. The people who have had their taxes reduced are precisely those on the highest rate of tax, not those on the basic rate of tax. The fact is that the marginal rate of tax for the low-paid has increased under this Government. When one takes into account the impact of indirect taxes, they are even worse off. The hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) shakes his head. He must have missed our debate in Committee on clause 15.

Mr. Hanley: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will remember that I was present during that debate. The tax-free benefit that has been proposed by the right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) amounts to about £66 a year for a person paying 29 per cent. tax. The Government have reduced taxation upon exactly the sort of people that the hon. Gentleman has been talking about by more than £66 a year.

Mr. Davis: That is not true. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman believes it, but it is a fairy story. I gave the figures in our earlier debate. If the hon. Gentleman was present, obviously he did not take them in. I should be happy to discuss the matter with him privately afterwards, and to show him the tables that have been produced by the most respectable outside organisations, showing that the marginal rate of tax paid by people in that income bracket has increased under this Conservative Government. The people who have really benefited from the reduction in taxation and who are no longer living in a high tax regime are people like the hon. Gentleman, whose income is much higher than that of people who benefit from luncheon vouchers.

The second reason that was given for the Chief Secretary's change of mind was that there is some abuse of luncheon vouchers. It existed in 1975 as much as it does now in 1986. I see that the Chief Secretary is nodding. So that is a bogus reason.

I had some sympathy with the Chief Secretary when he then said that the provision would cost £30 million, so the Government cannot afford it. The Government have a philosophical approach towards benefits in kind, and I think that the Chief Secretary was alluding to the Government's philosophy during the latter part of his remarks. It has been made clear on Report in Finance Bills in the past two years that the Government have a philosophical objection to benefits in kind, including not only luncheon vouchers but factory and office canteens. I do not think that I am quoting unfairly the previous Financial Secretary, the right hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore). In our debates on workplace nurseries, I am sure that I remember him saying that if the Government had the option today, in the 1980s, they would not exempt the benefit of eating in a factory or office canteen from liability to tax. The fact is that the arrangements for canteens and luncheon vouchers have existed since the 1940s, and the Government are not prepared to experience, particularly in the run-up to the general election, the outcry that would ensue if they put their philosophy into practice. That is their position. If they had their way, they would not be giving those exemptions now.

The Chief Secretary asked me directly what I would do it I were in his shoes. I am tempted to say, "Wait and see," although that would not be a satisfactory answer. The Labour Governments of the past have not increased the tax-free value of luncheon vouchers—I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) played some part in ensuring that that did not happen in his previous role as Chief Whip in the Labour Government—and I would not hold out any hope that the next Labour Government would increase the tax-free value of luncheon vouchers, precisely because of priorities. The Chief Secretary estimated that the provision would cost £30 million, which is a substantial sum. The sums of at least £25 million for the personal equity plan and £30 million for luncheon vouchers add up to significant amounts. The next Labour Government would want to use such substantial sums to put our priorities into effect, which, in any case, are different from those of the Conservative Government.

Therefore, although I have a great deal of sympathy for my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South, and would not wish to oppose his arguments as a friend because I recognise the force and justice of his case, I cannot tell him that I would support him if he pressed the new clause to a Division because I do not want to put a future Labour Chief Secretary in the position in which he has put the present Chief Secretary, the right hon. Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor).

Mr. Cocks: I am grateful to the Chief Secretary for his contribution. I agree that in 1948 the position was different.

Then a dynamic Government got 6 million people out of the forces and back into civilian life without any massive unemployment. They put our war industries onto a peacetime footing and on a smooth and equitable basis. They took into public ownership the clapped-out public utilities which had been run on a care and maintenance basis throughout the war. At the same time, the Government repaired and restored over 2 million homes which had been destroyed or severely damaged due to the German blitz. All this occurred when our overseas assets had been flogged to buy essential war equipment, food and raw materials and the bulk of our merchant shipping fleet had been sunk. I agree that the situation in 1948 was entirely different but I will not go on to draw a parallel with how the Government are tackling the problems facing the country today.

I thought there was a certain inconsistency in the Chief Secretary's argument that people should be given their money to spend as they liked but then said that one of the reasons why he was not in favour of luncheon vouchers was that they might be abused by a small number of people who might use them for other purposes. I thought that was a weakness in his argument.

I understand the right hon. Gentleman's argument about the possibility of a large uptake if this scheme was introduced. Such an uptake could not be predicted. Given the difficulties under which Treasury Ministers labour in attempting to keep within limits and always having to look for economies, an open-ended commitment of this nature is difficult to undertake. I understand that.

I was encouraged when the Chief Secretary said that this was not the right priority. I hope that this opens the door to show that the Treasury mind is not entirely closed on the matter. It may well be that last Thursday night we had a curtain-raiser to the possible date of the next general election. The Secretary of State for the Environment came to the House and announced that water privatisation was off the menu for this Parliament.

I worked in the usual channels for many years and I know that, unfortunately, with the best will in the world one often imputes base motives to people in circumstances where others may have given them the benefit of the doubt. I thought that the announcement was a ploy for possibly having a nice fat carrot next year at a general election. Perhaps the Government will offer to increase mortgage relief from £30,000 to £35,000 or £40,000. I declare an interest because I am at present in the process of upgrading my mortgage commitment to £40,000. I trust that the House, and even the Chancellor, who is present, will take that into account.

I thought last Thursday's announcement was a sprat to catch a mackerel. In scavenging about, the government may think that luncheon vouchers are an attractive thing to put in the shop window. However, I do not think that that will be sufficient to return them at the next general election.

Because of the comparatively forthcoming statement by the Chief Secretary and his mention of priorities, and understanding his difficulties about taking on a commitment—the full extent of the expenditure was not foreseen—it would be in the best interests of the House if I were to beg leave to withdraw the clause. At least we have had a debate about it and the points can be considered. No doubt one party or the other will return to the matter at some future date.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 22

BOARD AND LODGING ALLOWANCES

'In section 189, subsection (1), Taxes Act 1970, after "defrayed", the following words shall be inserted—

"Any employee may make a claim for board and lodging in respect of expenditure incurred while away from his normal place of work, providing he is maintaining, or contributing to the maintenance of, a residence in the vicinity of his normal place of work.".'. — [Mr. Wrigglesworth.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

This clause arises from a case which I have taken up on behalf of a constituent. I have pursued it over a period of years to try to get for him what I believe is proper justice in the legitimate claims that he makes for expenses and which he is taxed upon. My constituent is involved in a long-running dispute with the Inland Revenue. I raise this matter this evening because it has wider implications and interests than merely those of my constituent.

My constituent is a single man and is sent to different parts of the country to work for one or two weeks at a time. His employers have apparently agreed with the Inland Revenue that, where an employee is married, hotel costs can be reimbursed free of tax, but that in the case of a single employee tax and national insurance contributions must be deducted from his expenses, and it also costs the company additional employer's national insurance contributions.

I should have thought that the employee concerned could make a section 189 claim, but the basis of the Revenue agreement is that a single person does not have to maintain a fixed abode, and so is taxable on living expenses which are reimbursed, whereas a married person does and so is not taxable. The concept that a married man must keep an abode and that a single man must not is nonsense. It underlines Ministers' judgments in my correspondence with them.

The present Revenue treatment of this company's case produces farcical results when a married person and a single person are away together on business on an out-of-town job. They both claim expenses but those expenses are taxed differently. Surely the Revenue is wrong not to admit a section 189 claim.

My new clause seeks to make the treatment of single and married people the same in those circumstances. At present people such as my constituent are losing considerable sums from having to pay tax on necessary expenses incurred when they have an abode at home. I see no reason why such people should be treated differently from their married colleagues when they have exactly the same responsibilities of maintaining a home.

I hope that the Minister will be prepared this evening to give some assurance to me, my constituent and many others in the same position that he will reconsider the provisions of the law and, perhaps, accept this new clause so that there may be equality of treatment between married and single men claiming expenses in this way.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), through the case of his constituent, has certainly uncovered a complicated matter and I for one am grateful to him for raising it. I do not think that his new clause is the right way to tackle the problem for reasons which I shall explain, but I shall say how I think I could approach it constructively, even if I cannot guarantee to solve it.

Under the general rules of schedule E, an employee is chargeable to income tax on all of the remuneration from his employment, including any allowances or reimbursed expenses, except to the extent that he is entitled to an offsetting deduction for expenses incurred.

Obviously the schedule E expenses rule must be strict. An employee may have a deduction only for expenses he "necessarily" incurs in travelling in the performance of his duties, or which he otherwise incurs "wholly, exclusively and necessarily" in the performance of those duties. That means that if an employee necessarily incurs additional expenses of travel or accommodation as a result of travelling in the performance of his duties, or of his being required temporarily to perform those duties at some location away from that where he usually works, such expenses will normally already be deductible under the existing statutory rules. Where, as will usually happen, the employee receives an allowance from his employer to cover those expenses, that allowance will not in such circumstances be taxed on the ground that the employee would be due an equal and offsetting expenses deduction.

9.30 pm

For this reason, the new clause would be superfluous. Indeed, though no doubt the hon. Gentleman did not intend this, it could actually leave some employees worse off. For example, as drafted, the new clause would allow relief for board and lodging expenses only if the employee was maintaining or contributing to the maintenance of a residence in the vicinity of his normal place of work. The hon. Gentleman will see that that could operate to some people's disadvantage.

The schedule E expenses rule is nevertheless a strict one and has been strictly interpreted by the courts. It is well established that relief is not admissible for the expenses that an employee incurs in travelling between his home and the place where he normally works, or for the expense of maintaining a home at or near his normal place of work. The reasoning here — the hon. Gentleman will be familiar with it — is that such expenses are not incurred in the performance of the duties of the employment. Rather they are expenses of a personal nature which simply put the employee in a position to carry out those Though strict, it is obviously right and sensible that the line should be drawn in that way. Virtually all employees will to a greater or lesser extent incur such personal expenditure in travelling between their home and their place of work, and of course we all incur living expenses wherever we work. In short, the law already makes suitable provision for the deductibility of expenses, including board and lodging.

I gather from the constituency case that he has raised that the hon. Gentleman is especially concerned about the tax treatment of allowances for single employees under a working rule agreement, which are taxed, whereas those paid to married employees are not.

Working rule agreements are drawn up between representatives of employers and trade unions to govern rates of pay and conditions of work in the construction and various allied industries. The Inland Revenue is not a party to the agreements itself, but in view of the high degree of mobility of employees in the industries concerned the Revenue has for many years agreed that payments of certain of the allowances under the agreements — including those for board and lodging — should not be taxed, on the basis that in the generality of cases the employee would be entitled to an offsetting expenses deduction for some or all of the expenses in question. In short, this arrangement has no statutory effect but is simply one of administrative convenience for the benefit of employers, employees and the Revenue alike. It is welcomed by employers and is designed to obviate the need for the many individual expenses claims that would otherwise arise.

One of the allowances is for board and lodging, where the employee is working at a site which necessitates his living away from home. Under the Revenue's practice in respect of such agreements, such lodging allowances paid to a single employee who does not maintain dependants at his permanent home are taxed, whereas those paid to a married employee or to a single person with dependants are not.

The reason for this difference in treatment is that it is clear in the case of a married man or a single man with dependants that, in addition to the cost of his lodgings while away from home, he will continue to incur the expense of maintaining a permanent home for his dependants. The case of a single man without dependants is less clear cut and may be distinguished because he may or may not have continuing responsibilities.

This is an extra-statutory concession, but I quite see that the distinction is somewhat arbitrary. However, if it is to work, the Revenue and employers alike need clear-cut rules and definitions which can be operated in practice and which we do not have to police with too many local inquiries. That is why the line has been drawn in this way.

This is a complicated matter and I have tried to explain the difference between the statutory position and the extra-statutory position and how it is operating. Nothing, as it operates, is denying any taxpayer of any of his statutory rights. In so far as there is a concession, it is obviously a concession which benefits the married person with dependants or the single person with dependants. They are getting a concession. No one is denied any statutory right as a result of the way in which this operates.

When I looked into the matter, I felt uneasy about the point which the hon. Gentleman has raised. I cannot give a clear assurance that there is an easy answer to it, but we shall look carefully at it to see whether there is a practicable way in which this particular feature in the arrangements operated by the Revenue might be relaxed so as to take account of the single employee who does not have dependants living with him but who is, nevertheless, maintaining a permanent home, which, I think, is the precise point at which the hon. Gentleman is getting.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I am grateful to the Minister for rehearsing the background to this matter. I have been through it in correspondence with his predecessor and know it well. I have summed up the basic grievance in my speech which the Minister has come to at the end of his remarks.

The working rule agreement is the basis of the anomaly, but it is intolerable that, as is so clearly demonstrated, when a married man and a single man, both with homes in the same town, go to work in another town together, the single man should be taxed on the hotel accommodation that he must have in order to carry out this duties, while his married colleague is not taxed. He is worse off although he is carrying out his duties at work. That is an intolerable situation which does not apply only to my constituent. It has wider implications for others, which is why I have raised it this evening.

I am grateful to the Minister for saying that he will look at it. It is an arbitrary distinction and I hope that he will find some way of overcoming it, not just in the case of my constituent, under his particular working rule agreement, but in all working rule agreements that apply to other employees in other parts of the country.

I can understand, and I think my constituent understands, that it is to the benefit of the Revenue, firms and employees that arrangements of this sort should operate. It is clearly to everybody's benefit that they should, but not if they give rise to anomalies of this sort.

I have fought to try to have this put right for some years and I plead with the Minister to take action on this quickly so that the anomaly is not continued. I know that he cannot find and announce the solution now, but I hope that he will be able to come to the House soon, having expressed his understanding of the predicament in which my constituent finds himself, and announce that a solution to it has been found.

The Minister having given those assurances, I am pleased to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 24

EXTENSION OF SECTION 5A OIL TAXATION ACT 1975 (ALLOWANCE OF EXPLORATION AND APPRAISAL EXPENDITURE) TO EXPENDITURE INCURRED IN DEVELOPING AN OILFIELD

"(1) With respect to expenditure incurred on or after 1st July 1986, section 5A of the Oil Taxation Act 1975 (allowance of exploration and appraisal expenditure) shall be amended in accordance with subsections (2) and (3) below.

(2) For subsection (1)(b) of section 5A of the Oil Taxation Act 1975, there shall be substituted—

"(b) is so incurred either wholly and exclusively for one or more of the purposes specified in subsection (2) below or, being expenditure which would be allowable under section 3 of this Act in relation to a field, is incurred before the first day of the critical half year as defined in section 1(4) of this Act for that field."

(3) At the end of subsection (1)(c) of section 5A of the Oil Taxation Act 1975, there shall be added—

"or, if it does so relate, was incurred on or after 1st July 1986."." [Mr. Kennedy.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I am grateful that the new clause, which I have tabled along with my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), has been selected and that we have the opportunity for a short debate on this important matter. I hope that the House will understand if I put the matter in context by painting the importance of the issue to my constituency, to my part of the country and to the economy as a whole.

The House will be well aware of the growing concern in the oil and oil-related industries as the result of the developments that have taken place as a result of the dramatic and remarkable fall in price on the international market. That fall in price has beneficial consequences for many aspects of the economy. Indeed, no secret has been made of that fact by Ministers, who have welcomed it. However, it has carried with it a downside, as most things do, in respect to the pace and momentum of North sea oil

My concern arises because in the Ross, Cromarty and Skye constituency there are two major fabrication yards, Howard Doris on the Kishorn site, Wester Ross, and Highlands Fabricators, which, I am glad to say, recently won the substantial Eider platform contract, leading to an audible sigh of relief throughout the economically depressed Easter Ross area. In addition, there is McDermotts, Ardersier, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), which was unlucky in regard to the Eider award. There are many examples of the oil-related industries creating employment generally on the supply and servicing side. Therefore, the downturn in prices that has given rise to a downturn in development activity is bad news for areas dependent on the large construction contracts and servicing and supply contracts that come from the momentum of North sea development as a whole.

With OPEC in some disarray, we can hardly look to the Treasury to solve such a complicated and volatile international problem. I do not ask the Minister to try to perform miracles in promising or guaranteeing specific levels of oil price in the future and stability in the market; coming even from these Benches, I think that that would be fairly unreasonable, given the geopolitics and economics of oil at present. However, the Government should give us the opportunity to hear from the Dispatch Box at this stage their views on steps with regard to the tax regime and certain aspects of it as they affect development work in the North sea.

I have had a fair amount of correspondence of late with Ministers on the matter. It is worth bearing in mind that the rewards for Britain's current attractiveness as a location for petroleum investment are high. I refer to an industry study of two years ago on the geological potential of the United Kingdom. It is estimated that beween then and the end of the century about 80 new fields could be developed, 100 production platforms built, 1,400 appraisal and development wells drilled and over 2,700 miles of offshore pipeline installed. That would be expected to call for an expenditure of up to £60 billion at 1984 prices, three quarters of which could reasonably be anticipated to be awarded directly via contracts by British companies. That is a considerable long-term potential. I think that we all agree that we want to see as much of that potential realised as possible.

The argument that is beginning to build up in oil circles and elsewhere is that the time has come to look at the existing tax structure for North sea work and see whether there is anything that the Government can do at this stage, because of the depressing effect of reduced oil prices, to encourage development work.

9.45 pm

A few weeks ago I made proposals both to the Department of Energy and to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. The Minister with responsibility for industry at the Scottish Office commented on some of the points that I made. He endorsed the view of both the Treasury and the Department of Energy and said that there was little evidence that the tax regime was making economic projects uneconomic. That is not a clear-cut issue. Even this new clause is not the panacea to all ills, but the distinction that is being made by Ministers is missing the point to a certain extent.

It is valid to argue that a project that is economic before tax considerations are taken into account remains economic, even under the present fiscal regime. It is not the tax regime that has led to the problem. The fall in the price of oil has led to the problem. Constraints surround what the Government could do, although one could argue that they could do more. However, that is not the point that I want to make this evening. The Government could encourage the oil companies to continue development work by altering the tax regime. This was acknowledged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech on 18 March. He said:

"Otherwise, I propose only minor technical changes to the taxation of North sea oil; but I am continuing to keep the economics of incremental investment under review, and shall not hesitate to introduce at the earliest opportunity any changes which may prove necessary to ensure that worthwhile projects are not frustrated by the fiscal regime." —[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 174.]

The industry welcomed that statement. Under the strict criteria of the Chancellor's argument a cogent case can be made for saying that as yet there is little evidence of worthwhile projects being frustrated purely by the fiscal regime. However, given the fall in the price of oil, the fiscal regime is one means by which some stimulus could be provided to create the momentum that is now lacking.

I acknowledge that there are difficulties. Different types of fiscal alterations could be introduced, but I do not intend to rehearse them tonight; some of them are outwith the bounds of the new clause. I am more interested in the principle that is at stake, which is what action could be taken by the Government. One of the difficulties was best summed up in a recent article by Dominic Lawson, who wrote an article in the Lombard column under the appropriate title

"Taxing times in the North Sea."

He referred to the general argument surrounding the petroleum revenue tax regime and made the very important point that if the Government introduced certain concessions the oil majors would perhaps not channel the money right back into the North sea. They are baulking at North sea developments because they are not sure that the project will give a satisfactory return irrespective of the tax regime.

Money given back by the Government is more likely to fuel the acquisition of one company's reserves by another. That outcome would not be attractive to the Government and I would share their view about that. Mr. Lawson goes on to detail some of the other difficulties that would arise if the type of concession given was the one that we now read so much about in the financial press. It is a concession promoted by the major companies and it would benefit them.

I appreciate that there is a genuine problem and I do not pretend that this new clause would in itself be able to overcome it. The Scottish Grand Committee recently debated the oil industry and in the Committee the Minister of State, Department of Energy developed the argument about which I have spoken. He said:

"Several companies and associations in the oil industry have put forward suggestions for change. I suggest to the Committee, however, that the tests that we apply to those suggestions have to be, first and foremost, not merely what effect a tax change has on the cash flow of a company. A company will naturally argue for changes in tax that will help cash flow".—[Official Report, Scottish Grand Committee, 24 June 1986; c. 9.]

The central point is surely the purpose for which the increased cash flow is used. It should be used in a way that will not simply generate more profits for the company with no guarantee of subsequent reinvestment in the areas in which we seek investment.

One of the ideas being canvassed goes slightly beyond the scope of the new clause, but is relevant to the issue that the new clause seeks to address. It is the abolition of inter-field ring fences on development costs. The ability of the oil companies to set development costs and new projects against PRT on existing fields could reduce the net capital investment on new field development and shorten the pay-back period. That abolition would arise from the concession which allows exploration costs to be set against PRT.

If that kind of change is considered, I strongly urge that the principle of ring fencing should be retained for the whole of the North sea. I say that for the reasons that I have outlined: that any returns accruing to the oil companies as a result of such a concession would have to be reinvested directly in the continuing development of the North sea as opposed to being directed to other activities. It is that type of approach to which I hope the Government will give further consideration, and it is with that type of approach and in that spirit that the new clause is moved.

[Mr. Charles Kennedy]

The clause is not perfect, and since I tabled it I have been advised that if I want to make its provisions more comprehensive about the development work that could be encouraged I should add at the point which reads the words "and section 3 of the Oil Taxation Act 1983". Therefore, I am the first to concede that the clause is not as good as it could be, and on that ground alone I suspect that the Minister will probably reject it.

"under section 3 of this Act"

The clause is put forward to voice the view that we must be getting near the stage where some kind of Government action is required to forward development work. In putting forward that case, it must be remembered that we are not talking just about profits, jobs, industries and communities such as mine. Those things are important, but we are also talking about the beginning of the disbandment, especially by many of the major companies, of the development teams, the people who are concentrated in Aberdeen and elsewhere. Those people have the ability to work as a team and to carry forward development plans and projects from concept to reality.

With the industry in some disarray and with there perhaps being some over-reaction to the present difficulties, we shall lose some valuable people as they are dispersed. A signal from the Government might do something to retain those important people, so that if the price picks up again development work can be carried out and seemingly non-viable fields can once again become viable. Such a measure might favourably affect the viability of certain projects.

The aim of the new clause is to permit expenditure on developing a field to be offset against PRT payable on another field owned by the same licensee. The clause works by expanding the relief currently available for exploration and appraisal expenditure on searching for oil and so on, as contained in section 5A of the Oil Taxation Act 1975. The relief is limited to expenditure incurred before "the critical half-year". That means that relief is limited to the period before the six months in which production from the field exceeds 1,000 metric tonnes.

Thus, the aim would be to limit the qualifying expenditure to that incurred in developing the field, as opposed to operating it. Rather as I said about the use of any extra returns that may accrue to companies, my anxiety is about development work and about maintaining its momentum.

Relief would be available only for expenditure incurred from 1 July 1986. Thus, if a field commenced production after that date, but expenditure had been incurred in the period bridging 1 July, only the expenditure from 1 July would qualify. Having admitted the difficulties, complexities and political constraints that would face any Government, especially following the difficulties in which OPEC finds itself, I hope that the Minister will be able to accept the spirit in which the new clause has been moved. I hope that he will also accept the genuine local concern about present developments in the oil industry and the effect that is already being experienced on the Scottish economy. I fear that things will get considerably worse if the current slowdown in development persists.

It is also worrying that when the Chancellor referred to this difficulty, he also told us that his Budget strategy was based on the price of oil probably levelling out this year at about $15. That figure is beginning to look rather optimistic. In recent days, the price has fallen still further. But even in the unlikely event that the price returns to an average of $15 a barrel, it must be recalled that the Scottish Development Agency recently did a computer projection which showed that if that oil price was projected over a 10-year period it would lead to a cut of no less than 40 per cent. in spending by the companies. That means big trouble for some of the firms and major industries that have contributed so much in terms of advanced international technology. Moreover, the oil industry contributes to 25 per cent. of what is left of our manufacturing capacity.

Those are the reasons for this admittedly imperfect new clause. I hope that the Minister will give us the benefit of the Treasury's thoughts at this stage. I also hope that, when the Treasury continually says that it is keeping the matter under review, it is not just wringing its hands while the oil industry collapses round our ears, rather like the price of oil has done, but that it is ready to step in and to take preventive action. I hope that the Treasury is convinced that such action will be of assistance. Indeed, hon. Members on both sides of the House are becoming increasingly sure that it will be.

It being Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

Ordered.

That, at this day's sitting, the Patents, Designs and Marks Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. [Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Finance Bill

Not amended (in the Committee and as amended in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Question again proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) has a strong constituency interest in the oil industry and in the offshore supply industry. I appreciate what has prompted him to move the amendment and I am grateful for the restraint with which he did so. I noted the hon. Gentleman's comments about Mr. Dominic Lawson. I am not sure how seriously those comments were meant, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that all Treasury Ministers read Mr. Dominic Lawson very seriously.

The new clause seeks to widen the definition of expenditure qualifying for immediate PRT relief to include any development expenditure other than long-term assets incurred before total production from the field reaches 1,000 tonnes. Its intention, I assume, is to include all development expenditure although as drafted, capital expenditure qualifying for relief under section 3 of the Oil Taxation Act 1983 is not covered. In other words, the aim is considerably to extend the scope for companies to offset North sea costs against the PRT payable in respect of other fields. In that case, it is a new development because it breaches the present field-by-field basis of the charge.

The new clause represents a significant relaxation of the present North sea fiscal regime. The hon. Member argued that some relaxation is required to cushion the impact of the fall in oil prices. It would be wrong simply to focus on the rate of tax. Admittedly, that looks high, but it is only part of the story. Account must also be taken of the especially generous reliefs built into the system. The net result is a regime that is well-tuned to adapt automatically to oil price movements.

On the Government's calculations, tax take on an accruals basis as a proportion of pre-tax North sea revenues remains almost unchanged in 1986 from the 1985 figure. If we compare tax with the pre-tax trading surplus —that is, sales revenue minus operating costs—we see that the proportion has fallen quite significantly. The North sea continues to provide substantial profits for the oil industry while the tax regime ensures that the Government bear their share of the consequences of the price fall. It should be remembered that these conclusions exclude the industry's downstream operations and these are generally more profitable than has been the case for some time.

The Government have long made it clear that one of the overall objectives of the North sea tax regime is to leave companies with adequate incentives for future exploration and development. It was with this objective in mind that we introduced in the 1983 Budget a package of generous reliefs aimed at exploration and new fields. In our view, there is no evidence that the tax system as thus reformed, is causing problems. Virtually all developments which are economic in pre-tax terms remain economic after tax. The hon. Member admitted that in his remarks and said that as yet there are no signs that developments were being held up. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will not argue that something which was uneconomic before tax should be made economic after tax.

I assure the hon. Member that the Government are in no way complacent about the problems which could be created by the fall in oil prices. It is our practice to keep the overall impact of the regime under review and in recent months we have kept a particularly close watch on the position. We believe that it is especially important to maintain contact with the industry. In addition to our regular contacts, we have specifically invited the industry to submit evidence about the operation of the present regime in the new situation.

Some evidence has already come in and this is being analysed. In addition, we have made our own analysis, which suggests that where lower prices seem to be causing delays, tax cannot be blamed. Projects that are uneconomic after tax are almost always uneconomic before tax. In any event, as a result of the changes that we made in 1983, many of the next generation of projects are paying virtually no PRT and no royalties. They will be subject to the same regime as companies in the rest of the United Kingdom's industry and will pay only corporation tax.

Even if it appeared that some relaxation of the present regime were needed, it is not clear that the measures set out in the new clause would provide the answer. By providing an incentive to projects which would otherwise be uneconomic, distortions would inevitably be introduced into the system. Investment priorities would be determined in part by fiscal considerations. In general, there is no guarantee that the tax thus saved by the companies would be channelled into increased activity on the United Kingdom's continental shelf. Such activity might be channelled outside the United Kingdom altogether.

For these reasons, we do not believe that the cost of the proposed change could be justified. I have explained to the hon. Gentleman the extent to which we watch developments. For the reasons that I have given, some of which he has heard before, I cannot accept the new clause.

Mr. Kennedy: I shall not say that I am grateful, but I thank the Minister for his reply. I accept that it cannot be argued that it is tax, in splendid isolation, which is causing all the problems in the North sea. It is OPEC and not tax which is doing that. However, the one lever which is at the Government's disposal and which can influence development activity is the fiscal regime. I enter the plea that the Government keep that under close review. I was glad to hear what the Minister said about that in his reply. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that a close review is taking place with a view to the making of any changes which may become worth while, and which may yet persuade Ministers of the need for action. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in March, Ministers will not hesitate to make changes.

We do not want to see any accruals which would come to oil companies being directed elsewhere. I hope that other changes that the Treasury may consider in due course can be geared in a way that ensures that any returns coming to the companies can be reinvested directly in development work, which will lead in turn to contracts for companies which employ many people—sadly, some do not—in the north of Scotland, of which they can take advantage. I thank the Minister for his indication of Treasury thinking at this stage from the Lawson in the Financial Times and the Lawson at No. 11. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Further consideration adjourned. — [Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Bill (not amended in the Committee, and as amended in the Standing Committee), to be further considered this day.

Patents, Designs and Marks Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

10.10 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill is a non-controversial amending measure. It is of restricted scope and is directed to two particular purposes. Since this is the first time that the Bill has come before the House, let me briefly state what these purposes are.

Clause 1 and schedule 1 amend the Trade Marks Act 1938, the Registered Designs Act 1949 and the Patents Act 1977 so that the Patent Office will no longer be obliged to keep its statutory registers in documentary form. The Patent Office will therefore be able to computerise such parts of the registers as it finds expedient as soon as this becomes possible. The public will be able to inspect the material on the computerised registers—for example, on VDUs at the Patent Office—and to obtain hard copies.

The other main subject of the Bill is service marks. Provision is made for the registration of service marks by the Trade Marks (Amendment) Act 1984, which was originally introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell). That Act is not yet in force, but the Government intend to implement it from 1 October this year. Before that can be done, however, a number of consequential amendments need to be made to existing legislation, and that is the purpose of clause 2 and schedule 2.

Several amendments to the Bill were effected in Committee, but they were all technical. Some were consequential on amendments already effected in another place, and others were directed to correcting an omission in the 1984 Act. They were all, as I have said, technical amendments and the Bill before the House today is, in all major respects, no different from the Bill as brought from another place.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): This small but useful measure is brought forward at a time when the whole world of intellectual property is in a state of rapid transformation. First, there was the White Paper "Intellectual Property and Innovation" published in April this year, which I assume presages a major piece of legislation to be introduced in the new Session. Then there is the change in the status of the Patent Office, a change which I should make clear that Labour Members regard with some scepticism, and which has aroused the anxieties of the work force at the Patent Office. That is one aspect of the new legislation that we shall consider with considerable care and critical judgment.

Less controversially, there is the impending decision to be taken as to the siting of the European Community's trade marks office. I make clear the support of Labour Members for the campaign waged by the Government in support of siting the office in Britain. We support that campaign, both on its merits and because we believe that it is high time that we had placed with us in this country the headquarters of a major European Community institution. It is a sort of quid for a substantial quo.

In case you are on the point of saying, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that none of those matters is strictly relevant to the Bill, I concede immediately that the Bill, as the Minister has said, concerns itself with two small but, in their own way, important points. The first enables the Patent Office to bring itself into the computer age. I think that the Bill removes obstacles rather than commands the Patent Office to do that. The Patent Office is well advanced in its plans for the computerisation of its records. Secondly, the Bill, in a sense, makes consequential amendments which will pave the way for the introduction of service marks in October this year.

We support both those worthwhile measures. Accordingly, during the brief earlier stages of the Bill, we have contended ourselves with asking the odd probing question and watching the progress of the Bill with a benevolent eye. Now that it has reached its final stage, we are happy to give it a Third Reading.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am grateful to the Under-Secretary of State for allowing this brief debate to take place. I am sure that he agrees that, because the Bill originated in the other place and was considered in Standing Committee, it is appropriate for us to spend some time rehearsing it on the Floor of the House.

I congratulate the Under-Secretary of State on the smooth passage of the Bill which he has piloted through the House. Obviously, there were more complex debates in the other place. The alliance is grateful that the Government listened carefully to the contribution of my noble Friend Lord Lloyd of Kilgerran, some of whose amendments were considered in depth and some of which were accepted. His knowledge is recognised by both sides of the House.

The Bill's objectives, restricted though they are, are to be applauded. Some work remains to be done if the legislation is to meet the needs of modern business. I single out the inclusion of service marks as an especially welcome provision. We do, however, have some doubts about the costs of acquiring these new service marks. If small business men use professional advisers, it can cost as much as £1,500 to £2,000 to obtain a United Kingdom patent. If that is extended to a worldwide patent, it could cost as much as £50,000. The Government would do well to bear in mind those costs and to ascertain whether they can be reduced.

Lord Lloyd of Kilgerran described this aspect of the law as being full of "fulginous obscurity" — a well-known Welsh expression. We believe that small inventors should be able to register service marks more cheaply than at present.

As Lord Lucas and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) said, we now have the White Paper on intellectual property. I think I would be ruled out of order if I followed its arguments, but I should like some of its ideas to be included in the legislation. I accept that, if that had been done, the measure might have been made controversial and its progress might have been stymied.

We are still slightly surprised that the Government did not respond more positively to the proposal to extend privilege to patent agents who do trade mark work. Those agents do work which, in other cases, would be done by solicitors or even counsel. They play an important role in the creation of wealth and work extremely closely with industry. It is slightly perverse to continue this lack of privilege, to which reference was made in the other place. Recently, in "Reports of Patent Cases 1983", Mr. Justice Nurse is reported as having said:

"It seems odd and perverse that, if a trade mark agent was entitled to advise a client in relation to legal matters and to conduct certain legal proceedings on his behalf, the same privilege should not apply as would certainly apply in a case where the advice was being given and the proceedings were being conducted by a solicitor."

We should have been happier if such a provision were included in the Bill. We hope that there will be opportunities to include such a measure in the not-too-distant future.

I return to where I began, by congratulating the Under-Secretary of State on piloting the Bill so smoothly towards the statute book.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): I commend these new measures, which will modernise the registers of trade marks and bring Britain into line with the most modern practices in the rest of the world. In this new modernised system there is a perfect opportunity for the European trade mark office to be brought to England, to Greater London. It would be a great advantage for the country to have the European trade mark office here and it would be right and proper that it should be so. I must say, in an entirely objective manner, that the place for it to be is Harrow. We have an old intellectual background, with a modern dynamic community. Nowhere in Europe could fulfil all the criteria for the office more successfully than Harrow with its nearness to London airport and London, magnificent communications and magnificent schools.

I am grateful to have this opportunity, on behalf of myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes), who is in his place and who, with his European knowledge, blazed the trail for the Government to follow to Harrow. We hope that soon the whole weight of the Government's prestige will be behind having the European trade mark office in England and I think that it should be in Harrow.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

European Community (Agricultural Reforms)

10.21 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 6466/86, draft Regulation amending Regulations 797/85, 270/79, 1360/78 and 355/77 on agricultural structures in order to adjust agriculture to the new market situation and maintain rural areas and draft Decision amending Decision 83/641 on joint research programmes and programmes for co-ordinating agricultural research, and 7126/86, draft Regulation amending Regulations 797/85, 355/77 and 1360/78 on agricultural structures to take account of the accession of Spain; and supports the Government's view that these measures should have as a primary aim the closer alignment of agricultural production to the requirements of the market and that the measures must be both cost-effective and containable within existing expenditure ceilings.

With the leave of the House, we shall tonight consider principally the package of socio-structural measures contained in European Community document 6466/86, but it will be convenient to take with it European Community document 7126/86, which extends to Spain the provisions of Council regulation 797/85.

The proposals in document 6466/86 are designed to complement the agricultural price measures agreed by the Council of Ministers at the end of April. They seek to assist farmers to adjust to price restraint but they also seek to achieve a measure of progress towards diverting agricultural land to alternative uses.

We welcome the attempt by the Commission to complement price measures with structural measures to achieve a better orientation of agricultural production within the Community in order to reduce surpluses. As the House is well aware, we have fought long and hard to try to get agricultural production in the Community into a better balance and reduce the burden of supporting surplus production.

Against that background we shall be examining very closely the consequences of the proposals for the Community budget. The Commission had estimated that the package would cost about 900 million ecu over the period to 1991. The expenditure up to 1989 would fall within the current five-year financial framework for the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund guidance section as a whole. The Commission has stated that the present five-year framework figure would be sufficient to accommodate this expenditure.

We also welcome the Commission's recognition that environmental concerns must be given due priority in any consideration of the future direction of the common agricultural policy. That is reflected in certain of the measures proposed in the socio-structures package, notably the proposals relating to environmentally sensitive areas.

I would like now to deal in a little more detail with the substance of the package. First, under the pre-pension scheme, farmers aged 55 or over who took their holdings out of production or handed them over to young relatives would be eligible for an annual payment attracting an EAGGF contribution of 25 per cent., 50 per cent. in certain less favoured areas, to a maximum of 4,000 ecu for married farmers and 2,500 ecu for single farmers. The precise level of pre-pension payable, for a minimum of five years and a maximum of 10 years, would be left to member states to determine in the context of their own socio-economic conditions. Where land was fallowed or put to non-agricultural use such as forestry, the pre-pension would be supplemented by an annual hectarage payment, payable, in the case of forestry, over the period of establishment. There would also be provision for agricultural workers aged 55 or over, displaced as a result of the scheme, to receive a pre-pension.

The likely effectiveness of a general age-related outgoers scheme, such as the proposed pre-pension arrangements, in reducing surplus production will need to be carefully considered, but we are worried that its effectiveness in that respect will be limited not least because it provides for succession by a younger relative. So we shall be looking for further justification for adopting the approach that the Commission has suggested.

Beneficiaries of the pre-pension scheme would also be eligible for capital grants towards the cost of adapting their holdings to non-farming functions, providing they were environmentally acceptable.

We have some reservations about that radical step. The proposal could cover such things as racecourses, golf courses and so on. There is no requirement that the owner demonstrate that the investment is sound or what benefits will accrue. That provision, therefore, needs much more examination.

As regards pensions for farm workers, we already have a well-established social security system in the United Kingdom, which includes provisions for redundancy payments and for unemployment benefit. I do not believe that an additional measure such as this is required or that it would be helpful.

It is proposed that member states may pay an annual premium to young farmers who reduce production either by farming their holding more extensively or by producing for quality rather than quantity. We shall clearly want to consider the proposal in much more detail than it has been possible to do so far. But we doubt that the proposed arrangements would provide sufficient inducement to restrain production and whether they would therefore be cost-effective. Their administration would also be extremely complex and at first sight there would appear to be major problems of enforcement.

I now refer to the proposals on environmentally sensitive areas. When regulation 797/85 was agreed in March of last year, we successfully negotiated provision for designation of environmentally sensitive areas. Then the Commission also committed itself to making further proposals to provide for EC funding of the measures, and it has now done that. However, to safeguard EC funding, more specific conditions are proposed, including a maximum payment against which reimbursement would be paid, and a requirement that payments be made annually on a hectarage basis and that each ESA agreement must run for at least five years. I can appreciate the Commission's concerns, but the proposals are disappointing. They introduce an unnecessary degree of inflexibility, which we shall seek to have removed, although obviously at this stage I cannot predict our chances of success.

The package contains a number of proposals relating to the payment of compensatory allowances in the less favoured areas. They include amendments to the framework under which hill livestock compensatory allowances are payable.

First, it is proposed to vary the present range within which HLCAs have to be paid—that is, from 20·3 to 101 ecu per livestock unit, up to a maximum of 101 ecu, or around £64, per hectare. The Commission proposed a minimum allowance of 30 ecu per livestock unit and a new maximum of 120 ecu per hectare of livestock unit in areas where the severity of the permanent natural handicap justified it. Secondly, it is proposed to increase HLCA allowances by 50 per cent. where producers undertake to improve quality or to change production to meet market needs, or significantly reduce the intensity of production for five years. Thirdly, it is proposed that the maximum allowance attracting EAGGF contributions should be set at 3,000 ecu, or around £1,900, per labour unit.

Fourthly, it is proposed that, where land goes out of agriculture under the pre-pension arrangements, HLCAs would continue to be paid for the duration of those arrangements. Fifthly, it is proposed to amend the provision relating to the afforestation of HLCA land by extending the period during which producers who afforest all or part of their HLCA land may have such land taken into account in their HLCA calculations from 15 years to 20 years.

If adopted, these proposals could have a significant effect on the existing arrangements for paying HLCAs in this country; and, in general, we can give them a cautious welcome. However, there are aspects that are not entirely clear, and in negotiations in Brussels we shall seek to secure improvements. But the proposals are framed so that member states will have a good deal of discretion on the actual implementation. Decisions on the precise nature of any changes in the HLCA arrangements as a result of the new EC proposals would be taken in the context of the review of economic conditions in the hills and uplands which we conduct each autumn. I am not, therefore, in a position at the moment to spell out the full opportunities that might be available to less favoured area producers — or to give a realistic indication of the cost implications.

It is also proposed to extend the system of compensatory allowances to other farmers in the less favoured areas, though a range of commodities would be specifically excluded from coverage. The objective of this proposal is not entirely clear. It seems to us unlikely to control surpluses and is therefore unattractive, even as an optional measure. Moreover, given that compensatory allowances are restricted to the less favoured areas, it is questionable how much scope there is for encouraging non-livestock production here in the United Kingdom.

I now turn to the measures proposed on forestry and farm woodlands. These are of course areas which will need particularly careful attention as we consider ideas for alternative uses for land now producing agricultural surpluses. The Commission has proposed certain changes to the existing provisions on farm forestry in regulation 797/85, which we have not so far implemented in the United Kingdom because we have considered our national grant schemes to be more favourable. It has also included in the pre-pension proposals provisions which could lead to the afforestation of land taken out of agriculture by those qualifying for the pre-pension. Both these sets of proposals will need careful examination. They will also require to be considered against the background of the proposals which will flow from the EC Commissions consultations on forestry, which we expect to see later this year.

The proposals on training would specifically include three areas of training within those which are eligible for EAGGF reimbursement — training in production of quality lines, in the application of production methods compatible with environmental protection and in forestry skills for farmers. The proposals are a small though welcome addition to a wider regulation covering vocational training. They would be expected only to have a minor effect in the United Kingdom if the regulation on training is implemented.

The Commission has also proposed two measures in the marketing area. They modify regulation 1360/78 on launching aid to producer groups and regulation 355/77 on grant to projects involving investment in marketing and processing. The first proposal, the extension of the life of regulation 1360/76, would apply only to Belgium and the Mediterranean regions. It therefore brings no benefit to the United Kingdom, where we have our own system of formation grants for co-operatives under the agricultural and horticultural co-operation scheme. The Government will therefore be particularly concerned about the financial implication of the proposal. There is little doubt that agricultural structures in the Mediterranean member states need improving but we would need to be satisfied about how useful the proposal is likely to be given that there has been no expenditure under it in recent years.

The second proposal on marketing would amend regulation 355/77 to enable encouragement to be given to investment in the marketing and processing of "alternative crops". The Commission has organically grown products particularly in mind. The maximum grant would be increased by five percentage points. Individual projects not falling within an investment programme could also be aided at the basic rate. We accept that the possibility that individual projects may be aided may be useful, but may be unnecessary where member states already have investment programmes for the sectors concerned. We will be investigating the proposed higher rates of grant because there are restricted funds available for this regulation. We will need to be satisfied that they are really necessary, even though the Commission expects to contain expenditure within the existing provision.

Provisions for modifying the Community's agricultural research and development programme are included in the package. These are intended to redirect the programme to take account of recent developments affecting agriculture.

Our objectives will be to ensure that the changes proposed to the programme are justified in their own right and do not overlap with other Community initiatives in this area. We will also seek to ensure that such work is most appropriately dealt with on a Community rather than a national basis and represents value for money. We will also bear in mind that concerted action between scientists in the Community, in the form of seminars and information exchanges, can be a quicker and cheaper way of advancing scientific thinking than shared cost research. In a process of adjustment we clearly need to ensure that we have wide and rapid access to results which will be of assistance to agriculture.

In conclusion, our overall attitude towards the socio-structures package is to welcome it as an expression of the Commission's intention to assist the reorientation of agricultural production within the Community in the face of price restraint. But we are not yet convinced that it is the right way to proceed. There are elements contained in it which we support, but as I have mentioned, there are also elements which will require a great deal of further consideration. We shall also be paying particular attention to the financial implications of the package in terms of cost effectiveness. I shall listen with great attention to the view of hon. Members on the package as a whole and on its constituent parts. I can assure the House that these will be fully taken into account during the course of the discussions on the package within the Community.

[Mrs. Peggy Fenner]

Document 7126/86 amends regulation 797/85 on agricultural structures to take account of Spain's accession to the Community. It was discussed by the Council of Agriculture Ministers at the end of May and was agreed in principle, subject to the approval of the European Parliament.

The proposal stems from a statement issued by the Community on 18 April 1985 during the Spanish accession negotiations. The statement acknowledged the structural shortcomings in certain areas of Spain, and confirmed the Community's readiness to make provision for certain favourable conditions under the existing structures legislation. Although the proposal goes further than the statement, all the proposed measures are well precedented elsewhere. The measures provide for some easing of the eligibility conditions for compensatory allowances and capital grants. They also provide for a temporary increase in the maximum rate of capital grant which may be paid and for an increase in EAGGF reimbursement for aids to investments on holdings, compensatory allowances and for aids to joint investment schemes in the least favoured of the less favoured areas.

The Commission has also proposed changes to regulations 355/77 and 1360/78 to take account of Spanish accession. Under regulation 355/77, investment projects in the more disadvantaged regions of the Community receive 50 per cent. or 35 per cent. FEOGA grant rather than the usual 25 per cent. The proposal is to include Spain in the countries eligible for the higher rates of grant and to define the regions to which the rates apply. As regards regulation 1360/78, the proposal is merely to include Spain in the list of member states to which it applies. The Commission has said that the expenditure will be met from within existing financial provisions. The proposals were both agreed by the Council of Agriculture Ministers in May.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I was about to thank the Parliamentary Secretary for her lucid explanation of the documents, but I am not sure whether such thanks would be very convincing. I wish that the hon. Lady could have seen the expression on the faces of her officials in the Box when she undertook to give detailed consideration to all the points raised in the debate.

The term "socio-structural policy" could only have come from Brussels. However, it appears to be a first timid step in the direction of a comprehensive policy for the benefit of rural areas. The Labour party has been calling for such an approach for some time, and welcomes the fact that it may be on the agenda at last.

I must express a fundamental doubt whether the basic objectives of a rural policy can possibly be dealt with within any comprehensive European framework. The patterns of rural communities, farms and the natural environment of the countryside are subject to so many essentially local variations that it seems to us that it would be more sensible to deal with such local affairs at a national level. My hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) has repeatedly called for the repatriation of national aspects of the common agricultural policy, and any proposals for structural reform seem to be obvious candidates for national decisions and initiatives within a framework of European priorities.

What the CAP lacks in logic it makes up for in momentum. We have known for years that the system of unrestricted market support through intervention was distorting agriculture, penalising the consumer and fleecing the taxpayer, but the juggernaut is still rolling on, and this year will probably bring even more intervention stores for junk cereal surpluses that no one would want even if they could afford to buy them. The system should go bust, but it will probably not be allowed to. What we need now are policies to restrict output, encourage better types of farming and protect rural communities. My party has made a range of suggestions including disincentives for the production of surplus commodities and incentives for the production of things that we need more of, especially timber.

Such a major shift of direction will require carrot as well as stick. We have had some stick in the form of milk quotas, the co-responsibility levy and higher intervention standards. I take it that the documents before us are supposed to offer a somewhat diminutive carrot to encourage farmers to produce less of the surplus commodities and to do so in a more sensitive manner.

One cannot turn a barley baron into a fully-fledged Friend of the Earth overnight, and the Minister knows that many people in the industry are facing a culture shock. I speak not just for myself but for a number of farmers in my constituency. However, in the past, agriculture has responded spectacularly to incentives and guidance from Governments and from the Community. Just as the industry has responded to production incentives, I have no doubt that it can work within a different set of priorities in future.

The trouble is that the industry has been adrift in a sea of indecision for a number of years. The word "Jopling" has passed into the farming vocabulary as a term for prevarication, confusion and muddle. The prospect of the Minister taking over the Presidency of the Council of Agriculture Ministers at this critical stage is causing some alarm and despondency. But never mind, we have here some new ideas so it is fair enough that we should have a look at them.

The first heading that we are discussing is this so-called pre-pension scheme, which seems to be another way of saying early retirement. I welcome any initiative which could start to establish a career structure in agriculture. It would let older farmers retire and young entrants into the industry. But I question whether a pension of £2,547 a year, less than £50 a week, would be enough of an incentive to persuade many 55-year-old British farmers to retire. Indeed, it is not entirely clear to me why we should want 55-year-old farmers to retire anyway.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): Is not the £2,500 that is being offered as a pension about the net farm income that most farmers of 55 are receiving at the moment anyway?

Mr. Home Robertson: I rather doubt that. The average British farmer could expect a considerably higher return than that, although there have obviously been particular problems in particular sectors, of which the hon. Gentleman is as well aware as I am.

The other question which should be raised is why a beneficiary will be allowed to relinquish his farm only to a close relative. Is there not a strong case for encouraging farmers to relinquish land to some appropriate local agency, such as a county council smallholding scheme, which could let the land to a suitably qualified young person who wants to start a career in farming? We have proposed a land bank for that sort of purpose which would fit well with such a publicly funded early retirement scheme.

The other alternative in the pre-pension proposal seems downright bizarre to many of us. Article 1*(c)* provides for the abandonment of farms which includes "simple abandonment of the land without allocation for any other utilization", although the farmer might be required to "maintain" the land, for which he would be paid £95 per hectare per year.

I would reject that idea out of hand. I doubt whether it would work. For a start, £95 per hectare would not cover the basic cost of maintaining a farm and its steading. Obviously jobs would be destroyed and the resulting rural dereliction would be fully as ugly as urban dereliction can be.

I can easily anticipate the sort of complaints about weed seeds blowing around from officially abandoned farms, and that would be the least of the problems. If the Minister will not take that from me, perhaps I may refer her to the speech made by the Minister of State, Department of the Environment, to the Oxford farming conference in January this year, if that would not be too painful. We for our part do not want to see any such abandonment of farms.

I want to raise one or two detailed points about the pre-pension proposal. The principal one is whether a landlord's consent will be required for a tenant to enter the scheme. That point should be cleared up. While I am on the general subject, may I ask how the great set-aside debate is progressing in her Department? This sounds like some kind of variation on the theme of quotas, but if it could encourage farmers to bring fallowing back into their cropping system, it could be useful from all points of view. There is a world of difference between "abandonment", as referred to in the documents, and incentives for managed fallowing, which is good husbandry and good for the environment, quite apart from its effect of reducing production.

The second point covered in the documents is the question of helping young farmers to adopt less intensive husbandry techniques. The specific question that I want to ask is why is it necessary to encourage only young farmers to adopt such methods? Surely if that is a worthwhile objective it is a worthwhile objective right across the board.

The next question that must be put is: how can it work? All of us are now supposed to be in favour of the idea of less intensive farming—it is rather like being against sin—but how precisely can the Minister define "less intensive practices" for the purposes of operating a package of incentives? I warn her that there is an underworld of agricultural consultants out there waiting to take advantage of any loopholes in any grant scheme.

The third section relates to the less-favoured areas. I am intrigued by the possibility of compensatory allowances being paid for crops and produce other than cattle and sheep. I doubt whether there is is scope for such diversification in the British upland areas, but I should be interested to know whether and how the Government propose to implement the suggestion in Britain, or whether it is entirely for the benefit of Herr Kiechle in Germany. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has raised the question of the damaging effect of overstocking, which is positively encouraged by HLCAs at present. It is a fair point. Might it be better to operate the scheme on the basis of area rather than headage? The Minister said that that was possible. Will she consider the point further? I stress that the Opposition strongly support the principle of more effective assistance in less-favoured areas.

The fourth point relates to environmental grants. The Opposition welcome the principle of incentives for farming practices which enhance or protect the rural environment. The Minister acknowledged that the Government have already made a token gesture in that direction with the six environmentally sensitive areas, which are yet to be selected. Indeed, we are still waiting for the legislation to return from the House of Lords. We welcomed the initiative, but it must be greatly expanded if it is to have a significant effect. The Government have earmarked £6 million for the pilot scheme of six sites, and the proposals that we are debating tonight could provide a further 25 per cent., or £1·5 million, from European funds. Will the Minister treat that extra money as extra cash for this purpose, and take advantage of it by designating another two environmentally sensitive areas, or will the money simply follow so much European money into the maw of the Treasury? I hope that we can have a specific answer from the Minister this evening.

The Minister also mentioned afforestation. The incentives that are suggested appear to be consistent with the proposals made by my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd a year ago, so we support them. But I must press the Government on this issue, because we are still waiting for them to implement article 20 of the previous structures directive, which would have provided much more generous and appropriate incentives for small-scale tree-planting on farms than is available through the Forestry Commission's planting grant scheme. How long must we wait before that is implemented, let alone any fresh proposals under this directive?

The documents also deal with research and training. The draft Council regulation states:

"Existing agricultural training schemes should be stepped up so that farmers can receive the services they require if they are to reorient their production, apply production methods compatible with protection of the countryside and afforest agricultural areas."

Amen to that.

Since the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be the President of the Council that considers that draft, he will have some explaining to do to his colleagues about what he has done to our agricultural advisory, research and development services in recent years and months. Only last week, the Ministry announced that it would slash another £4·1 million off the Agriculture and Food Research Council's research and development budget, and a further £2·8 million off the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service's research and development budget. We oppose that attack on ADAS, the AFRC and the Scottish agricultural colleges. We recognise the vital role of research, advice and training in such difficult times for farming, so on this occasion we must support the Commission, not the British Minister.

May I conclude on the vexed question of funding. It was originally intended that the guidance section of the common agricultral policy, which deals with structures, would account for 25 per cent. of European agricultural spending. It still accounts for less than 4 per cent. If we want the radical restructuring which the industry requires, and if we want to protect rural communities from the worst effects of that restructuring, we shall need realistic funding from the European Community and from the national Governments. Anyone who reads the publication Agra Europe will have been disturbed to see in the April edition this year the following statement:

"Although there was broad agreement on the content of the proposals in the Commission, discussion centred on the difficulties of financing the measure. It seems unlikely that they will be implemented this year in view of the Community's budgetary difficulties, and there is even doubt as to whether there will be enough cash available to introduce them in 1987."

All this talk about a socio-structural package—I would prefer to call it a rural policy—will be so much hot air if it is not backed up by the resources that are required to make it work.

What are the prospects of getting the national back-up funding that will be necessary to make it possible to implement these proposals in Britain? Since the British Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is now going to be the President of the Council of Agricultural Ministers, will he have either the clout or the ability to persuade his colleagues to begin to shift resources away from the bottomless pit of intervention buying, and to divert appropriate funding into a more constructive, comprehensive rural policy? That is the question that has to be answered.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Despite the valiant attempts of my hon. Friend the Minister to make some sense of this rather woolly document, I could not help wondering in the course of her speech what an upland farmer, say, from Bodmin moor would have thought about the start of the debate if by chance he had strayed into the Strangers' Gallery. These matters are complicated and woolly, and we all wrestle with them and wonder what they really mean.

I echo the question posed to my hon. Friend by the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson). What, for example, are the prospects of bringing in the pre-pension scheme? There is a great deal of interest among farmers on this matter. What is the attitude of Her Majesty's Government to the scheme? Are they really enthusiastic about it? Will they push it in the term of the United Kingdom presidency?

I want to concentrate on one aspect of the documents, the section dealing with compensatory allowances for less favoured areas. My hon. Friend was rather baffled when she touched on this part of the documents about the scope for extending the allowances to other types of production. So indeed was the hon. Member for East Lothian. I wonder, therefore, whether I could direct my hon. Friend's attention to a unique less favoured area in the country, the Isles of Scilly, which form the only less favoured area that is not a hill area. She will be aware that the designation of the Isles of Scilly came about some four years ago, and, as the then Member of the European Parliament for Cornwall and Plymouth, I had a small hand in winning that designation. It has meant very little to the farmers and, particularly, the growers on the Isles of Scilly simply because the animal population of the Isles of Scilly is very low. There are no upland farms. Our whole approach in this country to the less favoured areas is based on compensatory allowances for hill farmers.

My hon. Friend will know that the Isles of Scilly National Farmers Union has been pressing strongly in the intervening years to persuade the Government to institute a scheme in which designation of the islands as a less favoured area really means something to horticulture, in particular, on the islands. So far, I am afraid, the union and I have failed in our objective to persuade the Government to come forward with some such scheme. We have received a lot of sympathy from the Ministry. Indeed, the Minister's noble Friend Lord Belstead met me last year on this question. The upshot of our talks was that the Government were sympathetic, but unfortunately a suitable vehicle has not yet arrived by which the change could be made. I am wondering whether the suitable vehicle has arrived tonight in this House.

May I ask my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to examine, in particular, paragraph 2 of the document, on page 15, which refers to the possibility of an extension, and consider whether that would be a suitable vehicle for the extension of compensatory allowances to other forms of production, particularly horticulture, on the Isles of Scilly. If my hon. Friend were to do that, she would not be opening the door to a great increase in public expenditure. I have already said that the Isles of Scilly are unique. It is the only non-hill area to be designated as a less favoured area.

By happy chance, my attention was drawn to this matter today by the secretary of the Isles of Scilly branch of the National Farmers Union, Mrs. Penny Rogers, who has written to me about it. I shall be writing to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State. In the meantime, however, I should be most grateful if she would ensure that her officials looked into the matter. I shall be pressing them upon it.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The draft regulations are in principle exceedingly important. During the price-fixing debate that was held earlier this year some hon. Members took the view that the deal that the Government had brought home from Brussels was so bad for British farmers that only the structures package, which was considered to be complementary to the prices package, might help to retrieve the situation. Alas, the Minister has said nothing tonight to comfort those farmers whose incomes were shattered last year, partly by the appalling harvesting conditions and partly by the systematic and deliberate downward pressure that has been exerted on farmers by this Administration.

The Minister's speech will probably read better than it sounded in the House. She took the trouble to explain the provisions of the draft regulations and in some cases gave the Government's view on the principles, but her speech will convey almost nothing to the farming community about what the Government intend British farmers to derive from the package. She said nothing about money, although that is what we wished to hear about. I hope that the Minister will say more about it.

If adequately financed, this series of proposals could achieve some of the objectives that the Commission, the Government and other parties in the House support. They would redirect agricultural production to commodities that are not in surplus, encourage the diversification of land use and help to ease out of agriculture those who wish to leave the industry. These are meritorious objectives. However, when they are set against the Commission's budgetary proposals it appears that very little is likely to be achieved.

The Commission has costed this package at 896 million ecu over a period of five years. To illustrate how little this is, I reckon that there are 45 million hectares of less favoured area land in the Community. All these funds will not be directed towards the less favoured areas, but if, for the sake of argument, that sum of money were to be concentrated on the less favoured areas alone, it would work out at about £13 per hectare over the five-year period. The farmers will not hang out their flags in jubilation if the Community's proposals are implemented. They will be even less enthusiastic about the proposals because there is no price tag from the Government.

The Commission's document that the Government have put before us shows that the package is almost valueless and contains no major commitment by Governments. What the Commission says bears repeating. It says:

"it will only be possible to put the measures into practice from 1987 at the earliest, . . . the new measures will be put into effect only gradually as and when administrative and budgetary measures are taken at national level."

We have heard almost nothing from the Government about what they intend to do in that respect. We cannot regard this as the end of the matter and we shall have to question the Government about the progress of their thinking.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): We will.

Mr. Maclennan: I am glad that the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) shares my views on these matters. We have a long history of agreeing about many things. I should like to raise a couple of important issues of principle with the Government. Do they intend to offer any new research or advisory back-up money to assist and facilitate some of the transformations that are taking place? Will they look again at the proposals to reduce ADAS funding and to cut experimental husbandry farm schemes and expenditure on the Scottish colleges of agriculture?

It is nonsense on the one hand to produce a package for far-reaching structural change and on the other to cut the advice about how to make it work effectively. The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) spoke about the most recent announcements of Government cuts in this field, but it is never too late to ask the Government to think again. If they are serious in wanting the kind of adaptations that the Minister spoke about, they ought to reconsider.

I notice that the proposals about hill livestock compensatory allowances call for more flexible headage payments. There is some merit in that proposal and it is one that the alliance put forward at an earlier stage. The Minister did not make it clear how the Government see these variations being made. There is a great deal to be said for local and regional determination of these varying rates, and we would like to see some movement in that direction. Regrettably, such movement is not apparent.

The weakness of the proposals is that there is no direct recognition of the potential importance of these schemes concerning the need to reduce surplus production. The proposals smack too much of tokenism. They are all worthy objectives, but the pre-pension scheme is probably set too low to offer any real inducement. As the Minister said, it is likely that, because the farm can be taken up by a close relative, people will not be taken out of agricultural production. In itself, it is a meritorious scheme and will help to provide a sensible career structure for farmers, but it does not have much to do with the central core of thinking about the agricultural problems of the Community.

Above all, this package does not recognise that the problem of massive overproduction, especially of cereals, will not be solved by taking a few marginal farmers out of cereal growing. The major problems are created by the extremely efficient, large farms whose owners have been encouraged over the years by an absurd open-ended system of price support hugely to intensify their production. None of the measures will touch these people. They will affect—or might beneficially affect—those at the margin who are under enormous pressure because of the policy being pursued on price support. It is not a sensible way to contribute to the reduction of production on a large scale.

The Minister looked to the House for suggestions as to what might be done and I have mentioned a few points in that respect. However, a Minister in opening a debate of this kind has a duty to tell the House and the industry what the Government have in mind and not simply to come along with an open mind and describe the regulations in a generalised way, and say nothing about the money that the Government propose to put into the proposals to make them work.

I believe that the regulations represent a token of good intentions put forward by the Commission under considerable financial pressure because the budget on the Community's agricultural fund is so heavily canted towards the price regime and therefore inadequately directed towards the structural side. Although this is a step forward in that context, no one in the farming industry will believe that it will mark the difference between bankruptcy and profitability within the foreseeable future.

The impact of the proposals on farmers in this country as opposed to their impact on farmers in other countries, appears to raise the possibility that there might be discrimination here arising from the proposal to place ceilings on the payments per farm in the less-favoured areas. I hope that the Minister and those who negotiate in Brussels will pay close attention to that possibility.

In conclusion, I must state that I do not agree with the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John), who said that the structural measures of the European Community should be repatriated. We pay a lot into the Community budget in support of farming and we ought to get a lot out of it. We do not get as much out of it as we might and that is largely due to the misdirection into open-ended price support. If we tried to match consumer needs to output and supported that amount of commodities which the Community needed, there would be a substantial amount of Community money available for suitable structural schemes. However, it would never be right that the full burden of that should be borne by Brussels. The proposed proportions in the package are probably about right. However, they are far too low and we look to the Government to say at least something tonight about the order of magnitude of the amount of money that they propose to make available under these schemes over the proposed five-year period.

Mrs. Fenner: Many matters have been raised and I hope that I shall be able to cover them all. The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) raised a number of general points and I take issue with him over his remarks about penalising the consumer. We are doing all that we can—this we have done over many years—to curb surpluses in the CAP. I do not take kindly from the hon. Gentleman his comments about the consumer being penalised when I recall that food prices rose by 25·6 per cent. a year when the previous Labour Government were in power. The House will know that food prices have risen by 3·1 per cent. this year. This Government know a good deal about protecting the consumer.

The hon. Member asked about young farmers and wanted to know how the Government defined "less intensive production". As I explained in my earlier remarks, we see difficulties in administering and enforcing the proposed measures. We shall be probing the proposals in our discussions in Brussels on the package. The hon. Gentleman talked about the damaging effects of overstocking, about which the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds is concerned. We are aware of concerns about overstocking, but it is not a general problem in the United Kingdom. There are isolated examples, but United Kingdom rules provide safeguards against overstocking. We are always willing to consider new ideas on improving the rules. We shall consider extremely carefully the scope offered by the new package.

The hon. Member suggested that we should pay by area rather than by headage rates. EC rules do not allow for hectarage payments on livestock and the package does not amend that. The hon. Gentleman commented on our set-aside scheme. We are considering ideas for a voluntary set-aside scheme for cereals, which could apply Communitywide. The scheme concentrates on cereals because that is where the greatest problem lies. The Commission estimates that by 1991 grain stocks in the Community could reach 80 million tonnes if nothing is done. They now stand at 15 million tonnes.

The hon. Member asked specifically about the pre-pension scheme and landlord's consent. There is no specific requirement for a tenant to obtain his landlord's consent. The pre-pension scheme is voluntary, and if a tenant chooses to take advantage of it he must comply with the terms of his tenancy agreement. Normally that contains provisions on good husbandry, which could well preclude the abandonment of agriculture without the landlord's consent. We are well aware of the implications of the pre-pension scheme for relations between landlords and tenants. We shall want to ensure that the Commission's proposals are fair to both parties.

The hon. Member commented on the non-implementation of article 20 of the existing structures regulation on forestry. As I said earlier, the article was not implemented because our forestry grant and broadleaf woodland grant schemes are more attractive. The implementation of the article in the United Kingdom can be reconsidered in the light of the proposed amendments that are contained in the package, which are designed to make the article more attractive. That is something that can be reconsidered.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) asked, among other things, about the pre-pension scheme. We have already expressed our reservations about the pre-pension scheme proposals as we are not convinced that they will be cost-effective in reducing the surplus production. The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) said a number of times that the Government should say exactly what we shall do, but this is an opportunity for the House to debate the issues. When we go to Brussels we shall be able to discuss the scheme and draw attention to the matters about which individual Members are concerned. As I have said, there are matters about which we, the Government, are concerned. In some instances we feel that the proposals are ambiguous or are not likely to work and will not, therefore, be cost-effective.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland said that the package will be ineffective in reducing surplus production. We tend to agree with him. That is why we are considering ideas for cereal set-aside, which we believe are designed to tackle the roots of the over-production problem.

The hon. Member for East Lothian mentioned environmentally sensitive areas. We are not very satisfied with the proposals that have been put forward, as they lack the flexibility that we would wish. For instance, they have specific conditions attached to them which we would not have found helpful in the work that we have done in connection with the Norfolk Broads. We want to see a slightly more flexible arrangement for ESAs.

Mr. Home Robertson: We are not terribly satisfied with the level of funding or the scope of the environmentally sensitive areas scheme. I should be grateful to the Minister if she would say whether the additional £1·5 million that will become available for ESAs in Britain as a result of the additional grant will be treated as extra money which could extend the scope of the scheme in the first year, or whether the money will simply be swallowed up.

Mrs. Fenner: The present schemes that are already listed for this year and which form part of the proposals in the Agriculture Bill will continue. The others will be additional. The ESAs that are being introduced are funded nationally under an article already provided.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the amount of £1·5 million that is to be provided in the first year additional to the £6 million that is already budgeted?

Mrs. Fenner: Until the EC legislation is amended, the existing text of the article permitting ESAs is the law. It is under that article that the present ESAs are conducted.

This is a complicated package. We have deep reservations about many parts of it. There are many parts to which we give a cautious welcome. I hope that hon. Members will feel that they have had an opportunity tonight to discuss the matter before it is settled in Brussels.

Mr. Harris: Can my hon. Friend say that the points I raised about the isles of Scilly will be considered by her Department?

Mrs. Fenner: Yes, indeed. The point that farmers other than livestock farmers could be in receipt of hill livestock compensatory allowance is raised by the new proposals. It is a matter that we shall consider.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 6466/86, draft Regulation amending Regulations 797/85, 270/79, 1360/78 and 355/77 on agricultural structures in order to adjust agriculture to the new market situation and maintain rural areas and draft Decision amending Decision 83/641 on joint research programmes and programmes for co-ordinating agricultural research, and 7126/86, draft Regulation amending Regulations 797/85, 355/77 and 1360/78 on agricultural structures to take account of the accession of Spain; and supports the Government's view that these measures should have as a primary aim the closer alignment of agricultural production to the requirements of the market and that the measures must be both cost-effective and containable within existing expenditure ceilings.

Immigration Appeals

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

11.22 pm

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): Tonight I raise a matter that concerns justice, fairness and equality of treatment under the law. The subject affects an often already disadvantaged minority — those who have applied to come to our country to live and who want to be a part of our community. At a time when the world is concerned about the inhumanity and injustice of apartheid in South Africa, and when our Prime Minister has appealed for a measure of equality in that troubled country—even though she refuses to back up her words with deeds—I draw attention to a glaring anomaly in our own system. It is an anomaly that the Government have the power to correct. I hope that the Minister of State, Home Office—the hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington)—will tell us that he will give sympathetic consideration to it.

To illustrate the nature of the problem, I shall tell the House a story about a little boy — a nine-year-old youngster alone in Bangladesh. It is also a story about injustice and the increasing inaccessibility of a fair hearing to an ever-growing number of ordinary men and women. If my experience is any indication of the problem, there can be very few hon. Members who have not had, at some point, a request from a constituent for help in an immigration case. I have already dealt with quite a number of cases in what is a relatively short time representing the people of Tyne Bridge.

The small boy in this case, Bablus Muskad, is the son of Abdul Muskad, a British resident since 1957, and Mala Bibi Muskad, Abdul's first wife. Bablus, like Abdul's other children, was born in Bangladesh, where his father went for long periods, whilst retaining his British citizenship. Mr. Muskad applied in 1979 for his second wife, Gulnahar Bibi Muskad, and her two children, to join him in England. Bablus was not included in that application, because his mother was still alive. Sadly, by the time the application came through, Mala Bibi had died. Naturally, Gulnahar looked after little Bablus who was only three and a half at the time, with her other children after Mala Bibi's death.

The family arrived in England in 1983 and immediately applied for Bablus to join them. His first interview with the authorities was, of course, in Bangladesh. He was asked many questions about his relationship with Gulnahar and her two sons, Bablus's stepbrothers. The eight-year-old, like eight-year-olds the world over, was confused and imprecise about these relationships. He called Gulnahar his mother and said that his stepbrother was his brother. They were understandable mistakes, given that Gulnahar had looked after Bablus since he could speak.

Many people might find it incredible that those mistakes by an eight-year-old were enough to make the interviewing authorities reject his application to join his father and the stepmother who had cared for him for so long. Bablus was left with a loose network of aunts and uncles, some of whom he did not know, to look after him.

Of course, Mr. Muskad lost no time in appealing against the decision. He was lucky enough to be advised by the family services unit in Newcastle, but it soon found that to take the appeal to tribunal meant that he, together with any other members of his family who were going to give evidence, would have have to travel to Leeds, where the newly centralised immigration appeals office for the whole of the north of England is based.

The catch about this system of appeal is that each appellant has to pay his own costs. There is no provision in this tribunal, as there is in industrial tribunals and employment tribunals, for appellants to reclaim travel costs or other expenses. In this case, Mr. Muskad first had to go down to Leeds, with one of his sons to act as interpreter, to see the United Kingdom immigration advisory service. He had to go back a second time with Gulnahar and another son for a further visit. Then, since of course the onus is on the appellant to produce as much corroborative evidence as possible, all four members of the family went to Leeds to give evidence to the tribunal.

This particular story has a happy ending—for those hon. Members whose hearts have not been hardened by over exposure to Thatcherism. The Muskad family won their case and Bablus has now been united with his father and stepmother. But that decision took nine return journeys to Leeds at considerable cost to the family and, of course, there are other costs to take into account, such as the travel cost of the family services worker, who helped and advised the Muskad family through the maze of legality.

Even so, Mr. Muskad got off lightly. The adjudicator could have decided, as often happens, that further inquiries should be made in Bangladesh. The hearing would then have been adjourned until a future date when the family would have had to go down to Leeds yet again. If the appeal had been unsuccessful, Mr. Muskad would probably have had to go down to London, again with his family—for the burden of proof rests squarely upon the appellant—but at an even greater cost.

Bablus Muskad's case highlights a glaring failure in the legal appeal system to meet the needs of those men and women who rely on it.

The legal system has recognised that there is a need for appellants to be able to claim some expenses. In social security appeal tribunals, medical appeal tribunals and industrial tribunals the appellant can not only claim travel expenses but loss of earnings—for himself and for the witnesses he calls to support him. Legal aid has recently been extended to include patients appearing before mental health review tribunals. Ironically, had Mr. Muskad been a convicted criminal, appearing before a prison board, he would probably have been able to claim legal aid.

In most other tribunals there is provision for the legitimate expenses of claimants and witnesses whose evidence is material to the case to be met from public funds, although not those of their legal representatives. But there is no provision for this in these immigration appeal cases. It goes without saying that the attendance of witnesses in most immigration appeals is crucial, given that the onus of proof is always on the appellant and that the appellant's case will be that much stronger if corroborated by the evidence of other witnesses.

It is easy to see how the expenses involved in travelling, subsistence and loss of earnings can run into hundreds of pounds. What sort of legal system is it that first weaves a web of complexity around itself and then adds an extra layer of financial cost? A Newcastle solicitor recently wrote to me saying:

"there is no doubt that extreme hardship is caused to many claimants, and it is not unfair to conclude that there are certainly a number of cases in our experience where, because of the distance involved in getting to Leeds and the time that that involves — and the expense that our costs and the travel costs involve — some people decide that it is not worth going through with the system. If that is the case, then of course it is a strong indictment of the system, because there is no point at all in having a system of judicial review of cases of this nature which is not effectively and realistically accessible to the parties who are expected to use it."

By definition, these are not simple, straightforward cases. They are highly complex and are of the utmost importance to the individuals concerned, as they deal with their liberty to remain here or ability to bring their families to this country.

There is a strong argument in favour of extending legal aid to this increasingly complex area. The absence of aid has far-reaching consequences, for instance for the appellants' representatives who must also travel to Leeds or London with a properly prepared brief.

In April of this year I had some correspondence with the Lord Chancellor about the current study and review of the legal aid scheme. The noble and learned Lord stressed the Government's commitment to an effective legal aid scheme. That being so, it is time they drew immigration appeals into the network of assistance.

The transfer of the immigration appeals office to central offices in Leeds was, I gather, one of the earliest steps towards the centralisation of Government Departments to cut costs. As is often the case, any saving for the Government purse has resulted in ordinary people having to dig deeper into their pockets. While the Home Office is not famed for handing out money, there is a real need for appellants before immigration appeal tribunals to have at least some access to public funds for the repayment of travel expenses.

In April last I asked the Home Secretary

"if he will make funds available for the purpose of providing travel expenses for persons involved in immigrant appeal hearings."

The Minister of State, not a man to mince words or to use two words where one will do, replied:

"No". — [Official Report, 17 April 1986; Vol. 95, c. 466-7.]

Though that may have been a factual answer, I had hoped for a more considered and comprehensive one. Hence tonight's debate, which gives the hon. and learned Gentleman the opportunity to give a considered and comprehensive answer.

In the light of what I have said and in the interests of fairness and natural justice, I hope that the Minister's answer tonight will be to the effect that the Government intend to extend the payment of expenses to immigration appeal tribunals.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) has raised an important point, though he rather spoilt his argument by raising some blatantly party political issues, including at one point making a sneering reference to what he called Thatcherism.

The system to which he is drawing attention has been in existence since the immigration appeals system was created, and therefore any criticisms he has of it would have been just as appropriate in the days of the last Labour Government. So it is nonsensical and rather childish of him to try to turn this into a party political issue. It is, nevertheless, an important issue, and he questions whether legal aid should be available in immigration appeals.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Wilson committee, which recommended the setting up of an appeals system, was of the opinion that if the legal aid scheme was extended to tribunals in general, immigration appeals could no doubt be brought within the scope of that extension, but there were no good grounds for giving priority in respect of immigration appeals. I am bound to say that we see no reason to dissent from that view. I shall explain why.

There is no provision in the Immigration Act 1971 for the payment of expenses to people attending hearings before the appellate authorities, but section 23 of the Act provides for a grant to be made to a voluntary organisation that provides advice or assistance to persons having a right of appeal under the Act. Such a grant is made to the United Kingdom immigrants advisory service, which provides a free service advising appellants about their appeals and representing them at appeal hearings. The grant this year is £870,000. We are grateful to UKIAS for undertaking that work.

Most appeals are heard initially before independent adjudicators. Adjudicators sit not only in London but in Manchester, Birmingham and Leeds, to make it easier for appellants and sponsors who live in the north and the midlands to attend hearings. They also sit in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Belfast, Bristol, Cardiff and Southampton. It should therefore be possible for people to attend a hearing centre within reasonable distance of their home. Furthermore, the procedural rules allow for an appeal to be transferred from one adjudicator to another, and that provision can be and has been used to make it easier for an appellant or a witness to attend an appeal hearing. The Immigration Appeal Tribunal, which in the main hears appeals from an adjudicator's decision sits only in London, but the tribunal normally relies on documentary evidence and oral submissions from the appellant's and respondent's representatives, so it is not usually necessary for an appellant or his sponsor to attend the hearing in person.

Rule 27 of the procedure rules provides for the appellate authorities to issue a witness summons, but subject to the caveat that no person shall be required to travel—that is, made to travel against his will—more than 10 miles from his place of residence unless the necessary expenses of his attendance are paid. If the decision to summons a witness is solely that of the appellate authority because, for instance, it is felt that a particular person's evidence is essential to fair determination of the appeal, the expenses are paid by the appellate authority. If the summons is issued at the request of either party to the appeal, responsibility for payment then falls on that party. If either party feels it necessary to support its case by calling witnesses but without the formality of seeking a witness summons, the payment of expenses is a matter between the party and the witness.

If an appellant or a witness were to suffer considerable financial loss because of a serious mistake by the Home Office or the appellate authority in connection with the appeal proceedings, consideration would be given to the provision of an ex gratia payment. But the mistake would have to be a serious one, that is, more than just an inadvertent error. Loss caused by the adjournment of a hearing would not qualify unless the adjournment itself was caused by serious error. That is in line with the practice of the courts where costs of adjournments are included in the overall costs of the parties to the action. Within the immigration appeals system, each party bears its own costs but, as I said at the beginning, a free advisory service and free representation is provided to minimise the costs faced by a person appearing before the appellate authorities. That was not thought unfair by the previous Administration. We do not think it unfair now.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned a particular case. I cannot comment on it because I did not have notice of the fact that he would mention it and I have no notes about the case before me, but it was an illustration of the fact that there is an appellate authority which can review the decisions of entry clearance officers. In that case, an adjudicator reviewed the decision of an entry clearance officer and allowed entry to the person concerned. Therefore, that was an illustration of the system working, not an illustration of it not working. I do not think that I can comment further on the case.

Once again, I am greatful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me at least to make clear how the system works and how it has worked, under the previous Labour Government and this Government since it was devised.

Question put and agreed to.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

South Africa

1. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ask the European Economic Community Council to instruct the European Economic Community Trade Ministers to consider effective trade measures against South Africa.

2. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the European Economic Community Council will next discuss the situation in South Africa and action by European Economic Community member states.

6. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to how many European Economic Community member states support Her Majesty's Government in their opposition to economic measures against South Africa.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): The Twelve are united in a common policy towards South Africa designed to hasten the process of peaceful reform and to encourage the South African Government to begin a dialogue with genuine representatives of the black population. The European Council recently entrusted my right hon. and learned Friend with a mission to southern Africa, the aim of which is to try to help establish the conditions in which the necessary negotiations can commence. He is currently visiting Zambia, Zimbabwe and Mozambique in pursuit of this objective, and plans to travel to South Africa towards the end of the month.

Mr. Hoyle: Does the Minister agree that it would be sensible and sane for her right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to call off this useless charade, especially now that it has been condemned as a fudge by President Kaunda? The ANC will not meet him, the Church leaders do not want to see him, and even his friend, President Botha, is keeping him waiting. Would it not be more sensible for him to stop making a spectacle of himself, call off this farce and return home and try to persuade the Prime Minister to listen to the views of the black population, who want meaningful economic sanctions.

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman is very wrong. The Heads of Government of the Twelve agreed on an urgent need for genuine dialogue on the future of South Africa. They wish a further effort to be made to seek to establish conditions in which dialogue can commence. This is not a lost cause. We are trying again the road to persuasion. As the Prime Minister said in The Guardian this morning:

"We can still help to get negotiations started."

When a meeting is sought with the ANC or with any other group, I hope that there will be a positive response. It is quite certain that in meeting my right hon. and learned Friend President Kaunda also believes that there is a future in dialogue through negotiation.

Mr. Hardy: In order to obtain a realistic record, will the Minister of State tell the House which Governments of the member states of the EEC are willing to apply sanctions and which are opposed to sanctions?

Mrs. Chalker: There is not a complete list. A number of countries believe that pressure should be applied, but many countries and many people who have called for sanctions believe that effective measures may not necessarily be general economic sanctions, to which Britain is opposed. It is through the consultations that my right hon. and learned Friend and others are undertaking that, if necessary, we will find what effective measures may have to be considered by the European Council and at the Commonwealth review meeting.

Mr. Wareing: Is it not a fact that the EEC countries have allowed themselves to be bullied and manoeuvred by the Prime Minister? Because of the need to have a unified policy, they have had to give way to the attacks being made by the Prime Minister upon the idea of economic sanctions. Can the Minister of State name just one country in the EEC that is doing less than Britain to bring pressure to bear upon South Africa?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman is sadly wrong. Other countries in the EEC are taking a variety of measures, and we are certainly taking as many as any of them.

Sir Peter Blaker: In view of the petty party point-scoring by Opposition Members, would it not be as well for the House to remember that it was a Conservative Government who secured a solution to the problem of Rhodesia after years of abject failure by a Labour Government?

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend is absolutely correct. I seem to remember a previous Prime Minister thinking that he could effect a quick answer in about 1965, but it took another 14 years. It was a Conservative Government who brought to an end the tragedies in Zimbabwe. I hope that all the efforts, not only of this Government, but of my right hon. and learned Friend on behalf of the European Community, will lead to a framework for dialogue within which we can bring an end to the awful violence which is taking place on all sides in South Africa.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is no option now, whatever our individual views may be, but to support my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary in his enterprise and efforts in southern Africa? Will she emphasise that he goes there on behalf of all EEC countries with strong United States links and that, therefore, he represents overwhelmingly the majority of South Africa's major trading partners? Will my hon.

Friend also emphasise to South Africa that, if it does not have the sense to listen to my right hon. and learned Friend, it may not get another chance?

Mrs. Chalker: I endorse wholeheartedly what my hon. Friend has said about the significance of this mission. It offers an important opportunity to break the cycle of violence in South Africa and to promote the very necessary dialogue and negotiation that we all want to see. My right hon. and learned Friend's mission deserves the support of the entire international community. Those Opposition Members or others who seek to talk it down for narrow partisan reasons should ask themselves seriously whether they are doing the cause any good at all. I remind the House that five of South Africa's major trading partners are united behind my right hon. and learned Friend's mission to find a peaceful solution to the terrible problems of apartheid.

Mr. Adley: Does my hon. Friend accept that Conservative Members, who have a genuine concern for the rights of black people in South Africa believe that dialogue is better than monologue and find faintly nauseating the antics of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) in constantly trying to make partisan points which do no good whatsoever for the aspirations of black people in South Africa? Will my hon. Friend bear in mind that we support what my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary is doing, but, if he is unsuccessful, we expect the Government to align themselves with our friends in the Community and in the Commonwealth and take whatever action is considered to be appropriate?

Mrs. Chalker: The dialogue upon which my right hon. and learned Friend has embarked is the last chance perhaps to get a successful dialogue going. It is wrong to assume that this mission will fail. I have seen all sorts of headlines and comments by right hon. and hon. Members. What is going on is a gradual, steady effort to make sure that everybody who can be involved is involved in the dialogue, which must surely come. I sincerely hope that all right hon. and hon. Members and the media will see that what is really going on is a positive effort to start the dialogue for negotiations between all peoples in South Africa.

Mr. Beith: Does the hon. Lady understand, from what the Prime Minister said on the radio this morning, that there are no economic measures that the Government would contemplate using if the Foreign Secretary's visit does not achieve the results that were set out for it? If that is so, how will that help the Foreign Secretary in his task?

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said nothing different this morning from what she has said before. This morning on the radio programme "Today" she said:

"I am and remain against punitive economic sanctions—general economic sanctions."

However—and the hon. Gentleman did not refer to this—my right hon. Friend then said that she understood that the Commonwealth was very concerned that we

"show what they call signals or gestures of disapproval of South African policy of apartheid . . . and we agree with those and operate them, as a gesture, a signal to South Africa that the world thoroughly disapproves of the system of apartheid and wants it to end."

I can find no fault whatever with that policy, which is the policy of the whole Government.

Mr. John Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend accept that the economic sanctions that have been taken by this Government and others against South Africa have already resulted in starvation, lengthening dole queues and a lot of misery to black South Africans? Will she take this opportunity to clear her own position: that she shares the view of her right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that economic sanctions are not the answer? Will she get a message through to her right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary that he must not ask of the South African Government anything that they cannot possibly deliver in these circumstances?

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Gentleman gets paid for saying that. [Interruption.]

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is so much noise that I do not know what was said. What word should be withdrawn?

Mr. Wilkinson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) alleged that my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) was paid to put his question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If that is so, the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) must withdraw the allegation.

Mr. Winnick: I do not wish to take time out of Question Time. May I deal with the matter at the end of Question Time?

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us set off in a good way. Will the hon. Gentleman please withdraw that remark? He is an hon. Member, like everybody else.

Mr. Winnick: I have the greatest respect for you, Mr. Speaker. I am convinced in my mind that what I said was absolutely correct.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Whatever the hon. Gentleman may be convinced about in his own mind, in this Chamber he must withdraw that comment.

Mr. Winnick: I shall do so only because of your ruling, and for no other reason, because I have not changed my mind one tiny bit. However, if you tell me to do so, in your capacity as Speaker, although what I believe is true, I have no alternative but to withdraw. Only in those circumstances do I withdraw.

Mr. John Carlisle: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not taking any more points of order. The hon. Gentleman has had his say.

Mrs. Chalker: The matter of South Africa is terribly serious, and it behoves the House not to catcall in one way or another. We want to see a speedy end to the awful regime of apartheid. My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) says that general economic sanctions will have, and have had, damaging consequences before. I must point out that it is the potentially very serious effects on South Africa's neighbours, as well as on black people in South Africa, if general economic sanctions were to be applied, that makes us consult so widely and seriously about the best way to bring about an effective change in South Africa. That is what my right hon and learned Friend will do throughout his mission and thereafter.

Mr. Healey: Does the Minister believe that the Foreign Secretary's chances of success in his mission have been improved by the fusillade of interviews given by the Prime Minister since he left London? In the course of those interviews the Prime Minister said that she was sorry that South Africa was not in the Commonwealth, she severely criticised the Governments of Zambia and Zimbabwe, she said that she was against economic sanctions in general, that she would support signs and gestures but did not believe that they would have any effect, and, finally, she said that she hoped the Commonwealth summit would take no action on South Africa. Has the Prime Minister not cut the ground from under the Foreign Secretary's feet and made his mission impossible?

Mrs. Chalker: If anyone has made my right hon. and learned Friend's position impossible, and sought to persuade persons, as I understand it, not even to meet him, it is the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey).

Mr. Healey: That is absolutely untrue.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister understands very well the anger, despair and hopelessness of many people in South Africa and southern Africa. She fully supports the mission undertaken on behalf of the European Community by my right hon. and learned Friend, and she is seeking in every way possible to make sure that we view the possibilities ahead in a realistic way that will help to bring about that necessary pressure on the South African Government.

Mr. Healey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask you to give the Minister a chance to withdraw the disgraceful statement that I sought to persuade African leaders not to see the Foreign Secretary. I ask her to consult the high commissioner in Lusaka, with whom I stayed, who will tell her that I spent the whole visit trying to persuade President Kaunda to see the Foreign Secretary and to withdraw his threat to leave the Commonwealth.

Mrs. Chalker: I would like the right hon. Gentleman, with whom I have frequently had good and thoughtful discussions on this subject, to assert in the House this afternoon that he fully supports my right hon. and learned Friend's intention and wish to meet the ANC and all other groups with which we seek to promote dialogue in an effort to bring an end to apartheid. I said to the right hon. Gentleman that I had understood that that had happened. If that is not the case—the right hon. Gentleman knows me well enough; he knows I will withdraw—I ask him to assert here this afternoon that he is fully in favour of my right hon. and learned Friend meeting all the political groups and all the people whom he seeks to meet in an effort to bring about the dialogue that we all urgently want.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will call the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) on the next question.

3. Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent actions have been taken by Her Majesty's Government against the present Government of South Africa.

7. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policies towards South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: The Government have implemented a wide range of measures against South Africa, including the United Nations arms embargo, the Gleneagles agreement and those agreed with our Commonwealth partners at Nassau and our European partners in Luxembourg in 1985. We have also made representations to the South African Government on a number of issues, most recently the restrictions imposed under the state of emergency and the detention without charge of a large number of people. Our objectives remain an end to apartheid, a solution to the South African problem by negotiation and a suspension of violence on all sides. We shall continue with all our partners to do everything we can to help achieve those goals.

Mr. MacKenzie: Does the Minister accept that many hon. Members who dislike any form of extremism clearly believe that what has been done has not been enough? If we are to show our intense dislike of the fundamental philosophies of the South African Government, clearly much stronger measures will have to be taken than those that the Minister has just announced. That view is shared by many people, not least by the Church of Scotland, which has considerable experience of African questions.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand what the right hon. Gentleman is saying. Obviously the measures that we, together with other countries, have sought to take have not been enough, because they have not yet brought an end to apartheid. However, we should remember that considerable steps have begun to be taken in South Africa. They are not sufficient and, indeed, they must be followed by further steps to end apartheid as speedily as possible. However, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, as a result of the European Council meeting the Community will look at other measures that might be needed.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that nothing but bloodshed will be achieved unless the South African Government and all sections of the community there can be induced to speak, and that no amount of pressure on one section of the community or another which drives sections of the community into a bunker will help anybody? What measures does my hon. Friend envisage will achieve proper talks for the whole community?

Mrs. Chalker: It would be presumptious of me to say what further measures might bring about the much sought after peace that we all wish to see. It is right, during this period leading up to the Commonwealth review and further European meetings, that we should continue to discuss with our partners the real effects of each measure which has been discussed, because it is only when we measure how many people might be put out of work in southern Africa and how many might be brought to much greater hardship than they already suffer in South Africa and in the front-line states that we can judge the best way ahead.

Mr. Barnett: One of the arguments which the Prime Minister repeatedly uses against economic sanctions against South Africa is the damage that she believes they will do to the economies of front-line states and to the African people in South Africa. What rights does the Prime Minister believe she has to speak on behalf of African people in the front-line states or South Africa?

Mrs. Chalker: It is not just my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister who believes that general economic sanctions would not bring about an end to apartheid. On 2 July, in The Times, Mrs. Helen Suzman said:

"What they would do, in fact, is to lay off workers as the economy wound down—a sombre prospect in a country with no social security safety net, no dole and no food stamps."

She went on to say:

"Effective sanctions would wreck the economy and destroy the inheritance that blacks will undoubtedly share in the not-too-distant future."

I remind the House that Mrs. Helen Suzman has been a South African Opposition Member of Parliament since 1961, and I believe that she is as right as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend agree that many of those of us who wish to see genuine fundamental change in South Africa and who supported my hon. Friend in her decision to see Mr. Oliver Tambo regret bitterly the attitude of the ANC and Bishop Tutu in not being willing to see my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary? Does she also agree that it would help if the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) would use his considerable influence to encourage such meetings rather than to undermine my right hon. and learned Friend?

Mr. Healey rose——

Mrs. Chalker: I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that it is my turn.

We understand exactly what my right hon. and learned Friend said. I previously invited, and do so again, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) to assert in the House that he is very much in favour of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary meeting all those whom he seeks to meet. When one sets out on a complicated mission such as this, I sincerely hope that hon. Members realise that it takes time to set up meetings between many others. When a meeting is sought, be it with the ANC or any other group, it is hoped that there will be a positive response, which I am sure the right hon. Member for Leeds, East will encourage.

Mr. Healey: I thank the Minister for withdrawing her earlier imputation. [HON. MEMBERS: "No, she did not."] Yes, she did. The Minister will be aware that I met Mr. Oliver Tambo before I left for South Africa and strongly encouraged him to meet the hon. Lady. He was minded not to do so, as I am sure she knows—[Interruption.] Yes, that is the case. When I was in Lusaka I suggested that the Foreign Secretary's visit would give the ANC an opportunity of pursuing discussions and, in fact, I invited the Foreign Secretary in this House on Monday of this week to seek to meet the ANC on his visit. But the hon. Lady must accept that the depth of feeling against the British Prime Minister among the Governments of the front-line states and among many Commonwealth and European countries, as illustrated by the withdrawal of Nigeria from the Commonwealth Games today, is something about which the Prime Minister should be a great deal more sensitive than she showed herself to be in the bizarre series of inteviews to which I referred.

Mrs. Chalker: I note that the right hon. Gentleman has not asserted what I asked him to assert.

Mr. Healey: I have.

Mrs. Chalker: There needs to be not just an emotional response to the many emotional comments being made on this issue, but a realistic assessment of what the possibilities and effective measures might be. It is positive measures as well as restrictive measures that are most likely to be effective in promoting change in South Africa. If every hon. Member will consider the consequences of each and every point that is being discussed, we might come up with a far better solution than the ones that are being shouted and barracked about by Opposition Members.

Portugal

5. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the United Kingdom's relations with Portugal.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): Anglo-Portuguese relations are excellent. This year we are celebrating the 600th anniversary of the treaty of Windsor. This historical alliance is complemented by our joint membership of NATO and the European Community. Bilateral trade and tourism continue to flourish.

Mr. Brown: As there have been repeated calls for the release of Nelson Mandela, will the Government continue with their principled position by approaching the Portuguese Government and suggesting that it would be appropriate now to release Otelo Carualho, the leader of the 1974 revolution against Fascism? Is that not appropriate?

Mr. Eggar: It would not be appropriate for us to interfere in what is an internal judicial matter affecting Portugal.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will my hon. Friend and the rest of the Foreign Office team use their best influences to grant a favourable response to the application for membership of the Western European Union which was lodged by the Portuguese Government some time ago and has since then languished upon the table?

Mr. Eggar: I shall certainly bear my hon. Friend's point in mind. I know that there are other right hon. and hon. Members who feel similarly.

South Africa

8. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will now make a statement on the Government's response to the report of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group.

Mrs. Chalker: We are considering very carefully what response we should make to the report by the Eminent Persons Group and look forward to a full discussion of the way ahead with Commonwealth leaders at the review meeting in August. We believe that the group's objective of promoting dialogue in the context of a suspension of violence remains valid.

Mr. Sedgemore: Bearing in mind that black people in South Africa and in the front-line states, the Eminent Persons Group and decent people in Western democracies want sanctions because they believe that liberty, freedom and democracy are more important than short-term material comforts, who does the Minister support—the civilised people of the world, or her shrivelled Prime Minister with her Judas mentality?

Mrs. Chalker: I did not think that the hon. Gentleman would sink so low. I have to remind him and many other hon. Members that the measures already in place are being lost sight of. We have been taking measures, positive as well as negative, for years. Prior to the agreement last year with our European partners, Britain had a policy of not trading with South Africa in arms or paramilitary equipment, not co-operating with them in military and nuclear spheres, not selling oils to South Africa, not selling computer equipment to the South African police or armed forces and discouraging sporting contacts. We made further agreements with our European partners at Luxembourg last year and, following the Commonwealth Heads of Government summit at Nassau last October, we ended Government-to-Government loans, ceased funding trading missions and agreed to ban the import of gold coins. Those measures are already in place. What we are discussing with our European partners, the Heads of the economic Seven and the Heads of the Commonwealth is what could be effective in making South Africa bring about a real end to apartheid. We shall go on doing that. It is exactly what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is working for, as well as the rest of the Government and Conservative Members.

Mr. Gow: To what extent, if at all, is British foreign affairs policy still based upon the principle that we should not interfere in the internal affairs of other states and on the basis that we should not enter into discussion with terrorist organisations or organisations that have not repudiated terrorism?

Mrs. Chalker: I fully understand my hon. Friend's anxieties. I have to say that in South Africa, which is no longer a member of the Commonwealth, there are many British passport holders and many British people. There are also long links with South Africa. I do not think that in the efforts we are making we are in any way telling South Africa how the non-racial democracy that the whole world has been calling for should be brought about. That is for South Africa to agree with all its people.

On the subject of meeting groups that have been involved in terrorism of one sort or another, I have to say that my right hon. Friend, now the Home Secretary, met the Palestine Liberation Organisation in 1982-83 in an effort to bring about understanding. I believe that we must meet groups to understand the situation if we are ever to resolve the differences that have led to the lack of dialogue and the totally unacceptable situation in South Africa.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Minister accept that the Prime Minister's interview on Canadian television last night did the greatest disservice to the report of the Eminent Persons Group? Does she accept that that was quite unconvincing — [Interruption.] There are those who might seek to thwart free speech in South Africa, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure that you will not allow that to happen in the House. The Prime Minister said that she could not carry other countries with her on sanctions. Is that not unacceptable, given that she has introduced a veto in the Security Council?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman surely knows that the reason why we have not been able to accept chapter 7 mandatory economic sanctions is the very fact that we believe that they would have a very deleterious effect and would not bring about the result which I believe the hon. Gentleman genuinely seeks in South Africa, which is an end to apartheid, the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and other detainees, the removal of the ban on the African National Congress and other political parties and a start to dialogue and negotiation. If one considers that, and considers in full what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said rather than taking up partial comments, which is all that I have heard in the House today, one realises that one has to work as hard as one can for dialogue and an end to violence. That is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my hon. Friend accept that, like the more responsible members of the Eminent Persons Group, that great British leader, Sir Winston Churchill, believed fervently in "jaw jaw" rather than "war war", whether it be about military or trade sanctions? Only the Soviet Union could benefit from trade sanctions. Will my hon. Friend give the House an assurance that while our right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary is in southern Africa, he will see Bishop Makoena of Soweto, who represents 4·5 million black Christians and Chief Gatsha Buthelezi, who represents 6 million black Africans? Both those distinguished leaders of black South Africans believe that sanctions will be damaging and do not wish the British Government to support sanctions against their country.

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend and I, as well as my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, are united in believing that general economic sanctions would not be in the best interests of the black people in southern Africa. I know that my right hon. and learned Friend will do his best to meet as many people like the gentlemen whom my hon. Friend suggested, and many others. It will be a question of time, and of what can be fitted in, but we are willing to listen to representations from all such people.

9. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received from Her Majesty's ambassador in South Africa on the situation in the townships since the imposition of the state of emergency.

Mrs. Chalker: Her Majesty's embassy continues to keep us fully informed on all aspects of the situation in South Africa, including reports on visits by the ambassador and his staff to the townships.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Given the intolerable censorship imposed by the South African regime, how far do our diplomats have to conform to that censorship? Is it not important that the Government should be able to assist in the dissemination of genuine information from within South Africa, and how far would the hon. Lady assist that process?

Mrs. Chalker: As far as I am aware, Her Majesty's ambassador and his staff have not been stopped from going about their lawful business of travelling within normal restrictions in southern Africa. They have certainly reported on what they have found, on a confidential basis. Whether all that information could be verified at present it is impossible to know, because of the state of emergency.

It is, therefore, absolutely essential that that state of emergency is brought to a speedy end at the earliest possible time so that free reporting may start again in South Africa.

Mr. Jim Spicer: My hon. Friend will know of the magnificent work that is being done by the Urban Foundation in the townships. Is there any reason why Her Majesty's Government should not make a direct grant to the Urban Foundation for the work that it is doing in improving the lot and conditions of the people who live in the black townships?

Mrs. Chalker: I have been informed that the Urban Foundation was getting a great deal of finance from business in South Africa, which is absolutely right. We ourselves have added a further £15 million of new assistance over five years for southern Africa, which was mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in the House on 1 July. That is in addition to some £22 million already committed, much of it going to South Africa and the neighbouring states for the very reasons that my hon. Friend would wish. I do not know whether it is feasible to fund the Urban Foundation in the way that my hon. Friend says, but I know that all the resources that are being used for helping black people in southern Africa are there to help their education and training, and the re-establishment of homes and schools. I believe that all offers will be welcome wherever they may come from—Government or the private sector.

Helsinki Final Act

10. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he intends to attend the next conference concerning the Helsinki accords and conference in Vienna in November.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office. (Mr. Tim Renton): Participants in the conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe have not yet decided at what level to hold the opening session of the Vienna meeting. If it is at Foreign Minister level, my right hon. and learned Friend plans to attend.

Mr. Janner: Do the Government not find it odd that a conference on human rights is to be held in a country which has just elected Kurt Waldheim as President? When do the Government expect to conclude their investigations into the interrogation — and subsequent deaths — of British prisoners of war by German army group E — Waldheim's group? Will that be before the conference? Is there any hope of the Government achieving anything other than a cover-up if they will not even ask for access to the relevant documents from the files of the United Nations and the Federal Republic of Germany?

Mr. Renton: As the hon. and learned Gentleman will know, the Madrid CSCE meeting, which concluded in 1983, provided for the next follow-up meeting to be held in Vienna from 4 November 1986. That is what will happen. As for the hon. and learned Gentleman's question about Dr. Waldheim, I mentioned to him when replying to the foreign affairs debate some weeks ago that the Ministry of Defence was still searching into its records with regard to the evidence and the details that the hon. and learned Gentleman sent to the Ministry. I understand that the search is not yet complete, but when it is, the Minister will get in touch with the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Rhodes James: Will my hon. Friend expedite those inquiries? Will he look into the case of Sergeant John Dryden, who fell into the hands of unit E, was interrogated and sent for special treatment under Waldheim?

Mr. Renton: The MOD is searching carefully into the evidence that the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) has sent. We cannot prejudge the results of that search, but the Ministry will be in touch with the hon. and learned Gentleman as soon as the search is completed.

Mr. James Lamond: Will whoever represents us at the conference draw to the attention of one signatory of the Helsinki Final Act — Turkey — the fact that we object strongly to its troops occupying the sovereign territory of another signatory to the Helsinki Final Act—Cyprus—refusing to withdraw troops, bringing settlers to northern Cyprus, trying to establish for all time that it has a right to be there, and refusing to co-operate in tracing the many hundreds of Greek Cypriots who disappeared during the invasion 12 years ago? Could not that matter be raised under the Helsinki Final Act?

Mr. Renton: The Vienna conference will deal with three broad matters following the Helsinki Final Act — security, economic and humanitarian matters. In the humanitarian part of the conference, the question of human rights in eastern Europe will be followed up actively, not least by members of our delegation.

Mr. Terlezki: When the Foreign Secretary goes to Vienna, will he be very positive and ask at the conference whether it would be possible to arrange for the Eminent Persons Group to visit the Soviet Union on a fact-finding tour, as there are millions of innocent people imprisoned and persecuted in the Soviet Union? What is good for the blacks is also right for whites.

Mr. Renton: I understand my hon. Friend's point. The recent Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation to Moscow, led by that eminent person my noble Friend Lord Whitelaw, handed over a list of human rights cases that it wished the Soviets to look into. The Soviet failure so far to implement the Helsinki Final Act, especially in relation to human rights, is a matter of great concern to us and one that will be taken up regularly at the Vienna meeting.

Mr. George Robertson: Before anyone goes to Vienna in the autumn, would it not be worth while for the British Government to speak out against the United States veto of the agreement almost reached at Berne in the same forthright terms as the President of the Federal Republic of Germany did last Wednesday in the Royal Gallery? Does the Minister agree that progress in freeing people from the artificial and wholly indefensible restrictions on their ability to travel will come about only when the United States starts to listen to its European allies?

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman refers to the United States' refusal to agree to the summary document after the Berne meeting on human contacts. The United States delegation took the view that the document was in some ways a backward step from agreements that had been reached and announced publicly. That is why the United States delegation did not support the document. We took the view that, although we should have liked to support it, the Americans had a perfectly understandable point of view of their own on that issue.

South Africa

12. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what position Her Majesty's Government are taking towards adopting economic measures against the South African regime.

Mrs. Chalker: We receive a large volume of correspondence both for and against the imposition of economic sanctions against South Africa. Together with our European and Commonwealth partners, we have already adopted a number of restrictive measures towards South Africa designed to send a strong political signal of the need for fundamental reform, but it remains our view that general economic and trade sanctions would hinder rather than accelerate the process of peaceful change in South Africa, to which we are fully committed.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Minister of State aware that anyone who has the slightest doubt about the Prime Minister's true views on South Africa and the measures required need only read today's interview in The Guardian, in which she expresses the most craven and disgraceful appeasement of apartheid? No doubt the Prime Minister's comments will be noted by Commonwealth leaders. As the Minister of State has expressed quite different views both in the House and on television, is she proud to be arguing such a shoddy case at the Dispatch Box today?

Mrs. Chalker: I have not expressed different views. As an individual I may use different words, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said on Monday, we are seeking exactly the same end and in the same way. If the hon. Gentleman continues to take such a partial view of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's total opposition to apartheid and her repetition of the way in which economic sanctions would harm the black people of South Africa and the front-line states, he is taking a very one-sided and blinkered view of the reality of modern trade and the effect that economic sanctions would have on black people. I ask him to look again at the full facts of the situation.

Mr. Rathbone: Will my hon. Friend confirm that it is the Government's aim to take all measures necessary to bring pressure to bear on the South African Government to hurry up the process of reform and to carry through extensive reform so that, one hopes, there can still be evolutionary rather than revolutionary reform in that country?

Mrs. Chalker: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House on 1 July, we are considering certain contingency plans outlined in the June communiqué following the European Council summit at The Hague. We are looking at positive as well as restrictive measures to bring about the change so urgently needed in South Africa. My hon. Friend has our assurance that that is being fully done.

Ms. Clare Short: The Minister asked us earlier to make a realistic assessment of the situation. Is not a realistic assessment that the South African Government are not willing to negotiate, which is why there is a state of emergency and why the whole of the leadership and the trade union leadership are in prison? The South African people are willing to fight and die for their freedom. That is their only route to success, as it was for the people of Zimbabwe. The question is: which side are we on? If we say in advance of any talks that we are not willing to take either general economic sanctions or even punitive economic sanctions — the whole point of which is to punish and pressurise—does it not mean that we are not on the side of the fight for freedom by the black people of South Africa? That is what the whole world knows, to our shame.

Mrs. Chalker: The Government are doing, and will continue to do, all those things that are necessary to bring about peaceful change. I warn the hon. Lady that it is all too easy to talk about blanket general economic sanctions without realising their exact effect. It is obvious that many people, such as Chief Buthelezi, but also many others who represent the black communities, are gravely concerned about the effect of sanctions. I know from my discussions with many people, including Mr. Oliver Tambo, that they have no wish to inherit an economic desert, which would be the result of general economic sanctions.

Sir Frederic Bennett: Did my hon. Friend happen to see a very interesting programme on BBC television on Monday evening — one of its very rare moments of objectivity — called "The Other Side of the Sanctions Equation", which showed quite convincingly that the death rate of young African children in one of the homelands has doubled because of the economic measures already taken? Is that really what Opposition Members want to happen again and again?

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend draws our attention to a programme which, sadly, I did not see, but to which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister referred during questions yesterday. Of course we wish to take no measures that will inflict upon black people in South Africa and the other front-line states the sort of future that some unthinking Opposition Members seem to think should happen, without any care for those people — a care which this Government really have.

Mrs. Dunwoody: If the hon. Lady is genuine in her desire to protect the peoples of black South Africa, will she today come to the Dispatch Box and say, quite simply, that when economic sanctions are imposed this country will give positive economic and political aid to those most in need in the front-line states?

Mrs. Chalker: It would be presumptuous of me to say today what will be in place, whether or not the South African Government take more rapid steps towards the ending of apartheid in the coming weeks. I have already said this afternoon, as the hon. Lady would know if she had been listening, that a further £15 million will be spent over five years—not only £12 million to help non-white South Africans, but £3 million for transport projects in the front-line states. We are giving that aid in addition to another £22 million already announced. The hon. Lady should possess herself in patience for the outcome of the discussions to bring an end to apartheid, through my right hon. and learned Friend's mission.

USSR (Human Rights)

13. Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will seek an opportunity of raising the plight of religious minorities in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in his discussions with the Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union during Mr. Shevadnadze's visit to London on 14 and 15 July; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend and I expect to discuss with Mr. Shevadnadze the full range of issues in East-West relations, including arms control, regional questions and human rights. We shall bring to his attention the need for better implementation of commitments under the Helsinki and Madrid CSCE documents, in particular as regards the treatment of their citizens, including religious minorities.

Mr. Steen: While the Soviet Union understandably resents interference in its domestic policy, does my hon. Friend agree that human rights know no frontiers and that we need to encourage the Soviet Union to recognise the freedom of the individual and freedom from religious persecution as of paramount importance? When my hon. Friend sees the Foreign Minister, will he ask him to release Mr. Alexei Magarik, a Hebrew teacher recently sentenced to three years' hard labour for his teachings?

Mr. Renton: I listened carefully to what my hon. Friend said. It is absolutely right that, despite the commitments of the Soviet Union under both United Nations and CSCE documents that it has signed, it does not yet give freedom to religious minorities from persecution or allow them to leave the country if they wish. That is one of the commitments in those documents. I shall look into the case that my hon. Friend has referred to. We shall see whether it would be appropriate to include that among the matters that will be discussed with Mr. Shevadnadze.

Mr. Beith: While continuing to press the cases of those Jewish families seeking to emigrate, and continuing to press cases such as that of Irina Ratsushinskaya and other Christians imprisoned in the Soviet Union, will the hon. Gentleman press upon the Soviet Foreign Minister that nothing could do more to enhance the reputation of the Soviet Union in the West than a far more civilised attitude to such matters?

Mr. Renton: I agree with what the hon. Gentleman has said. I am aware of the sad case of Irina Ratsushinskaya, about which many hon. Members have written to me. I raised the case with the new Soviet ambassador when he called on me some weeks ago. We shall consider including that case among those to be discussed with Mr. Shevadnadze.

Mr. Sumberg: Is not the best test of a free society how it treats its religious minorities? By that test, does not the Soviet Union stand condemned? When my hon. Friend meets the Soviet Foreign Minister, will he make it clear that we seek nothing less than a full implementation of the Helsinki agreement?

Mr. Renton: That is the attitude that we have taken on many occasions with Soviet Union Ministers. It is a point that we shall make again during Mr. Shevadnadze's visit next week.

Palestine Liberation Organisation

15. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will continue the dialogue started by his predecessor as President of the Council of European Community Ministers, Mr. Hans Jan der Brock, with the chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, Yasser Arafat.

Mr. Renton: We shall continue to maintain contact with the PLO, but at present we have no plans for further ministerial meetings.

Mr. Ross: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the predecessor of the Foreign Secretary ended the contact between the PLO and the European Community? Does the hon. Gentleman think that it would be useful to promote some initiative that would follow on from the Venice declaration?

Mr. Renton: Our views on contacts with the PLO are well established. There are often contacts at official levels, but meetings at higher levels remain difficult while the PLO's policies reamin, to say the least, ambiguous on Israel's right to secure and recognised borders and on the use of violence.

Mr. Walters: Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to reaffirm that the Palestinians, like any other people, should have the right to exercise their right of self-determination and also to choose their own leadership?

Mr. Renton: Yes. The principle of the right to self-determination is spelt out in the Venice declaration. It is a principle to which we subscribe. We agree strongly that Palestinians must choose their own representatives, including their leadership. Those people must be willing to take some risks to obtain peace in the middle east.

Mr. Faulds: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the more the British Government tag along with the ignorant attitudes of the American Administration, the less likely is the advance of the Palestinian cause or peace in the middle east?

Mr. Renton: It is a great pity that the hon. Gentleman, who has a considerable knowledge of the middle east, overstates his case so dramatically and thus ruins a solid basis to some of his arguments.

Mr. Marlow: I wonder whether my hon. Friend, in consideration of the Palestinian issue, would like to discuss with the Israeli Government their connivance at the cover-up of the murder of two unarmed Palestinian prisoners? Perhaps he would like to take with him the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner), who seems deeply concerned about the behaviour of international statesmen.

Mr. Renton: I note what my hon. Friend has said. He will fully agree that the matter, about which we have all read a great deal, is obviously one to be pursued by the Israeli authorities. I have no doubt that they will do so with great care.

Mr. Janner: Will the Minister observe that my hon. Friend's question, unlike his supplementary question, referred to a dialogue with Yasser Arafat? Before considering having any such dialogue, will the Minister consult the Governments of Syria and Jordan to see whether they are prepared to have a dialogue with Yasser Arafat, otherwise the truth will become apparent—that this man does not represent the Palestinian people, who are entitled to their rights, but not via the PLO?

Mr. Renton: I have read the same newspaper report as the hon. and learned Member, but it is clearly up to the PLO to decide who its leader should be.

South Africa

16. Mrs. Shields asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the South African Government on the release of Nelson Mandela.

Mrs. Chalker: The statement issued by European Community Heads of Government following the European Council meeting on the 26 and 27 of June at The Hague, called on the South African Government to release unconditionally Nelson Mandela and other political prisoners. This was immediately communicated to the South African Government.

Mrs. Shields: What is the Foreign Secretary planning to do if, when he meets the South African authorities, they refuse his request that Mr. Mandela be released?

Mrs. Chalker: Should that unfortunately be the outcome of my right hon. and learned Friend's discussions with the South African Government, I am sure that, when the matter is considered with the Heads of the Commonwealth, our European Community partners and the seven industrial nations, they will jointly decide on further action. We believe that the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and other detainees, but especially Nelson Mandela, is a key to bringing about the end to violence and to getting dialogue moving in South Africa for a peaceful, evolutionary solution to the problem.

Sir John Farr: Does my hon. Friend agree that Nelson Mandela's release should not be unconditional but that it should be conditional upon his renouncing the use of violence, as has always been the principle behind the British Government's policy?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend will be aware that when I met the acting President of the African National Congress I spent a good deal of the time trying to persuade Mr. Oliver Tambo and his colleagues that there was no way out of this problem by violence—that it had to be by negotiations. The unconditional release of Nelson Mandela represents one of the best hopes of controlling the violent elements that exist among black people and of bringing about some common sense in the great battle for a dialogue leading towards negotiation and an end to the violence.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Mikardo — and a very happy birthday.

Mr. Mikardo: I am most grateful to you, Mr. Speaker.

Will the hon. Lady be good enough to suggest to the Foreign Secretary that, when he meets South African Ministers, he ought to tell them the self-evident fact that the longer they delay talking to the Mandelas and the Tambos, the more likely it is that they will finish up talking to other people with whom they might find it much more difficult to reach agreement?

Mrs. Chalker: May I join you, Mr. Speaker, in wishing the hon. Gentleman a happy birthday.

The tragedy of not talking now is that that provides a perfect recruiting ground for Communists and people with other undesirable views in black opposition parties in South Africa. That is why my right hon. and learned Friend is using all his endeavours to bring about a framework for dialogue between all peoples in South Africa. I hope that the House will join me in wishing him the very best success in those efforts, which will be long and hard.

Jury Challenge (Roskill Report)

3.35 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he would make a statement about the Government's response to the recommendation in the Roskill report that random jury challenges be abolished.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): In the White Paper on plans for criminal justice legislation, we invited comments on concern which had been expressed about the right of the defence to challenge up to three jurors without giving cause. The White Paper set out several options for change, including abolition of peremptory challenge, as had been recommended by the Roskill committee on fraud trials. We have been reflecting on these options in the light of the response to the White Paper.

Whatever its justification in earlier days, peremptory challenge is now widely criticised as a distortion of the jury system, which should be based on the principle of random selection. The removal of peremptory challenge would help to maintain the effectiveness and integrity of the system. It seems wrong in principle that jurors should be removed without reasons being given. It is also unsatisfactory that, in cases with large numbers of defendants, the composition of the jury should be capable of being influenced so substantially.

We have therefore decided that it would be desirable to abolish peremptory challenge, and shall be including proposals with that effect in legislation which I hope to introduce next Session. Challenge for cause—that is the right of either party to seek the removal of a juror for stated reasons—would remain.

Mr. Kaufman: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for enabling the House to extract from the Home Secretary today what he communicated to the press yesterday. It is becoming more and more offensive that Government decisions are being communicated to everyone but those in the House, and that when they are communicated to the House they are communicated only grudgingly when we attempt to obtain answers through you, Mr. Speaker.

Is it true that on abolition of jury trial fraud cases the Government have decided to accept the advice of the Opposition, of many Conservative Members and of many outside observers? The right hon. Gentleman quoted from the White Paper on criminal justice, but curiously his eye did not stray to paragraph 38, which reads:

"As a first step towards assisting Parliament to resolve the issues, the Director of Public Prosecutions is now monitoring the use of peremptory challenge and prosecution stand-by in cases presented by him. From 1 April, this survey will be extended to all cases tried in the Crown Court in those areas . . . in which the Crown Prosecution Service is in operation."

I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the paragraph continues:

"The figures thus gathered will be available to inform debate when the Criminal Justice Bill is before Parliament."

Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the outcome of the survey is available and whether it was available to the Cabinet Committee which decided to abolish the right of peremptory jury challenge, bearing in mind that he made it clear that the outcome of the survey was crucial to a decision upon it? What are the conclusions of the survey, and when will the survey and the findings be made available to the House?

The right hon. Gentleman has said that the Government intend to retain the right of challenge for cause. Is he not aware—this has been said by a number of Members, including my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) — that the abolition of peremptory challenge will turn challenge for cause into a growth industry in the courts? Will he bear in mind that the abolition of this right will cause minorities especially to feel that they have been deprived of an important part of their armoury of defence?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman is right to get into a froth about procedure. We told the House that we were considering the matter, and we set out the options in the White Paper. Yesterday the press began to get hold of some partly inaccurate accounts of our conclusions, and I agree that it is better to set the record straight. These are proposals that will come before the House and they will need to be debated at some length. There are a number of outstanding issues arising from the Roskill report, including the suggestion of a fraud trial tribunal, on which we are reaching or have just reached conclusions. I shall arrange for the House to be informed of our conclusions when they are ready.

The right hon. Gentleman quite fairly drew attention to the monitoring exercise, and the first results are available. The monitoring is continuing, and the results will be available for informed debate when the House considers the proposals that we set before it.

The right hon. Gentleman expressed a view about challenge for cause. I know of that opinion, as it has been expressed before in the House. I do not share it, but that theoretical supposition will no doubt be advanced when the House debates the proposals.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, although many of us strongly support the maintenance of the jury system as embodying the right to trial by 12 of one's fellow citizens, we do not necessarily believe that the defendant should have the right to decide who those 12 should be? I have defended a fair number of people in the criminal courts, and would ask my right hon. Friend whether he agrees that it is possible to manipulate the system by attempting to obtain a jury that the defendant believes is favourable to his case. There is much argument in favour of what my right hon. Friend proposes.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for his remarks. In the White Paper, we quote a famous sentence from Blackstone, who defended the principle of peremptory challenge and who pointed out how necessary it was that "a prisoner (when put to defend his life) should have a good opinion of his jury".

That shows how things have moved on. No defendant is now put to defend his life.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Does not the Home Secretary accept that the right to peremptory challenge allows a fair and equal chance to both the prosecution and the defence? In those cases where jury vetting will be allowed, will the right to peremptory challenge be closed to the defence? Do the Government intend to introduce this provision north of the border, where there is a distinct and separate code of criminal law?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has legitimately drawn attention to the prosecution's right of stand-by. We shall have to look at that, and limit it in the light of the proposal that I have announced. However, the hon. Gentleman will realise that questions of national security can be at stake, and I am discussing them with my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. I had better let the hon. Gentleman know about Scotland.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the vast majority of sensible people will warmly welcome the Government's decision? Peremptory challenges have been increasingly and systematically used to obtain a jury that is biased towards acquittal. That handicaps the police and is unfair to the public, who want to be protected from violent crime.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. I think that he was perhaps the first to draw this subject to the attention of the House. Incidentally, in response to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), I should say that this proposal does not cover Scotland.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): In a sense, the Home Secretary has just answered my question. Is it not absurd that this change should be made in one part of the United Kingdom but not in another? How can it be justified in England? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the position in Scotland dates only from 1980 and from legislation introduced by the present Government which was defended by Scottish Office Ministers at the time? There has been no complaint in Scotland about the situation, so why should this right be removed from England?

Mr. Hurd: The answer is that Scottish Members in all parts of the House constantly remind me that the Scots have a different legal system of which they are proud.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): We often hear phrases such as "I believe", "It is my belief" or "It is my opinion", but what research or hard evidence is there to justify altering a system that has been in existence for centuries? We want to know; we need evidence. What evidence has my right hon. Friend got?

Mr. Hurd: The system that my hon. Friend says has been in existence for centuries has also been progressively reduced during that time, for the reasons that I have already outlined. Lord Roskill's report makes a powerful and conclusive argument against the principle of the system. The results of the monitoring will be available when the House discusses the issue. But, on grounds of principle I believe that in 1986 the proposal that we are making will restore the effectiveness and integrity of the jury system.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): Will the Home Secretary now answer his hon. Friend's question? There is no published material. What evidence does the Home Secretary have that the right of peremptory challenge has been abused or has led to wrong decisions, especially when one bears in mind that more than 50 per cent. of acquittals in the Crown court are made on the direction of the judge? Would not the Home Secretary be better advised to improve resources so that we have quicker trials rather than set about eroding the rights of defendants?

Mr. Hurd: I do not see how the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) can say that there is no published material when we have the critique, the Roskill report, and the White Paper. Issues are powerfully discussed there in terms of principle. I have answered twice questions about the monitoring exercise. I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman about delays in trials. He will know about the steps – perhaps overdue – that we are taking, to improve the speed of justice.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Does my right hon. Friend accept that most people do not have much faith in the present jury system? The acquittal rate is far too high. At Snaresbrook it is 58·2 per cent. and at Leicester it is 50·5 per cent. Does my right hon. Friend accept that something had to be done to get more properly representative juries? His announcement will be welcome and will reinforce the view that a jury can work properly if the right kind of people are on it.

Mr. Hurd: I do not agree with my hon. Friend that there is widespread distrust of the jury system, if that was the phrase he used. On the whole, people are deeply and rightly attached to the jury system, but they are worried about what they increasingly see as a distortion of the type that he spoke about. I agree with him that we ought to remove the distortion.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I recommend to the Home Secretary that he read the reports of the debates leading to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980. The arguments that the Home Secretary is adducing now are precisely the arguments that his colleagues who are now responsible for legal matters in Scotland were rejecting at that time. Is he not aware, has nobody told him, that in 1980 his Government sought to reduce the number of challenges in Scotland from five to one? In Committee on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, Government Back Benchers tabled and carried an amendment to increase the number of challenges from one to three. The arguments that the Home Secretary is advancing about peremptory challenges are valid in any part of the United Kingdom. A jury is a jury and a challenge is a challenge.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Member simply underlines one of the points that I made – that this procedure has been steadily and progressively reduced on both sides of the border. He gave an illustration from Scotland, and the time has come to move a further step down that road.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does my right hon. Friend accept that many of us who work in the criminal justice system welcome his announcement, especially as it applies to multi-handed trials? It is all too evident that in such trials it is possible to engineer distortions. Does he also agree that, while it is one thing to make the system work more effectively, it is something else fundamentally to alter the system by withdrawing the right to jury trial from some defendants in certain circumstances?

Mr. Hurd: I have some sympathy with my hon. Friend's second point. I am grateful for his observations on it. Both Houses of Parliament will take and indeed seek a long time to discuss this proposal and the other proposals that will be put forward in the Criminal Justice Bill.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the Home Secretary return to the question put to him by the hon. Member for Leicester, North-West (Mr. Ashby) who asked why this proposal was being made now? In part, may it not be because of ministerial chagrin and sour grapes over Brian Raymond's successful challenge to three jury persons during the trial of Clive Ponting? Would it not be a good thing for the Home Office to turn its attention to the Director of Public Prosecutions whose record on official secrets, with Bothwell and the Cyprus spy trial, is about equal to that of the England cricket team?

Mr. Hurd: I am not aware of the challenge in the case mentioned by the hon. Member. The proposal that we are putting forward is the result of a good deal of thought and study and a good deal of public discussion. That discussion has to go forward to its focus from the stage that it has now reached following the publication of the White Paper. That focus will be discussed in both Houses.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Does my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary accept that the majority of those who practise in the criminal courts think that the practice of peremptory challenge has given rise to wide abuse? Does he also accept that it cannot be right to adjust the composition of a jury because a defendant—or more than one defendant—does not like red-headed men, or people with black faces, or people who read the Daily Telegraph? To adjust juries on that kind of ground is simply nonsense.

Mr. Hurd: I agree with my hon. Friend. The point of the jury system and the reason why it retains public confidence is that it is based on random selection. Juries are not tailored for a particular trial or for a particular defendant. The institution of peremptory challenge was deliberately introduced to weight the system at a time when, in other respects, the jury system seemed to be weighted against the defendant—when, for example a defendant who might have been very poorly educated was on trial for his life. That was the basic thinking behind peremptory challenge, but it no longer applies.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): Will the Home Secretary tell the House what hard evidence was available to the Government when they took this decision? How does he reconcile extolling the virtues of monitoring what is happening with paragraph 38 of the White Paper? I understand that monitoring is to continue. How could the Government reach a decision when evidence was not available to them upon which to reach that decision?

Secondly, how does the Home Secretary reconcile the different system that is now proposed for England and Wales with the Scottish system? There was a Government proposal in 1980 to reduce peremptory challenge in Scotland to one. However, an amendment was moved by the present Solicitor-General for Scotland to increase that number to three, and it was accepted by the then Solicitor-General for Scotland.

Mr. Hurd: The question, to my mind, is to a large extent one of principle, and it is so argued in the White Paper to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has referred. When the House debates the matter, it will have before it not only the arguments of principle, which I have used today and which Lord Roskill uses in his report, but the results of the monitoring exercise that is mentioned in the White Paper. That is a perfectly fair balance. The right hon. and learned Gentleman and his Scottish colleagues will be able to advance their arguments about Scotland. We believe that in England and Wales the time has come to carry to a logical conclusion what has been a gradual process—the progressive reduction of this technique.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a private notice question, but I shall allow two more questions.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): When my right hon. Friend is considering the composition of juries in England and Wales—he will have noted the comments about Scotland — will he bear in mind the substantial differences between English and Scottish law, not the least of which is the matter of corroboration?

Mr. Hurd: I am always very careful not to trespass upon Scottish law, precisely because I find that one subject leads to another. I find that the kind of simple comparisons that are advanced by the other side fall to pieces when the connecting circumstances are analysed.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Does my right hon. Friend agree that when the system of peremptory challenge was first introduced the structure of juries was very different, in that to be eligible for jury service one had to be a householder or landowner? That system has now been completely changed, and the composition of juries is much fairer. Apart from certain restrictions relating to age, every adult elector is eligible to serve on a jury. Therefore, the randomness of choice for jury service is much, much wider and fairer.

Does my right hon. Friend not think it strange that those who quite rightly espouse the jury system should seek to defend the continuation of the right to peremptory challenge which on occasion can only call into doubt the integrity of the jury system, to the detriment of everyone, not least defendants?

Mr. Hurd: I agree. When a countryman living in Oxfordshire went to Oxford to stand trial for stealing a lamb, for which he might have been hanged or transported, there would have been a case for the kind of system that we now have; but for the reason that my hon. Friend gave, and others, I do not think that such a case exists now.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind those hon Members whom I have been unable to call today that if they put down questions to the Home Office tomorrow they will come up on 24 July, which is just before the recess.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether through you, Mr. Speaker, I can get some clarification about the Scottish position. As I understand it, the Home Secretary has said that the removal of the right to peremptory challenge by the defence will not apply in Scotland. I am anxious to establish the position, because I understand from responsible members of the press that the Scottish Office, at a briefing this morning, said that it would apply. I have been unable to get any satisfactory reply from the Scottish Office, despite several telephone calls in the past hour or so. If the Home Secretary is clear that the new procedure will not apply to Scotland, it would be helpful to get it clearly and firmly on the record.

Mr. Hurd: I do not wish to compound the confusion, but I shall readily let the hon. Member know about this as soon as possible.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hurd: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall deal with one thing at a time.

Mr. Hurd: I am advised that my earlier remarks were correct.

Mr. Kaufman: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As we have had three earlier answers—yes, no, and I do not know—which of them has the right hon. Gentleman corrected?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Attorney-General is giving the Home Secretary different advice.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot help that. None of this is a matter for me. I do not know either.

Later—

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I accept your rulings, as I always do, but I should like to raise a matter that is a proper point of order —

Mr. Speaker: Good.

Mr. Porter: —which is a nice change.

This afternoon, you restricted questions on a matter that affects the inalienable right of an Englishman to a proper jury trial. I can understand your irritation with some of the views expressed by some of my hon. Friends, who seem to think that a jury trial involves them in deciding what the verdict should be. Those of us who scratch a part-time precarious living in the law know rather more about it than others and might make some more sensible comments than have been made. If this topic arises again, could you extend the time to include those who have some knowledge, so that they might give their views?

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me take one point of order at a time. It is always difficult for the Chair to decide who to call on any question. As for curtailing the question, it was a private notice question and I allowed it to run for more than 20 minutes, which is longer than I would allow for any normal question. I have already hinted to the hon. Gentleman that if he tables a question tomorrow it will come up during Home Office questions on 24 July, and I wish him good luck.

Mr. Porter: I accept that, Mr. Speaker, but I meant that you had not called me.

Mr. Speaker: I know what the hon. Gentleman meant.

Questions to Ministers

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like your advice. At Question Time today, the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) made a pointed remark about the Head of State of a friendly Government, by speaking about Waldheim's army group E. Mr. Waldheim was 21 when the last war began. I can fully understand that during the course of an election campaign there would be a strong case for a desperate Socialist opposition or Government in Vienna to mount a campaign such as this. I wonder whether, as that campaign has finished, it would be within your power, Mr. Speaker, to ask hon. Members not to attack the Heads of friendly Governments when they are performing their duties and nothing has been proved against them.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Nothing out of order took place. I listened carefully to what the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) said. We we do not in general refer in detrimental terms to friendly Heads of State. Every hon. Member must take responsibility for what he says, but nothing out of order took place.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Although one recognises the convention regarding Heads of State, I hope that you will bear in mind that the most grave allegations have been made about the present President of Austria. This was not just because there was an election campaign but because documentary evidence has been produced showing that Waldheim was involved in actions taken by the German army——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is raising a point of order that has nothing to do with me. If he raises a point of order that is to do with me, I shall endeavour to deal with it.

Mr. Winnick: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Bearing in mind the serious allegations made against Mr. Waldheim because of his wartime activities, is it not to be expected that hon. Members, at least those on the Opposition Benches, will continue to raise this matter, which I hope will not be ruled out of order because Mr. Waldheim has, unfortunately, been elected President of Austria?

Later—

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Further to an earlier point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you be good enough to explain further your ruling on comments about Heads of State? I am well aware of the rules of procedure that state that we are not allowed to comment unfavourably on judges, members of the other place and the royal family, and I accept that readily. But is it right for you to rule that we are not allowed to comment on Heads of State, friendly or unfriendly, properly chosen or not? It would be a grave curtailment of democracy if you so ruled, and a ruling which should be challenged.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder who will define whether Heads of State are friendly or otherwise so that we know how we may refer to them?

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. With the greatest respect, would it not be advisable for you to be fairly liberal in your interpretation of this rule? It would be very much to the disadvantage of hon. Members if they could not comment on the obscenities of a President Amin or on the inadequacies of a President Reagan.

Mr. Speaker: I refer the House to page 431 of "Erskine May" where it states:

"Opprobrious reflections must not be cast in debate on sovereigns and rulers over, or governments of, independent Commonwealth territories or countries in amity with Her Majesty, or their representatives in this country."

I am aware that the Austrian President has been the subject of some controversy. The House will recollect that [Mr. Speaker]

I said that there was nothing out of order in the question of the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner).

Energy Conservation

4.2 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to promote methods of conservation of energy; and for connected purposes.

I hope that every hon. Member is fully aware that this is Energy Efficiency Year. The Government have stated that we can reduce our energy bill by 20 per cent., which represents £7 billion a year at current prices. They have launched their biggest ever advertising campaign to achieve that objective, although I find the slogan a little unwieldy.

One might ask why there is a need for my Bill. The answer is straightforward. First, if these objectives are to be achieved real investment will be needed. Secondly, there will need to be a long-term commitment to secure the greatest energy efficiency, rather than a one-off exercise, however enthusiastically it might be backed by Ministers of the day. Indeed, Ministers of the day are expending a fair amount of effort on that.

Continuous permanent investment in conservation and energy efficiency could yield savings, not just of 20 per cent., but of 35 to 40 per cent. Certainly that is the view of many independent experts. In other words, we are talking about an annual saving of between £12 billion and £15 billion. At present value that is substantially more than the value of our entire North sea oil production. That is the prize that we are chasing. We need a permanent body to set standards and to provide a continuous stimulus to achieve the benefits of such massive savings.

My Bill proposes to establish an energy efficiency board, which would lay down minimum standards to be applied to plants and buildings and would administer the Government's programme of grants and loans for conservation. If such a body existed now, it would have a direct effect, for example on the homes insulation grants programme, the Government's handling of which, I regret to say, is something of a scandal. In recent years the take-up has consistently fallen about 30 per cent. short of the Government's allocation, and instead of finding ways to improve the take-up, the Government have now chosen to cut it. My proposed board would ensure a full take-up, and it is easy to identify how that would have happened. I am sure that the board would have recommended raising the grant ceiling, which is too low, and extending the grant to cover cavity wall insulation and thermostats.

My Bill would also impose a statutory responsibiltiy on gas and electricity boards to promote energy efficiency. That was a matter of some controversy in Committee on the Gas Bill. The Minister said that it was unfair to impose such an obligation on Britsh Gas alone, although the Government have now conceded just that in another place. I agree with the Minister. That is why my Bill would apply that requirement to both gas and electricity suppliers. That would lead to the energy utilities being prepared to give grants for greater efficiency to their customers. It would optimise their existing supplies and avoid wasteful over-capacity, such as we have in Scotland, where the addition of Torness, which the South of Scotland electricity Board is anxious to bring on stream, will give us almost exactly twice the generating capacity in Scotland that we can conceivably need under any circumstances.

The energy efficiency board would also investigate the scope for greater efficiency in the public sector, where too often public and Health Service buildings fall short of their energy efficiency potential. Part of the problem is that the annual budgeting process makes it easier for public agencies, such as health boards, ridiculous though this may be, to pay inflated energy bills from current expenditure than to invest in the capital required to cut those bills, sometimes within two years, and release that saving for patient care, instead of it going up the chimney in smoke as waste energy.

Hospitals are particularly appropriate for small-scale combined heat and power systems. In a typical case—this has happened in one or two hospitals — a conventional generator and existing technology — nothing fancy—can provide the same hot water and heating as a comparable gas central heating system, using the same amount of gas, and can further provide 25 per cent. of the hospital's electricity, effectively, free of charge. The energy efficiency board would also be able to evaluate alternative energy schemes, for example the installation of combined heat and power for a small housing development of 50 houses.

Hon. Members should be aware that comparisons of Britain's achievements in energy conservation, even since the oil-price rise, with those of our European Community neighbours are not favourable. An energy commission report showed that between 1979 and 1981 the use of energy by industry in the United Kingdom fell by 7·5 million tonnes of oil equivalent energy. Of that total, the commission study attributes about 67 per cent. to structural changes, 23 per cent. to reductions in the overall level of economic activity—they are both nice ways of saying "closures"—and only 9 per cent. to improved efficiency. That compares with France and West Germany, where the figures for improved efficiency were 71·2 per cent. and 84·4 per cent. respectively. Although the position has improved since then, it has not improved dramatically.

We need a much more ambitious programme to secure real and fantastic savings in energy. The consequences of such a programme would be to lower substantially our industrial costs and to help cut energy costs generally by lowering the costs of electricity. We would use what we have much more efficiently, thus lowering the real capital costs of the energy capability installed. Lower domestic heating costs would have an immediate social benefit, because they would lead to less dampness in homes and to less hypothermia, and they would reduce all the other tragic symptoms of fuel poverty.

The real benefit of a programme such as my Bill envisages is in jobs—tens of thousands of jobs. If the Government's target were achieved, which it will not be without the kinds of measures envisaged in my Bill, over 150,000 jobs would be quickly attainable. If we can achieve the long-term aim of 35 to 40 per cent. energy savings, we could be talking about over 300,000 new permanent jobs. These would be distributed throughout the country and many would be for engineers and building trade members. There would be some extra concentration in the north of England and Scotland, where, with the right stimulus, take-up would be greater, and where more of the relevant engineering industries are concentrated. Intensive effort is sure to lead to advances in technology, and that in turn will give us valuable export opportunities.

Early-day motion 1078 on the Order Paper today in the name of the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) calls for a debate in the House on energy efficiency. I agree. This is a matter of enormous potential to the United Kingdom which is nothing like being taken advantage of. One way to secure that would be to give my Bill a First Reading today and to allow time for a Second Reading as soon as possible.

4.12 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Member wish to oppose the Bill?

Mr. Walker: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to speak against the Bill because I am opposed to the setting up of further quangos to do what we are already capable of doing and what the Goverment are progressively doing. I see this as another means of establishing jobs for the boys and not, in fact, achieving very much.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) said that if Scotland went ahead with bringing on stream a nuclear generating power we would have twice the generating capacity that Scotland needs. He and the House know full well that Scotland has for decades generated more electricity than it needs. It has been the practice of Scotland to export electricity to England and Wales, and it has done so successfully and profitably for a long time.

The hon. Gentleman said that we should be looking at combined heat and power. He will be aware that in Dundee we pioneered the combined heat and power schemes and that proposals are now in hand in other parts of the country to link up with a combined heat and power programme.

The hon. Gentleman also said that the oil price rise had not produced the kind of ambitious programme that it had elsewhere. However, like all people who make speeches, he is selective. He chose 1979 as being the year of the oil price rise, but everyone knows that the first oil price hike was in 1973-74 and then again in 1979.

The hon. Gentleman is introducing a Bill to set up a quango which we do not require. We already have the machinery and mechanism to carry out the programme that he hopes to achieve. The Government's record is substantially better in this area than that of the Government of the Lib-Lab pact. I mean "substantially" because it involves a vast sum of money. Therefore, I wish to oppose the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Malcolm Bruce, Mr. Kevin Barron, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Charles Kennedy, Mr. Peter Rost, Mr. Tony Speller, Mr. James Wallace, Mr. Dafydd Wigley, and Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

Mr. Malcolm Bruce accordingly presented a Bill to promote methods of conservation of energy; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon 24 October and to be printed. [Bill 202.]

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was under the impression that, some little time ago, although an hon. Member who opposed a Bill did not seek to divide the House, he was obliged so to do. On this occasion my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and I said no, but no Division was called.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member for Tayside North (Mr. Walker) and the hon. Lady said no, they did not say it within the hearing of the Chair. Certainly at this end of the Chamber it was not audible. The hon. Lady will know that I put the Question twice.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: I said no twice.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady should make her objections more audible.

ESTIMATES DAY

[3RD ALLOTTED DAY]

ESTIMATES 1986-87

Class XV, Vote 2

SUPPLEMENTARY PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

Residential Care for the Elderly

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a further sum, not exceeding £4,290,850,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1987 for expenditure by the Department of Health and Social Security on supplementary pensions and allowances.—[Mr. Major.]

4.15 pm

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): I am grateful to the Liaison Committee for giving us some time this afternoon to debate this subject on an Estimates day. There is another debate to follow, so we shall have an opportunity to debate this matter fully.

As the House knows, we had only a few days' warning of the date of this debate, and I want to thank Her Majesty's Stationery Office and the printers for publishing our annual public expenditure report, which contains a section on this issue, in record time. I understand that that is available in the Vote Office now.

Under the supplementary benefit regulations the Department of Health and Social Security may pay benefit to elderly people living in residential care and nursing homes run by the private or voluntary sectors to meet the costs of their board and lodging. The cost of those payments has risen from £6 million in 1978 to an estimated £280 million in 1985. That is a considerable increase over seven years.

The size and speed of that increase in public expenditure is such that the Select Committee on Social Services thought it important to bring the matter urgently to the attention of the House. In the context of the total social security budget, £280 million is small—it accounts for less than 1 per cent. of all social security spending—but it is the equivalent of 10 per cent. of current spending on personal social services. Therefore, we are glad to have the opportunity to raise this matter in the House.

The Committee's concern is not that £280 million is an unreasonable amount to spend on supporting elderly people in need of residential care and without the means of paying for it themselves—for that reason I shall not be moving a reduction in the Vote — but that expenditure in this area has been quite out of the Department's control. That is the main burden of our criticism. The vast growth in spending is not the result of a well thought out policy decision and careful consultation; it has happened by accident and is the result of bureaucratic mismanagement.

I should have thought that, in spite of the fact that general managers have departed from the Elephant and Castle, there were enough people managing the various budgets of the Department to have kept an eye on this matter. However, it seems that they were not able to do so.

Before 1983 limits on the amount of supplementary benefit available for board and lodgings payment were determined locally and local DHSS offices had discretion to pay the full amount of a board and lodging charge, provided that it was not "reasonable" to expect the claimant to move to cheaper accommodation. "Reasonable" is the term used by the Department.

In November 1983, in the face of escalating costs, a new system was introduced. Locally determined maximum limits were set at a level reflecting the highest reasonable charge for suitable accommodation in the area. What was paid depended upon what private accommodation was available in the area. Therefore, there was a change in the direction of administration.

The introduction of maximum limits did nothing to control expenditure, which surged from £39 million in 1982 to £105 million in 1983 and to £190 million in 1984. Therefore, there were distinct and large increases. In 1985 expenditure had gone up to £280 million. Much of the increase was due to increased demand, but the average weekly cost per resident also jumped from less than £50 in 1982 to over £76 in 1983. Only a small part of the increase can be put down to inflation. Many homes simply increased their prices when they realised that the Department would pay the increased costs. It was a good jamboree for them. As the Committee reported, it is remarkable that the Department did not foresee that effect. It is surprising that a Government so committed to the operation of market forces did not realise that if one tells sellers that one is willing to pay more, prices will rise accordingly. That is what has happened.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): To balance the argument that the hon. Lady is putting forward, I hope that she will agree that it is important to show the House that the figures the DHSS said it was prepared to meet were based on figures which were already in existence. I agree that they were at the higher rather than the lower level, but it is important to show that, in putting forward the recommendation, the DHSS based it on figures of cost already in existence. Perhaps some homes thought that if others were receiving higher amounts they should, too. However, the recommendation was based upon a realistic figure of what was already being charged at the better end of the market.

Mrs. Short: Yes. However, the effect of what was likely to happen was not monitored, and we are faced with this massive escalation in cost. It is considerable. I gave the total figures earlier.

In September 1984 the Department changed course again. Local limits were frozen and a review of residential care policy was announced. In April 1985, locally determined limits were abandoned in favour of national limits. Expenditure appears to have gone on rising to an estimated £280 million in 1985 and there is no evidence that it will be any less this year.

The number of residents in private and voluntary care supported by the supplementary benefit system increased from 7,000 in 1978 to 42,500 in 1984. That is a sixfold increase. In 1979, 14 per cent. of residents in private and voluntary homes for the elderly were supported by supplementary benefit. In 1984 the proportion of those supported had risen to 35 per cent., but the average weekly payment per resident had grown from £15·70 in 1978 to no less than £88 in 1984. That is a considerable increase.

The Committee tried to find out from the Department what had been achieved by that increase in cost: whether there had been a commensurate increase in the quality of the care provided. It was unable to tell us. The Committee also asked about the effect of introducing national limits: whether lower limits had reduced standards or whether any homes had been squeezed out of business. Again, the DHSS was able to tell us very little. It became clear, too, that the Department has not yet established how board and lodging payments will fit into the new structure of social security set out in the current Social Security Bill. The Minister told us in Committee that the present regime would "broadly continue". The Committee concluded:

> "It seems extraordinary that the DHSS should not have worked out how this increasingly important area of social security spending is going to fit into the scheme of things in only two years' time."

It is clear that more monitoring, more control and a better system of gathering information about the effects of the payments is needed.

Concern has been expressed about standards of care in private homes, especially the implications for residential care in the Department of Employment's recent White Paper "Building Businesses . . . not Barriers" which mooted some deregulation in that area. It is vital that standards of care are not sacrificed in the pursuit of profit. In fact, we want standards of care not only to be maintained but to be improved as increased payments are made. Ministers assured the Committee that there were no plans to remove controls, and the Minister for Social Security told us:

> "The Government is firmly determined to ensure the proper control of standards in this area."

It seems as if there has been a lack of communication between Government Departments, and that has resulted in the runaway increase in the total cost and the amounts paid.

There is a strong argument for the same rules and regulations to apply to all publicly financed homes, whether they are run by the private, public or voluntary sectors. As a condition of receiving funds from the Department, every home, whoever runs it, should be required to make much better information available to potential users or their families so that informed choice can be a reality. To maintain standards in all sectors the social services inspectorate should operate across the public-private divide. That is an important responsibility that the social services inspectorate should be exercising very strictly.

There should surely be a much greater degree of co-ordination at local level to ensure that public money is spent in the best interests of clients. If someone is entitled to or is receiving supplementary benefit for private or voluntary residential care and both the social services department and the client think that the same amount of money could provide a better service if differently used, perhaps they should be able to claim the money and use it as they think best.

Given the population structure, the need for residential care for the elderly is likely to continue to increase for the foreseeable future. Year by year the demand will increase. It is vital that we think carefully about how to use and develop all the elements of provision—whether public, voluntary or private—into a coherent policy of social care for the elderly who require it so that we have a good meshing of the different types of care provided and standards are comparable across the frontiers of the three types of care.

That policy must ensure that the resources available can be transferred from one area of government to another, according to the needs of the individual. That is why we call attention in this short debate to our concern about what is happening now and to the potential problem for the immediate future unless proper control is exercised by the Department. I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us what control will be exercised.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): As a member of the Select Committee I wish to say a few words in support of our Chairman, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short). I nearly said "my hon. Friend" because on our Select Committee we regard each other as hon. Friends even if from time to time we may have a slight difference of opinion as is human. I can assure the House that the Committee was unanimous in everything we recommended in the report.

In developing the themes of our report I shall detain the House for a short time on four aspects. The first is to support what the hon. Lady has said and to draw the House's attention to the rapid increase in the number of payments of benefit to people living in residential care and nursing homes run by the private and voluntary sectors. In my judgment, it raises a number of important questions about the past, the present and, even more importantly, the future provision for our elderly citizens.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East read from paragraph 70 of the report. I should like to draw the House's attention to the numbers rather than to the money. We talk about there being 7,000 beneficiaries in private rest homes in 1978. By 1984 the figure had risen to 42,500. As a proportion, in 1979, 14 per cent. of the residents in private and voluntary homes were being supported through the Department of Health and Social Security. By 1984 that proportion had risen to 35 per cent. I have reason to suppose that today it is nearer 50 per cent. That raises considerable issues for the House to consider.

I am satisfied that what we say in paragraph 72—

"Much of the increase in expenditure can be explained by a growth in demand"— is correct. That growth in demand is certain to continue. Again, I hope that the House takes that firmly on board. Let me give the House some figures of my own to illustrate the inevitability of that increase in demand. Let us take the demographic changes expected between 1985 and the end of the century, only 15 years hence. The percentage of people of pensionable age 65 or 60 — when men and women receive their respective pensions — will drop from 18·2 of the population in 1985 to 17·8. However, the percentage who are 75 or older will increase from 6·4 to 7·1. In absolute numbers, that is an increase of nearly half a million people.

We all know people in their 80s or even in their 90s who are more robust than many of us sitting in the Chamber, but as a general planning concept it is reasonable to accept that the older people get, the more dependent they are. Therefore, that change in the demography of elderly people is a point that the House has to take firmly on board in relation to our report.

One must conclude that the provision that we are talking about will need to increase rather than diminish. Therefore, I trust that the House will accept our conclusion in the Select Committee:

"Given the increasing number of elderly people, and particularly of the very old, the demand for residential care and for board and lodging payments is bound to continue to grow for many years to come."

My second point is about the qualitative aspects of the current arrangements.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The hon. Gentleman may raise this matter on his other points, but I thought that he would do so on the first point when he talked about the numbers involved, the sums involved, and, most important, the trend. Earlier in his speech he raised the significant policy issue about the role of the DHSS. That applies to students—should the DHSS be paying money to students, or should that be for the Department of Education and Science? In his other points, will the hon. Gentleman consider whether it is appropriate for the DHSS to be paying that sort of money, or whether that should be channelled from the DHSS budget to the local authorities?

Sir David Price: I can assure the hon. Gentleman, whose knowledge is extensive and for whom I have the greatest respect, that that is the fourth aspect that I shall touch on. If he will forgive me, I wish to develop my points in my own sequence.

I was dealing with the qualitative aspect of current arrangements. I should like to ask these questions. Are the current levels of payment sufficient to ensure a proper standard of provision? That ties up with the next point that I wish to make. Should there be regional if not local variations? The evidence that I have from Hampshire suggests that costs vary, particularly when it comes to the variation in housing costs. Are we making sufficient provision for the very dependent elderly people? In our report we welcomed the Government's decision to introduce a higher rate for very dependent elderly people from 28 July. We congratulated the Government on that. But is that the end of the story? Should we be more sensitive in variations of rate? We know the reality as people get frailer and become more dependent.

Then there is the whole question of the uneven treatment of disabled and handicapped people. We drew attention to that in our report. Hon. Members who are present, all of whom understand those matters, know that there is a big difference between the financial treatment of similarly disabled people, according to the age at which one becomes disabled.

Another aspect of the matter about which I feel strongly, is, the treatment of attendance allowance as income in the assessment of supplementary benefit. I have been campaigning for many years on that matter. I feel extremely strongly that attendance allowance should never be treated as income. We won the battle with the Treasury. We got it to accept that attendance allowance should be tax free, just like mobility allowance. Those are two allowances that are nothing to do with income. They are to do with helping people who are severely handicapped to live with their handicap. I believe that these allowances are in a different category from normal income support. I have argued the case in the House for many years. I regard what is now happening as a retreat from what I thought was territory that we had conquered for keeps, but one knows that in life no victory is ever complete.

Thirdly, I draw the House's attention to the setting and maintaining of standards in private rest homes and nursing homes. I am sure that the whole House agrees that we must weed out the cowboys. We have yet to see the fully beneficial effects of the implementation of the Registered Homes Act 1984 and the Nursing Homes and Mental Nursing Homes Regulations 1984. We welcomed the reassurances of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health and my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security when they gave evidence to us. They were absolutely clear. Are the levels of payments, particularly in the more expensive parts of the country, sufficient to support those purposes? I wonder whether there may be a more positive role for the DHSS as inspectors rather than local authorities, not purely in a policing and monitoring sense, but in a positive sense, similar to the role of HMI in schools. I leave my right hon. and hon. Friends with the thought that there might be a constructive as well as a purely monitoring role for this Department.

Finally, I should like to raise the wider aspect of how the provision in private rest homes that we are discussing today ties up with all the other aspects of our national provision for the elderly. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East drew attention to the matter too. We said in paragraph 75 of our report:

"A clear national policy for the support of the elderly inside and outside residential care must be devised."

It is my personal view that we cannot have too wide a spectrum of arrangements for caring for the elderly because every elderly person is an individual. In every family circle, every person is different. It seems to be a mark of an advanced and generous society to have as close to infinite a range of arrangements as we can obtain. I do not believe that there is any uniquely correct method of provision. On the contrary, I invite the Government to take the lead from St. John's gospel, where we read:

"In my Father's house are many mansions."

I want to see many mansions. My own experience, and my own gut instinct, tells me that the preferred mansion of most elderly people, if not all, is their own home.

Therefore, in seeking

"A clear national policy for the support of the elderly",

I have a bias in favour of care in the community as against institutionalised care, whether public or private. In my judgment, all current financial arrangements favour institutionalised care. My plea to the Government is to redirect our financial arrangements so that the provision between institutionalised care and care in the community is at least neutral. If I carry the House with me so far, my plea must mean more public money in support of care in the community where most of the care happens today. Put another way, I ask the Government to support personal choice for the dependent elderly.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) and the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) on their work as members of the Select Committee on Social Services. The Committee's fourth report is a valuable document and I look forward to studying the other aspects of the report later.

It is correct that in today's debate we should examine the sections of the report which deal with private and voluntary residential care for the elderly. I believe that expansion is not a bad thing, but since 1980 there has been a disturbing element of unplanned growth. There is a difference between necessary expansion and the way that that growth has taken place. Indeed, the Government would probably admit—privately, if not publicly—that that is what has happened. They have had to respond and react to events, and they have responded—unwittingly and without any design intended—in a way that has compounded the problem.

I am mystified as to why the Government decided to extend supplementary benefit to residential care against the long-established tradition of local authorities providing part III accommodation. I was more closely involved in the 1983 decision to impose categories and local ceilings. The inevitable consequence was that expenditure spiralled. Paragraph 72 of the Select Committee report states:

"In other words, landlords raised their prices to meet the limits. It is easy to speak with hindsight, but it does seem remarkable that the DHSS did not foresee what would happen."

Many of those landlords must have seen the Government coming. The Government can be charged with having presented themselves as a soft target.

Mr. Frank Field: They were told that.

Mr. Kirkwood: Indeed, as the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) says, they were told so.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I was tempted to intervene during the speech of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) earlier on this point. One point which has not been recognised in what has undoubtedly been an intractable and difficult area of policy for many years is that the previous regulations, which were replaced in 1983, contained a completely open-ended provision for charges to be met without limit where it was unreasonable to expect the claimant to move. The fact that that totally open-ended provision was exploited by many organisations, and was advertised freely, led us to make the changes. To suggest that a provision of a tighter variety was replaced by the present provision is an over-simplified reading of the regulation.

Mr. Kirkwood: I agree with the Minister that this is a complicated area of policy. However, he should have looked twice before he authorised the new regulations. I hold no great brief for those who criticise private residential homes, as there are people on the make who make money unscrupulously, However, the vast majority —certainly in my part of the country—are not so minded. It is inevitable that landlords, when they see that the local limit is higher than their charges, will charge more for the better service that they believe they are providing. They consider that it costs more money to provide the better service.

Mr. Frank Field: The Government would have been wiser to keep the existing regulations to meet charges, provided that they were not unreasonable. The unscrupulous landlords, who have exploited the system, would not have been told at what level they could fleece taxpayers.

Mr. Kirkwood: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It may have been necessary to change the definition of what was reasonable or unreasonable at the time. However, matters could have been controlled in a more sensible way.

[Mr. Kirkwood]

When the system was changed again, by categorising the limits by handicap, a host of problems resulted. For example, in many cases, limits turned out to be inadequate and we had to resort to transitional protection. There is now an exceptional hardship category and there is the problem of the elderly higher rate which is payable only if people are disabled before retirement age. Whenever the Government try to change and ameliorate the system, they compound the problem.

Demand has continued to increase. In his evidence to the Select Committee the Minister referred to some possible future problems. However, I am worried about the present trends. In his evidence, the Minister said:

"This demographic trend produces foreseeable very, very large increases in demands on what is currently social security expenditure, of a kind which . . . the Government concluded we could not confidently be sure that they could be sustained into the next century."

That statement together with the fact that the Government have had the benefit of the joint working party report published in 1985 and the Ernst and Whinney report published in 1986, must lead us to expect a clear policy statement of the Government's intentions. The need for that statement is reinforced by the fact that the Social Security Bill is about to complete its final stages. The Select Committee is correct to state that it is wrong for the Government to leave this area untouched and for the Minister to hide behind a statement that the regulations provide enough flexibility to cope with the present position. The Minister did not make it clear that if he wanted to change the position and if the need for substantial change arose, he would be able to do that under the Social Security Bill. In the aftermath of the important Select Committee report the House should have a clear answer from the Government on that point.

I am worried about several points. I believe that choice is a good thing. The hon. Member for Eastleigh alluded to that point in his remarks. However, I am worried that the direction of board and lodging payments and residential care runs counter to the Government's policy on community care. Local authorities are short of finance, and it is easier for prospective applicants to opt for residential care even if their needs do not show that that is necessary. There is now almost a financial incentive to opt for residential care, and that is compounded by the fact that domiciliary support is more difficult to come by these days. Although the element of choice may be present in theory, in practice it is disappearing.

The proposal cannot be an efficient use of public money because there is no assessment of need. The test for residential provision is simply one of supplementary benefit, not of a level of dependency. That cannot be an efficient and sensible use of public money.

I also believe that the system of funding is inequitable. Within the disregards operated by local authorities, there is a capital disregard level of £1,200 before they start charging. We know that the DHSS, under the supplementary benefit regulations, has a capital disregard of £3,000. How can that be fair? The weekly personal allowance that local authority part III accommodation claimants receive is £7.75. The DHSS personal weekly allowance for people in the same homes is £9.05 per week. The funding is inequitable. If the Government are to continue the system, that inequity must be redressed. The Government must also consider the implications for the home care and meals on wheels services.

The Government have three choices, and these were referred to in the joint working party report. The first is that all the charges should be put on the system of supplementary benefit for residential care. That would appear to be the way that the Government are drifting. I use that word advisedly because they are not making a positive decision to move in that direction. Secondly, the whole charge could be put on the local authority.

Thirdly—I hope that the Government will give active consideration to this—the board element could be paid by the DHSS, which has the machinery to do so efficiently within reason, and the care needs could be assessed by the local authority. I believe that that is the most fruitful way forward. There are real problems about assessment, and the system of assessment must be extended. There are also real problems about charges. As the Ernst and Whinney report pointed out, the market is sensitive to the DHSS limits and claimants face widely differing circumstances. Nevertheless, I believe that the general direction that I have described is the one that the Government should take. I hope that they will act quickly.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): First, I pay a warm tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) and to other members of the Select Committee on Social Services—I recognise the consensus of the Select Committee—for drawing attention in the fourth report to the serious and disturbing problems becoming increasingly apparent in private and voluntary care provision for the elderly as a result of the Government's differential approach to funding between the public and private sectors. I am not sure that I can follow the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) with a biblical reference, as I omitted to look one up before the debate, but I liked his line about the redirecting of money. I would go further than making it neutral as between residential and community care, but the hon. Gentleman was right to make that point.

I strongly endorse all that my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East has said. She eloquently described the sharp zig-zags of Government policy in the past six years as they have twisted and turned from one device to another in an attempt to reconcile the irreconcilable—that is, to use public money to provide a major boost for the local commercial market, while at the same time meeting need and containing public expenditure. In my view it has always been clear—the history of the past six years has conclusively shown this to be so—that those are fundamentally incompatible objectives. Since 1980 the Government have shifted from one extreme to the other, with policy reversals cancelling previous initiatives, but they seem unable or unwilling to learn the basic lesson that no amount of tinkering with the system can make the private sector the main provider of services, while at the same time ensuring that limited residential provision is strictly allocated to meet priorities of need.

We believe that the Government's fundamental philosophy and approach are at fault. Contradictions show through at every stage of policy evaluation in the past few years. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East pointed out — it is important to clarify the Minister's reference to this—in 1980 the Government permitted supplementary benefit board and lodging allowances to be paid at a rate commensurate with local residential charges, with power to pay more in particular circumstances. There was no capped limit, but a measure of discretion, and local officers are perhaps best placed to exercise that discretion while ensuring that local charges are properly met. When that discretion became more widely exercised, the Government's overall commitment to limiting expenditure led them to impose a ceiling on the amount that could be paid and to introduce local variations. Because they did not want any forced removals from homes, the new level in each locality corresponded to the highest reasonable charges in that locality.

That compromise in November 1983 produced the worst of all possible worlds. Many proprietors levelled up their charges to the local limits and many new homes were opened as people who did not necessarily have any caring background or experience saw the commercial potential of doing so. At the same time, many local authorities stopped sponsoring residence in the private sector. Some withdrew from existing sponsorships and some even planned to sell off complete local authority premises to private owners. As if all those no doubt unintended consequences were not enough, expenditure on board and lodging in private homes rose nearly fivefold in two years to £190 million in 1984.

Not before time, in April 1985, the Government introduced a new system abolishing local limits and re-establishing national limits, but this time differentiating according to age and the type of disability of the claimant. It quickly became clear, however, that there were significant drawbacks inherent in the new system. The limits were set too low for certain types of care, especially care for the more dependent elderly people and for multipally handicapped young people. The limits were set on a national basis without any regard for local or regional variations in cost, thus preventing local authorities from paying for the extra care needs of some elderly claimants through topping-up arrangements and also discriminating against elderly people who became physically disabled after pension age.

The Government implicitly acknowledged the validity of those criticisms in their latest amendment to the regulations last month, which proposed a higher limit for Greater London and for severely dependent elderly people. Although that change is welcome, it falls well short of meeting the criticisms. For example, the Ernst and Whinney report shows that, although average gross unit costs in the private sector are £117 per place per week, they cover a huge range from £36 to £247 per week. To compress that range into a single national limit, albeit with a variation for Greater London, does not, and cannot begin to, reflect local economic realities. More fundamentally, none of the recent adjustments in any way mitigates what I regard as the real case against the Government's general policy of discriminating in favour of the private sector.

First, it is profoundly wrong that huge public subsidies are now provided for private residential care without any assessment of residential need in terms of physical or mental frailty. Dependency is not a criterion for entry in the private sector. As has been pointed out, public money will be spent on people whose need for residential care may be minimal, provided that they qualify for supplementary benefit. That is not just wrong in terms of priorities. It is also highly wasteful. The efficient use of public money requires assessment whether residential care is really needed or whether support systems can be provided to keep the person functioning within the community.

Secondly, it is ludicrous that while local authorities are forced to budget within overtight constraints because of rate support grant cuts and rates penalties, including cuts in community care initiatives, public money is being sucked into private residential alternatives on a demand-led basis. It is absurd that while local authority development of community care is completely hamstrung for lack of funds, private residential provision for the elderly has doubled since 1979 and supplementary benefit payments for people in such accommodation have increased nearly twentyfold.

Most significant of all, when public expenditure is tight, it is a grotesque misallocation of funding that the proportion of private residents financed through supplementary benefit has nearly trebled since 1979 to more than 40 per cent. now. In terms of the Government's supposed policy for the family, this has the ironic effect not just of making it easier for families to dump their relatives in homes, but of providing a financial incentive for them to do so because arranging and paying for domiciliary support is so much more difficult.

Thirdly, there is inequity in funding between the private and public sectors. I shall not make much of this point, but, for example, the capital disregard for residents in the private and voluntary sectors receiving supplementary benefit is fixed at £3,000 whereas local authorities can disregard only £1,200 before charging.

Fourthly – this is a more substantive point – Ministers constantly defend the private sector as reflecting greater individual choice. I am all in favour of choice in principle, but in fact the huge mushrooming of subsidies for the private sector at the expense of local authorities has diminished overall choice for the elderly.

In 1984 expenditure per head of population aged 75 and over on local authority home care services was only 79 per cent. – less than four-fifths of its level in 1978-79. For meals on wheels it was only 85 per cent.

That suggests that the choice has been between a well-funded and easy-to-obtain private residential place, and a restricted and hard-to-obtain home help service. I doubt whether that is in accordance with the priorities of many hon. Members. It is estimated that it will cost more than £300 million net to bring those services back to their 1978-79 level. It is difficult not to see the shortfall as having been badly aggravated by increases in supplementary benefit payments to private residents, over the same period, of £184 million.

Those are all major reasons why we believe that the whole thrust of the Government's residential care policies is wrong-headed and inefficient and actually distorts their own declared community care objectives. Even within the parameters of the Government's own policy framework – which we do not accept – the present policies have serious defects which the Government must address before Parliament votes to continue the current funding arrangements. After all, that is the purpose of a debate on the Estimates.

Mr. Frank Field: I have followed with interest my hon. Friend's comprehensive attack on the development of Government policy. As we are unlikely to convince the Government tonight, can we register the points of agreement? Is my hon. Friend saying that there is support on both sides of the House for a change that will ensure that people will not have access to the private sector and pick up supplementary benefit payments unless they are deemed necessary for that service by the local authority?

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend, whom I did not consult about the preparation of my speech, has anticipated one of the points that I intended to make. I very much agree with him and endorse what he said, and shall comment more fully towards the end of my speech.

The most obvious example of serious defects in the Government's policy is the fact that the care of all supplementary benefit funded residents — there are 42,000 according to a recent parliamentary answer on 10 February—is put in jeopardy if the home owner decides to increase the fees, as he is entitled to do. Indeed, there is now some evidence of evictions.

I wish to quote from the extremely good report by the National Council for Voluntary Organisations that was published last year, and to that extent is slightly out of date. It refers to the report of Counsel and Care for the Elderly "Every solution creates a problem" — an interesting title and not entirely inaccurate in this context —and gives the example of a 93-year old woman whose only relatives are distant cousins and who is paying her own fees of £250 a week in a small nursing home. The home informed the family that it would evict her if its full fees were not met by a fixed date. A charity made a holding grant of £400 to give the family a small breathing space. Applications were made to other funds, but the outcome has yet to be decided. I hope that it is decided satisfactorily, but I doubt whether such a precarious provision could last indefinitely.

Another example from a concerned Hampshire social worker showed that one home had increased its fees from £150 to £175 a week and had told the elderly resident on supplementary benefit that she would have to leave if she could not make up the difference. Relatives have stepped into the breach for the time being, but the situation cannot last indefinitely. That is a serious problem. I fear that there will soon be reported evictions, if they have not already occurred.

The quality of life of residents may be markedly affected if home owners, who probably do not wish to evict residents, decide to cut facilities rather than increase fees. In addition, the turnover in ownership of homes may sharply increase. I note that in Norfolk, for example, a fifth of private homes either closed or changed hands during one year recently. A different regime may profoundly alter the suitability of a home for its residents.

A rather more paradoxical result of current policies is that there is clear evidence that they are defeating their own purposes. Most owners of private homes have responded to the new supplementary benefit limits by refusing to admit supplementary benefit claimants. The NCVO reports that a spokesperson for the Registered Nursing Homes Association in Surrey said that since the limit was introduced there had been no admissions of people on supplementary benefit into nursing homes in the south-west. Before the limit it had a policy of admitting 50 per cent. DHSS-funded patients, but it says that it can now no longer afford to do so.

The NCVO report, in another example, showed that an investigation carried out by the Lewisham and North Southwark health authority revealed similar results, in that at the end of July 1985, 59 elderly patients who had previously been discharged to private nursing or residential care homes were being kept in hospital because they could not afford to pay the difference between the charges and the amount available through supplementary benefit.

It is a ludicrous position where, according to Counsel and Care for the Elderly, up to one third of the 50,400 elderly people in hospital geriatric wards want to leave, are fit to do so, but cannot afford nursing home care. Few private nursing homes charge less than £220 a week, compared with the latest limit for nursing home care of the elderly of £180. It leaves a weekly deficit for the patient or family of at least £40 or £50 a week, and most cannot find that sort of money. It is ludicrous to have such a policy when the cost borne by the state for a bed in a London geriatric ward is £300 to £320 a week, and when for an acute bed for patients who require more intensive nursing, the cost can be as much as £400 to £500 a week.

Another serious weakness in the Government's financial framework is that there is no funding for very short-stay care. The DHSS will not, for example, fund a weekend stay for severely dependent elderly relatives, even though the families caring for them often reach a crisis point and can continue, as we all wish them to do, only if respite care is covered in an emergency.

For all those reasons, the Opposition are highly critical of the morass of Government policy in which they are currently bogged down. Even within the Government's own terms of reference, which I have said we do not accept, it is self-defeating. Presumably even the Government are disturbed that the consequence of their policies on private homes is to force many of them into making economies in the standards of care provided, to refuse to admit elderly people who are dependent on supplementary benefit, to close high-cost homes—even if they are good — and to restrict plans for new development.

Even within their own policy framework the Government have so far failed to implement several of the recommendations of the joint central and local government working party report published last year. If the Government are determined to make private care a spearhead of their provision—that is their policy, not ours — they should set a negotiated rate that is less inflexible than a single national limit, even with the variant for central London. They should pay for pensioners who are mentally ill or physically disabled at the same rate as they pay for such persons under pension age. They should pay for people with multiple handicaps in residential homes at the same rate as they pay for similar levels of care in nursing homes. They should provide for topping up by local authorities for residents requiring high levels of care. They should pay for elderly people taken into residential care for short stays and at short notice to provide a break for carers under pressure.

All that is to remedy deficiencies in the application of current Government policy. Our real objection is that the policies are thoroughly misguided at root. Our policy involves a radical change of course. We believe, as a fundamental axiom, that care provision for the elderly should be determined by need and not by personal income or the adventitious availability of supplementary benefit. That has several implications.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Will the hon. Gentleman make it clear whether he supports the continued growth of private sector residential care for the elderly, or whether he wishes to see it shut down?

Mr. Meacher: If the hon. Lady listens to my remaining remarks, which will be brief, I think that she will hear the answer to that question. I recognise that it cannot be closed down. A large number of elderly people are in the private sector. However, I believe that it should not expand. For those who enter in future, I believe that access should be on the basis of need, where possible, and not on the basis of personal income, which tends to restrict it to the better off. Standards of supervision and inspection should be tighter.

Community care plans should be developed, based on the systematic identification of need, both among the elderly and other dependent groups in the community. Where access is determined by need, the public sector should be able to expand both residential and domiciliary care free of the present massive and artificial juggernaut of financial controls that inhibit the development of a rational and efficient system of community care.

Local authorities' assessment arrangements for admission to their own homes—this was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field)—should be extended to those claiming supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance for residential care in private homes. Only those genuinely in need of residential care would receive support. Savings could be used to finance alternative and more effective forms of community care.

Closer inspection and supervision of private homes is necessary to improve the quality of those that are substandard, to prevent abuses, skimped provision or actual maltreatment—I readily agree that this occurs in a small minority of cases—and to ensure that there is no excess profit rate per resident. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) intervened on that earlier.

There needs to be a fundamental redirecting of care. The Government's present policies are not targeted on need, they are a wasteful and inefficient distortion of the true function of supplementary benefit, and even within their own right they are counter-productive, because of public expenditure cuts, in excluding many elderly people for whom the provision is intended. The Government's obsession with the privatisation of care has turned out to be as defective and objectionable as the Fowler review's disastrous attempt to privatise welfare generally. The position must be reversed. It will be soon when the Government are overturned.

5.13 pm

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) for the way in which she introduced the debate and for her competent summary of the Select Committee's report. It is important for me to say that, and it is genuinely meant. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) said that all members of the Select Committee were, generally speaking, hon. Friends. I hope that that is the case. However, in view of the way our revered Chairman looks at me in Committee, I feel that she does not always regard me as an hon. Friend. Nevertheless, I believe that she introduced the debate in a competent and helpful way.

The jarring note that has been introduced into the debate by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) is unfortunate, because we have had a constructive debate so far. It seems that the hon. Gentleman is unable to stand at the Dispatch Box and be graceful or constructive about our proceedings.

In the comprehensive summary of the report by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East there were one or two nuances with which perhaps not all Committee members would agree. They may not agree with her interpretation of the contents of the report. Committee reports are so skilfully worded by our competent Clerks that a variety of interpretations is possible.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: It is important that the House should understand that the reports are not drawn up by Clerks. They are drawn up by Committee members. We, not the Clerks, are responsible for the wording of our reports. I hope that the House and those beyond the House realise that.

Mr. Galley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for correcting me on that important point. There are times when the skilful wording of the Clerks assists the Committee in coming to an agreed conclusion. One must recognise that fact.

The advantages that result from the present system have not been emphasised in the debate. One can understand the concerns about the conflict with community care policy that the present arrangements present. One cannot necessarily put a price on the important element of freedom of choice. The system that has developed over the past five or six years has meant a variety of provision that has provided a greater freedom of choice for many elderly people and has reduced pressure on the budgets and staff of many local authority social services departments. That freedom of choice should be encouraged.

Freedom of choice and value for money will be increasingly important because of the demographic pressures to which my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh so eloquently referred. It is clear that an integrated national cost limit system must be applied to residential care for the elderly. If such cost limits are set at a realistic level, with adequate flexibility for transitional arrangements and for special care additions, we should be able to obtain a balance so that the private sector is adequately reimbursed, no one milks the system, appropriate provision is made for the elderly, and variety is provided, by public and private sectors in partnership, to assist the elderly who require residential care.

The growth in the level of expenditure has rightly led to great concern about cost benefit analysis. There is a requirement for the protection of the elderly in residential care and at the same time for the safeguarding of taxpayers' money. That has led to sustained calls—we have heard echoes in the debate—for a co-ordinated system of assessment. The proposal appears to be for a multi-disciplinary approach involving social workers, the DHSS and other appropriate voluntary or statutory agencies, with the objective that local authorities should, in essence, determine whether people in private residential homes should be eligible for supplementary benefit support.

[Mr. Galley]

I must inform the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), that I have qualms about a comprehensive assessment proposal such as that under consideration. It is one of the main recommendations from the joint central and local government working party. It will introduce a bureaucratic straitjacket and mean that people will need a local authority ticket for a residential place. That would restrict freedom of choice, unless people could afford their residential places.

Some people choose to live in a residential home because they want to be looked after, and they can afford to pay for it. Others, who are unable to pay, would need local authority approval before being able to take a residential place. A tight assessment system, such as has been suggested, would reduce the latter group's freedom of choice, so it would be somewhat discriminatory.

There may also be problems for people who could initially afford a residential place but whose funds became exhausted. They would then have to be assessed for supplementary benefit purposes before being given support. The proposed assessment system would produce several anomalies.

It must be possible, within an integrated national system, to cope with the needs of the elderly and to preserve existing choice. We must equate more clearly the rules for supplementary benefit support in private and local authority accommodation. That especially applies to the rules on capital. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh rightly emphasised that we must treat fairly people who are elderly and handicapped vis-a-vis those who are younger and handicapped. We do not need complete local authority control of residential care.

It is important, however, that local authorities should have and should develop a role in monitoring accommodation and standards of care in the private sector, as happens now, but we need a coherent and consistent pattern of inspection. It is, however, unacceptable that some local authorities, perhaps as a result of hostility to the private sector, operate needlessly exacting standards, which are often much higher than are applied to their own accommodation, for private sector provision.

There are sometimes differences between one local authority and another in the standards required of residential homes even in adjacent areas. The same is true of nursing homes and the involvement of health authorities in their inspection. There may well be a case for a more independent inspection body covering residential and nursing homes than the public provider of residential care inspecting private providers.

The high level of residential care provision which is funded by supplementary benefit highlights the dangers of an oversimplified analysis of expenditure trends. I hope that the Select Committee's report avoids any such oversimplification. Much of the increased support for elderly residential care has transferred some local authority personal social services expenditure to the social security budget, although it is difficult to assess how much. If the money had been allocated to personal social services, local authorities might have been able to choose to spend it in other ways, but much of it would have had to be spent on services for the elderly simply because of demographic pressures.

If we analyse projections of personal social services expenditure, we have to take that factor into account. Taking crude social service expenditure figures and arguing that it has not increased sufficiently is nonsense if no regard is paid to the fact that a substantial part of the £280 million of social security spending is on residential care. Figures for social services expenditure in the Select Committee's fourth report must be seen in that light.

Such considerations also emphasise the need for the Department, when presenting its figures to the Select Committee, to demonstrate the interconnecting elements of its budget provision. That applies to the relationship not just between personal social services and social security, but also between hospital services, family practitioner services, social security, personal social services and the implications of many of those heads of expenditure for community care. The simplistic number crunching in which many people have recently indulged is not an adequate guide to what is happening in residential care or in any of the DHSS's other areas of responsibility.

There must be a more sophisticated approach. We must consider how many patients are treated, how many have the advantages of residential care and how service provision is improved. The present variety of service provision and the methods of funding it is to be encouraged and cherished rather than condemned, as it has been by some hon. Members today.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) and her Committee on this timely report on a matter of growing concern to hon. Members of all parts of the House. The problem affects us in our constituencies. None of us can escape the present demographic changes and the problem of how to help the elderly population.

In another context I have drawn the attention of the House to how the problem was brought home to me in my constituency. When I first entered Parliament 12 years ago, all but two of the 36 residents in the old people's home in my constituency were able to go for a walk down to the village, for example, to buy tobacco, newspapers and sweets. Only two were stuck in the home. Now, all but two are bound to the home.

That change reflects what has happened in the community. The population has aged and local authority homes for them have undertaken a function which used to be undertaken by geriatric wards in hospitals. Those wards are now cram-packed and cannot cope. The pressure had to be relieved in some way. The growth in the number of private homes is a response to that pressure, which has developed since 1978. A financing mechanism in response to that pressure has also become available.

If Ministers had been told in 1978 or 1979 that the cost of providing private residential care through the supplementary benefit system would increase from £6 million in 1978 to £280 million now, I am sure that they would have had apoplexy, just as they do now when we say that such money is needed to help with care in the community policies. We advanced that argument in our debates on the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill.

It is right that we should ask how the money is being spent and whether it is being spent in the most effective way. Paragraph 40 of the Select Committee report says that from 1980-81 to 1984-85 there needed to be a 2 per cent. per annum growth in personal social services expenditure, but that there was only a 3·4 per cent. growth in real terms during the five-year period. Paragraph 41 says:

"Sixty-four local authorities fell short of this target, so in three authorities out of every five, there is reason for concern about the adequacy of the growth of provision."

That translates into the balance of places in homes.

If we consider the figures for local authority homes, we see that in 1979 there were 129,000 places. That figure increased to 135,000 in 1984—a relatively small increase given the tremendously increased pressure in this sector. In the voluntary sector the number of places has increased from 37,000 to 43,000, which is a slightly greater proportion of growth, but is still relatively small. The number of places in private homes has almost doubled, from 34,000 to 66,000. This shows how the problem has been met by using the supplementary benefit system, and perhaps using it in a manner that was not thoroughly considered when the changes took place. The proportion of places in private homes or based on supplementary benefit increased from 15 per cent. to more than 40 per cent. during that period. That underlines the problem.

We all know the range of problems faced by the private homes in our constituencies. North Wales is a beautiful area, and it is easy for someone who has been a car mechanic in Liverpool and has been made redundant to open a home for elderly people in a beautiful part of Gwynedd. Some people have done it well, without any experience, but the standards of homes, to say the least, are variable. I have grave doubts whether some of them should have been allowed to open. A problem arises from the mushrooming of homes in, for example, seaside towns. Substantial pressure is then put on the social services departments and on the health authorities in those areas.

A similar problem has been reported to me of an elderly person who went into a private home as a relatively able-bodied person and was then taken seriously ill, taken to hospital, and the private home did not want him back. Inevitably, that situation will arise in some private homes. Whether it is stated in such specific terms is another matter. There is a danger of some people feeling insecure. I acknowledge and accept that homes for elderly people in the private sector play a role in a balanced community, provided that they meet the necessary standards, which must include the provision that when an elderly person enters a home, that is his home. We do not kick elderly people out of our domestic homes. We do not throw out a grandmother or an uncle when they become ill because they are too much of a burden. Illness cannot be accepted as a burden in private homes for the elderly.

Sir David Price: Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the problem to which he draws the attention of the House also exists in part III accommodation? Many of us have had experience of people who have been in hospital, especially in a geriatric ward, for any length of time having their places in part III accommodation filled because of the demand for it. It is difficult to get them out of the geriatric hospital and back into alternative part III accommodation. That applies across the public and private sectors.

Mr. Wigley: I accept that it is a problem. The problem also arises on the other side. When elderly people go into hospital, the hospital often wants to move them out without there being any proper facilities for them to go to. They are moved like ping-pong balls backwards and forwards. We all know of such cases. The elderly patient's relatives come to us and say, "What can you do to help this person who has become ill or disabled and who is caught in that position?"

I have no doubt that the public policy subscribed to by the Government and by other parties in the House to try to maximise care in the community is right for that reason. The most helpful way of catering for people is to have flexible support services that can be built up as necessary to help the carers in their homes and their family environment.

The Ernst and Whinney report mentions problems with standards. How do we measure standards? I should mention the costings on which the places in private homes are based. In the Ernst and Whinney report, the cost per place in determining the supplementary benefit ceiling has been based on the shared room concept, but the January 1986 circular issued by the Government, entitled "Residential Homes — Guidance on Standards of Accommodation" which makes a cross-reference to the code of practice entitled "Home Life" states:

"While most current and future residents will prefer single bedsitting rooms, some double occupancy rooms may still be needed, for example for married couples."

The emphasis is on single rooms. That defines the standard. It worries me that the supplementary benefit figures have been based on costings for shared rooms. A problem exists there which the Government have not fully addressed.

The Social Services Select Committee, probably referring to evidence submitted by the parliamentary panel on personal social services, drew attention to the spread of cost and the tremendous range of costs for old people. The Committee mentions figures from £51 to more than £200. That highlights the differences. How does one obtain a measuring rod for what is proper value and a proper standard with that enormous spread of costs? It is a problem that we have not properly addressed, but we must. We must find a way of setting up a flexible system that caters for disabled and severely disabled people.

In a recent statement on the uprating of the board and lodging allowances, the Minister acknowledged the special needs of some groups of people over pension age, through the creation of new categories of payments. However, he did not extend this recommendation of need to those under pension age. The limit for those people remains at £180, without even an uprating to allow for inflation.

The Spastics Society has underlined the problem that it faces when it tries to help such people through direct provision. It said in a letter to me:

"For many younger multiply handicapped people £180 still falls far short of meeting the costs of their care. The Spastics Society is increasingly working with this group of more profoundly handicapped people whose needs were not recognised in the past when there was no alternative to large institutional care."

The fee in Spastics Society units is about £300 a week.

We need a system that allows for variable costs. The Government have responded to representations by the Spastics Society and suggested dual registration. For social reasons the Spastics Society does not wish to accept a dual registration system. The society suggests that the answer might be for more profoundly handicapped people to be able to claim the nursing home rate without having to live in nursing care. When the Minister replies to the debate, I hope that he will respond to that proposal, which has been with his Department for several weeks. He knows the difficulty faced by the Spastics Society, and I hope that he can respond to the specific and practical suggestion that it has made.

In Wales, with the all-Wales policy for integrating mentally handicapped people into the community, we are witnessing developments in community care. We have recognised especially the need for close liaison between the providers of services, whether they are the health authorities, the local social services departments or the voluntary sector. For that reason, I respond warmly to some of the recommendations made in the report. Recommendation 31 states:

"we recommend that the Government analyse closely the interaction between health service finance, local government finance and social security with a view to ensuring that joint planning does not founder because of inadequate knowledge by one sector of government of the implications of its actions on community care projects and on the joint planning process."

That is very important. The more that we see in Wales and in other areas where progress has been made in that context, the more we become aware of a need to move in that direction.

We are faced with some difficult decisions if we wish to obtain a finely tuned system which maximises choice, which maintains standards and freedom, which ensures that provision is made on a community-based level wherever possible and which is neutral and does not push people in certain directions. I spoke a moment ago about freedom of choice, and that is something we need. It should not lead families to dump old people in semi-institutional care. We should maximise choice. Side by side with supplementary benefit payments we should consider how such services can be financed in the community.

This report must be considered in the context of our debates on the Social Security Bill and the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill, and the debate on care in the community that we had a few months ago. As has been suggested by several hon. Members today, the care element should be considered over and above, and aside from, the board and lodging element. That may be the way forward. The care element should be flexible and be directed appropriately. Whether a person is living in his own home and maintained by carers in the community, in a private home, or in a local authority home, additional resources should be made available to meet the needs of caring. In answer to the point made by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price), I should say that flexibility might encourage people to keep places for those who may become more profoundly disabled as years go by.

I hope that the Government will take on board some of the very important points made by the Committee and that the debate will not end at 7 o'clock without some progress having been made.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). He made a most constructive and helpful contribution. It is rather sad that the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), did not set a similar example. Setting aside the party political polemic, the prejudice and the dogma in his comments, he put forward some sensible ideas which merit consideration by the House and by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State who will respond to the debate.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Caernarfon on his useful contribution, which highlighted some important areas of concern. Since being elected as the hon. Member for Macclesfield in 1971, I have visited the part III homes in my constituency at least once, and sometimes twice, each year to see exactly what is happening and to hear from the staff and the residents. Therefore, as a member of the Select Committee on Social Services, I am well aware of the opinions of residents of part III homes and of the problems faced by the staff of county residential homes.

The hon. Gentleman was also right to say that in recent years the health and condition of the people living in part III hopes has dramatically changed. I served for six years on Warwickshire county council and used to visit part III homes in that county. The majority of elderly residents were mobile; very few, if any, were incontinent; and none was doubly incontinent. The position has changed dramatically during the past 20 years, because, of course, the people who are now residents of our part III homes were 20 years younger then, and they are now very elderly. I do not think that I will mislead the House if I estimate that in part III homes in Macclesfield two thirds of the residents are singly incontinent, and quite a high proportion of them are probably doubly incontinent. Those part III homes were not designed for people needing that level of care, who, because of their health, place an immense burden of care on the staff who work in the social services departments of the county councils.

We are faced with an increasingly difficult and complex problem. I agree with the hon. Member for Oldham, West that perhaps the supplementary benefit eligibility for entering a private or voluntary residential nursing home should be based upon need, not just upon the availability of resources for that person. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) also picked up that point. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will turn his attention to this matter in his reply.

If I may be parochial—perhaps it is not inappropriate to be parochial in the House occasionally—I shall refer to the importance of the elderly in my area. The elderly top the housing list of Macclesfield borough council. Of the 3,400 on housing waiting lists, 1,125 are elderly people requiring specialist accommodation specifically constructed for them. I highlight that statistic to show the level of concern about this matter in many areas of the country, not least in my area, which is a progressive area where the number of elderly people is increasing dramatically. That places increasing burdens upon the hospital facilities required for geriatric accommodation, and produces a requirement for the building of more specialist accommodation, and for more domiciliary care.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West raised an important issue when he said that we must ensure that more specialist staff are available to help people to remain in their own homes. I agree with that.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon was the first in the debate to highlight the position of carers in our society —those who look after elderly relatives—who take it as their personal and voluntary responsibility to look after someone they have known for many years who has become extremely old and needs to be looked after at home. Those people have taken a great responsibility upon their shoulders, removing a considerable cost which otherwise would have fallen upon the state. I hope that additional resources can be directed towards carers, who play a unique and most valuable role. The hon. Gentleman has done the House a service by raising that matter so clearly.

Some Opposition Members have implied criticism of the private and voluntary sectors and of their role in making provision for the elderly in our society. That is unfortunate, because it is appropriate that the private sector should put capital into the provision of accommodation for the elderly, whether it is straightforward residential accommodation or specialist nursing accommodation.

In my constituency—experience is perhaps helpful in debates such as this — there is good co-operation between the social services district offices of Cheshire county council, covering the Macclesfield area, and those who run private residential and nursing homes. I readily admit to Opposition Members that there has been a considerable growth in the number of both private residential homes and private nursing homes in my constituency. I balance that by saying that the majority of the proprietors worked previously in the public sector, establishing a fine reputation for the quality of the care that they gave the people in their charge in part III or similar institutions and homes. They are now transferring that care and expertise to the private sector and providing much money to open homes of the highest standard. The public and private sectors can work together to provide the widest range of good quality residential and nursing home accommodation for the elderly.

I think that the Government are open to some criticism. It is clear that they were taken slightly by surprise by the growth in the number of homes and the amount of money that is being spent through supplementary benefit on meeting the costs of those who are in private residential homes and private nursing homes. We should not seek to reduce the number of private residential homes or private nursing homes. Indeed, I should like to see their numbers further expanded so that they can be complementary to the continuing growth of part III and other specialist accommodation in the public sector. They should work together to a common end and objective.

Mr. Frank Field: Unfortunately, I did not hear the beginning of the hon. Gentleman's speech. He will understand why we are all so busy today. He has said that he wants an expansion of the private sector. Presumably he wants that for those who need the service that that will provide and not for those who are put into homes by their families.

Mr. Winterton: I greatly respect the hon. Gentleman's expertise in these matters. He and I often find ourselves on the same side of the argument. I said earlier that I agreed with the sensible argument of the hon. Member for Oldham, West — it was hidden within the political polemics, dogma and prejudice — that eligibility for supplementary benefit for a person to go to a home should be based to a greater extent upon need and not merely on the resources that might be available. That is important, and my hon. Friend the Minister has said that he will be dealing in some detail with this issue.

I regularly visit private nursing homes and residential homes in my constituency, such as Pott Hall nursing home near Bollington and Bryher house residential home, as well as part III homes. I believe that the standards of care, facilities and expertise are extremely high. However, if there are to be private homes as a result of people putting up private capital, they should be properly inspected and carefully licensed before they are allowed to take the elderly, those who require specialist care, the mentally ill, the disabled and the severely handicapped, or whatever other category, and care for them, and they should be regularly and closely monitored.

As the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) knows, because of his expertise, it is easy to open a home with high standards, but unless the home is run properly and is carefully administered and there is proper supervision by those who know what they are doing, standards can quickly deteriorate. Those who go to a private home can be pleased initially with what they are given, but they may find quickly thereafter that they are not getting value for money. The care that they receive may be worse than that which was available to them in their own homes, where they were lonely, before their application for a place in a residential home or nursing home was accepted.

Unfortunately, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) is not in her place. The hon. Lady chairs the Select Committee on Social Services with great decorum and distinction. If my memory serves me correctly, she has chaired the Committee and its predecessor Committees for about 16 years. I have been pleased to serve under her—I had better rephrase that. I have been privileged to serve with the hon. Lady on the Committee for about 12 years. We have established the sort of rapport, co-operation and understanding that was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley).

The Select Committee on Social Services is perhaps the least glamorous of all the Select Committees, but I am not being immodest when I say that it is one of the most important, if not the most important, of all the Select Committees. Those who serve on it work exceedingly hard. They are backed by excellent staff and by equally excellent advisers who assist from time to time with our more important inquiries.

The Committee was told that £280 million was spent in 1985 on private and voluntary residential care for the elderly, and I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us that the sum will be greater this year. It will probably be well in excess of £300 million. In the main, that is money well spent. With the rapid growth of expenditure in this area, however, the Government must monitor spending much more closely and have a more sensible and rational policy on the allocation of resources. At the same time, there must be the sort of flexibility that was referred to by the hon. Member for Caernarfon. On whichever side of the Chamber we may sit, we must surely have one common objective—to provide the very best accommodation and the most expert and caring care for the elderly who need to resort to residential or nursing home accommodation. Surely that must be a shared objective.

Much mention has been made of community care, a subject about which I feel fervently. On Saturday, I shall preside at the opening of a large garden fete at Parkside hospital in my constituency, which cares for the mentally ill. Over many years it has established the highest reputation for the care which it gives to those suffering from mental illness. Some of those people have been there for practically the whole of their lives, which means several decades. The hospital, in the form which we know it, is threatened with closure. The health authority has suggested that it will replace it with two hostels for the mentally ill.

Community care is vital, and let us try to keep those who are handicapped, such as the mentally ill or the mentally handicapped, in their homes if we can do that by providing the right accommodation and properly qualified and appropriately skilled staff, but let us not put people out into the community merely to close a mental hospital or psychiatric hospital so that the hospital can be sold and we can realise capital assets by making the site available for building. We may put people into hostels, and some may be suitable for them, but what about the specialist facilities that are provided within hospitals? I have in mind sheltered workshops, hydrotherapy pools and other specialist facilities and accommodation. These things cannot be provided within a hostel complex. I hope that all hospital authorities will consider carefully what they are doing before fine hospitals are closed and lost for ever. There will always be a limited number of places required in long-stay hospitals for those who suffer from the more acute forms of schizophrenia, and we have all seen on television horrific documentary programmes about schizophrenics. This topic is close to my heart and I shall be making a plea publicly on Saturday at Parkside hospital that the authorities in my area——

Mr. Frank Field: The press are in the Gallery.

Mr. Winterton: I am not worried about those who are not in the Chamber. I shall make the plea that the authorities will consider the long-term needs of those who require refuge and 24-hours-a-day hospital care.

The Select Committee has presented a good report and it merits a considered response from my hon. Friend the Minister. I am confident that we shall get it. I think that we are united in our objective for the elderly, and I hope that the Government will give us some reassurances this evening.

5.58 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): It is a pleasure to speak after the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), and that shows how deeply hon. Members on both sides of the House care about the disabled, the weak, the infirm and those who cannot look after themselves. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) on the report and on the work that she has undertaken for so long on behalf of such people.

This issue is both important and highly volatile. The problem will not go away, but will rather increase. Without any shadow of doubt, people will continue to live longer as more facilities and medical services are provided, and that is, of course, only right. At one time, every family strove to look after its young and elderly. Now, however, families are often split up, either because a husband has had to travel the length and breadth of the country to find work or because he has had to follow up work that he has already undertaken. Thus, we must consider not only the problems outlined by the hon. Member for Macclesfield, but also the future.

When I was chairman of housing, I looked at this problem together with architects and planners. We found that often those who might want to care for their parents were unable to do so, because they lacked the facilities. Consequently, I believe that we must plan and must think of creating space for granny flats. Some countries plan for the time when the children will have to care for their parents. Accordingly, they design their houses so that accommodation can be added on at a later date, enabling the parents to live their lives while allowing the children to do so, too. Of course, it also means that the parents are cared for.

The Yorkshire Post highlighted some of the problems to be found in certain private accommodation. It would be wrong to take a broad-brush approach and to condemn private accommodation as a whole. But, according to the report, there are areas of concern which I believe the House should consider. I also believe that we should reinforce the inspection arrangements undertaken by local authorities, or by local authorities acting in conjunction with the health authorities in some areas. According to the report in the Yorkshire Post, there must be constant vigilance to ensure that things are right. If we are to adapt to the increase in the number of elderly people, we must give them confidence in how private or part III accommodation is built and run.

I have no doubts about my local authority. Regular inspections are carried out not only by officers but by councillors. Councillors are encouraged to make regular visits to their part III accommodation. I visit part III accommodation, and only last Saturday I went to one of the homes. I got great pleasure from that home's oldest resident who had been there for more than 12 years. That resident congratulated those who care for the residents on their standards of cleanliness, on the food that was provided and on the care that had been shown. Indeed, in general, even better standards probably result from such expressions of thanks.

I greatly admire those who look after the elderly. They are very special people. However, sometimes general hospitals inadvertently act as homes. Those, in particular, who have no relatives will not be turned out of a general hospital even if they are taking up a valuable bed simply because the next stage, the geriatric hospital, is full and there is no part III accommodation.

Hon. Members must consider carefully the policy of care in the community. If we can build the facilities needed for care in the community, people will be far better off in the community than in part III accommodation, or in any home, however good it is.

Will the Minister give an assurance that he will consider those points? Will he also give an assurance that the report in the Yorkshire Post will not be put on one side but will be investigated? I hope either that things will be put right, or that the investigation will show that there was no substance to the report. But some investigation is necessary for the confidence and well-being of those in the area.

6.5 pm

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I am no longer a member of the Select Committee, and this year I did not have the privilege of being involved in the report on the expenditure Estimates. But it is clear that, yet again, the Committee has done good work and I am glad that we are debating this subject today.

Statements about the growth in the expenditure involved and in the number of those receiving this form of supplementary benefit have been well rehearsed. Paragraph 70 of the report states that the cost of payments to elderly people increased from £6 million in 1978 to an estimated £280 million last year. The number of recipients also increased from 7,000 in 1978 to 42,000 in 1984, and the average payment increased from £15·70 to £88 per week in 1984. One cannot go any further than that, because no one knows how many people receive that benefit or what its current cost is. But my guess is that the figure for the number of recipients may well have doubled during the past two years to 80,000, and that the suggested figure of £300 million is probably a very conservative estimate. If it has not yet reached £500 million, I should be most surprised.

When my husband and I were house-hunting in my constituency during the summer and autumn of 1983, we looked at several large houses. Nearly all of them have now been taken over and have received planning permission for use as private old people's homes. Indeed, I now have the considerable pleasure of visiting them and opening them at the rate of approximately one a month. I am delighted to note the standard of care that they offer. Those involved have certainly made a much better job of renovating the properties than I and my family would have done. I have no doubt that they are doing a first-class job, and I am glad to put that on the record.

I had intended to comment on the speech made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), but I am bereft; my quarry has flown. He has scuttled off to have his tea. Perhaps that is the greatest compliment that he could pay me, but——

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) has, to my certain knowledge, an engagement outside the Chamber. Before he left, he told me that he greatly regretted that it was unavoidable. I know that he would particularly regret being unable to hear what my hon. Friend wanted to say to him.

Mrs. Currie: I am even more astonished that my own Minister should apologise on the hon. Gentleman's behalf, but there we are. It shows what an honourable and decent gentleman my hon. Friend the Minister is.

I listened to the comments and criticisms of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, and waited in vain for a word of congratulation on the tremendous growth in expenditure, which has done so much to help many more people and which helps to care for such a large proportion of our elderly people. I could not figure out whether the hon. Gentleman was in favour of that growth in expenditure and wanted it to be increased, or whether he was agin it, and would like to cut it out entirely. That is why I asked him about his attitude to private residential care. I was interested in what he said. He said that he understood that private homes could not all be closed, but that he believed that the private residential care sector should not expand. That is what he said, and I understood him to mean that the Labour party might have a policy of freezing all places and of keeping the number at its present level. I also understood him to mean that no more such homes should open and that there might be a ban on giving planning permission to any such future homes.

Perhaps one of the Labour Members present can tell me whether the hon. Member for Oldham, West had authority to say all that, or whether he was thinking on his feet. If he did not have any authority to say that, does he intend to return at some future stage to say that private residential care should be expanded—something which I would welcome—or that such homes should be closed? I suspect that the latter is what he would like, if he had half a chance.

It is also worth pointing out that the Select Committee confirmed something that Government Members have believed for some time: that it is the DHSS rate of benefit which sets the level of prices and rents charged. In paragraph 72 of its report the Select Committee discussed the history of this benefit. The paragraph says:

"landlords raised their prices to meet the limits."

Hon. Members will remember the many occasions when Government Members have said that that was exactly what was happening, that if levels of benefit are increased the rents and charges will go up. Opposition Members said no, that could not happen and that the charges accurately reflected the absolute necessity to pay amounts of that sort. Of course it happens, and the DHSS is at last aware of it. I am glad that the Select Committee has confirmed it in such a competent and efficient way.

I am worried about the increased dependence of the private system on state funding. I should like to quote some figures from the parliamentary panel on personal social services, covering the period from 1979 to 1984. It says:

"while private provision has nearly doubled, supplementary benefit payments have increased 20-fold."

As a result, the percentage of the independent sector financed through supplementary benefit has increased from about 14 per cent. in 1978 to 40 per cent. in 1984. My guess is that that figure must now be over half and may be as much as two thirds of the private sector. Certainly most of the growth in the last couple of years must have been financed substantially by the state supplementary benefit system.

I am never happy when I see a private profit-making industry, however competent, drawing most of its revenue from the state, especially when that percentage is rising so sharply. The Government now face a substantial and well organised pressure group which did not exist before. It has been sending papers to the hon. Member for Oldham, West which he busily read out. That will make it difficult to do what the hon. Member for Oldham, West wants to do, which is to stop any further growth.

My hon. Friends will know that I support almost any effort to reduce the burden of social security. I read for the first time in connection with this debate the booklet entitled "Supply Estimates 1986-87". There are some nuggets in there about how we might do something to reduce expenditure while improving the quality of care. We are talking about residential care, and I should like to mention one item of expenditure. It is only £3·5 million but it is quite interesting and is contained in page 24 at section G2.

The section says that we provide maintenance and treatment for about 59 severely disturbed children and young persons at two national residential centres. It costs us £3,672,000 a year. That works out at £62,000 per child per year, or more than £1,000 per week. I know those two centres. They are St. Charles in Essex and Glenthorne in Birmingham. If the DHSS would like to improve the quality of care that it is giving to young people and save some money on residential care, that is obviously something that it could have a go at. Local authorities pay about £1·5 million back into the kitty and that simply means that the cost to the Exchequer is reduced to about £30,000 per child per year. On that basis, we could buy Eton, let alone buy places at Eton for the children concerned, and they might be whacked into some kind of shape. That is one example that I commend to my hon. Friends.

My hon. Friends also know about the problem posed for these Estimates by the fact that the increasing numbers of elderly people will get worse. I listened to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) and I found it very moving and accurate. He said that the demand for residential care was bound to grow. The Minister of State said the same thing to the Select Committee and was quoted by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood).

The numbers are quite frightening in many ways. In 1961 we had fewer than 2 million people aged between 75 and 84 and barely 250,000 over the age of 85. By 1996, in 10 years' time, we will have 3 million people aged between 75 and 84 and 1 million aged over 85. Together they will form 7 per cent. of the population. We all know that that is happening because those people are here now. Some of them are sitting in the Chamber and I hope that they will achieve this great age. A number of them form a substantial majority in the other place and give excellent service to the nation. I hope to join those numbers of elderly when the time comes.

Mr. Frank Field: Is not the hon. Lady being slightly unfair to the other place? Surely that is a model for the type of local authority home that we ought to have in every district. It has a speaking room, a sleeping room and an eating room. There are no nurses in white coats, only people in black suits and the residents are called my Lord and my Lady and they live for ever. That is not something to be abolished but something to be spread throughout the nation.

Mrs. Currie: That is a well-put point. They are also a great deal more with it and modern than we are in this House, having insisted that their proceedings should be televised—and a very good job they do of it.

We all know about these figures and quote them. They are in all the reports, but is anybody planning to listen on the basis of what these figures really mean? Is the Treasury listening? Are the figures being built in? According to the Select Committee report, the DHSS managed to get it wrong to the tune of over £1 billion this year. That makes one wonder whether the DHSS is listening. I am aware that the statistics, according to the Select Committee, on which a great deal of DHSS planning is done are a little inadequate. I understand from paragraph 67 that the latest available data relate to 1981 and that the DHSS has problems with the 1983 family expenditure survey, but it is worth reflecting what those increases in numbers mean. This budget and this group of Estimates which are causing such headaches in the DHSS could have been foreseen and will continue to grow.

It is the same in other parts of the public services. The elderly use nine to 10 times as much of the National Health Service as fit younger people. Is that factor being built in? If it is not, that helps us to understand why the tremendous real increase in expenditure on the National Health Service —the figures that the Prime Minister quoted on the radio this morning — seems to vanish into thin air. It is because the people using the Health Service are not the same people as they used to be and their requirements are now quite different.

My hon. Friends on the Front Bench know that I have been one of those calling for an assessment system for the people gaining admission to the private homes and who are able to claim supplementary benefit. If we are to achieve our dual objectives in this field — to cope with the increasing numbers of old people with some dignity and give them the right and opportunity to live in some comfort and at the same time to keep the budget under control — the budget cannot be demand-led and unrestricted for much longer. We are not being unkind when we say this because this rapid growth deprives other elderly and disabled people who may well be in much greater need. I deeply resented the remarks of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, who said that such things as home helps and meals on wheels are not Government priorities. They are Government priorities and we have seen rapid expansion in both services under Conservative Governments and Conservative councils.

The key is to ensure that the people receiving the funds that we are debating are in both financial and physical need. Some assessment system has to be devised which does more than look at their financial requirements. The DHSS will have to develop a system under which it can say no and can say to the fit and active 60-year-old, "No, you do not need to live in an old people's home and if you do we will not pay for it until such time as you need it."

Mr. Allen McKay: Would the hon. Lady turn the argument round and say that we should also provide sufficient money to local authorities to enable them to build more aged people's homes so that people would have to come out of their three and four-bedroom houses and would not need to go into part III accommodation?

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood me a little, and if it is my fault, I apologise. I do not particularly want to see a growth in council-run homes. I do not mind who runs the homes, as long as they are well run, and I do not mind who pays for the homes, as long as when it is the state—which it is increasingly and, I suspect, to the tune of rather more than half the amount that is going into the private sector — we should have some say as to whom the money goes to and as long as there is some recognition of need. I should be perfectly happy if all the homes were run by the private sector. If they could be run to the same standards of quality as those in South Derbyshire, that would be absolutely marvellous.

Mr. McKay: Perhaps I may put the hon. Lady right. I was not referring to who provides the accommodation; I was referring to bungalows for the aged. They would enable those who are now living in three-and four-bedroomed houses to move into smaller dwellings and still live in the community and care for themselves, which they cannot do while they are living in three-or four-bedroomed houses.

Mrs. Currie: I agree entirely. If the hon. Gentleman ever has time to look at my record as housing chairman in Birmingham, he will find that that is exactly what I did.

I call attention to one sentence in paragraph 75 of the Select Committee's report. The Committee did not highlight this sentence, but it sums up everything that has been said in this debate. It says:

"A clear national policy for the support of the elderly inside and outside residential care must be devised."

That is absolutely right. I have complete faith that the Government and the Ministers who are on the Treasury Bench today will devise such a policy, and I call upon them to do it as soon as possible.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Many hon. Members will know that Martin Gilbert created a cottage industry by producing many volumes on different aspects of the life of Winston Churchill. One of those volumes records the fact that when visitors who had been invited to Chartwell approached the summer-house in the garden to greet Churchill they heard the grand old man say, "Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to be called today." I did not expect to be called today. However, I want to put four points to the Minister, although I did not rehearse them in my summer-house at Chartwell before I came to the House.

First, will the Minister respond to the pleas from both sides of the House that access to old people's homes should be controlled? I am not asking that question, as the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) emphasised, only because of concern about rising costs and the contribution made by the taxpayer. I am asking it because I believe that old people's homes are meant for those who are unable to survive in the community and that access should be limited to them. Both sides of the House have suggested that local authorities would be in a good position to determine who should have access to them.

The Minister probably expects Opposition Members, if not Conservative Members, to say that local authorities would find it difficult to undertake that task if they were not provided with additional staff. Considerable savings can be made if money is moved from one Department to another. In this case, money would be moved from the Department of Health and Social Security to the local authorities. Given that there is all-party agreement, I hope that the Minister will have something positive to say about that when he replies to the debate.

Secondly, in his typically powerful way, the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) referred to the need to check the standards of this form of service. He drew a distinction between the need to ensure that somebody can provide a service and what can happen to that service over a period if we as a community do not keep a friendly eye on it.

I am not making a plea for a form of police force. Although all hon. Members can point with considerable pride to the local authority and private sector services in their areas, I guess that many of us are worried about the services that are provided by some of those who have newly entered the field. This is partly because some people want to make a quick buck, but in other cases people are unaware of the correct standards and how they can be maintained over a period.

Sir David Price: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with my suggestion that the DHSS should develop an inspectorate along the lines of Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools, which has a positive role to play?

Mr. Field: I did not expect to be called today, but I made a note to refer to that point if I was called. I have not heard that suggestion before. My thinking has been typically local authority dominated, but the suggestion is valuable. Although the hon. Gentleman did not refer to it in his speech, I am sure that we have all grasped the point that if an inspectorate can cross local authority boundaries it will pick up the best practice and the worst practice in different local authorities, whereas a single local authority has only its own area from which to build up its expertise.

I hope that the Minister will refer to the need to maintain the standard of care that is provided for frail and sometimes confused old people. Clearly they are vulnerable because of their confusion and frailty. Furthermore, as the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South said, a large amount of public money is now being directed to this area. Therefore, we ought to ensure that the money is spent in a way that would make us happy if we were residents in any of these homes, of if members of our family were resident in them.

Thirdly, I hope that the Minister will answer the point made by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) about the attendance allowance. He criticised the fact that the rules governing the use of the attendance allowance to help to pay for the total cost of a stay in a home have been changed. I disagree with him about that. I thought that it was a sensible change. It did not lead to taxation of the benefit. It provided that if the charge made by the home was higher than that which would be covered by supplementary benefit, the attendance allowance should be taken into account. That is reasonable. What is completely unreasonable is that when that change was made many of our constituents had their attendance allowance, or part of it, taken into account for the first time in meeting the cost of their place in an old people's home. The rest of the allowance was frozen or, more accurately, was lost. When the next round of increases in charges took place, that part of the amount that had been frozen was not unfrozen. This is a particularly important point to which I hope the Minister will respond.

In Birkenhead, the lawyer who works with me and who has caused the Government so much good trouble, Nick Warren, took the case of one of my constituents to a tribunal. The tribunal ruled that the Government were behaving unlawfully. The first messages from the Department were slightly cocky. The Department said that it would challenge that ruling. However, it has not done so, for the simple reason that it now thinks that it would lose. As the Department does not believe that it could get the decision overturned, does it not have a duty to consider whether all those in old people's homes who have claimed attendance allowance but who have had most of it frozen, and who have therefore lost it, ought to be treated more equitably and fairly, as my Birkenhead constituent is being treated because the Department lost its case before an independent tribunal?

My last point is perhaps the most fundmental. We cannot expect the Minister to undo what has happened since 1980, but many of us must be unhappy that we have seen an increase in expenditure from the DHSS when, under other circumstances, one would have expected to see that expenditure from the local authority, even if that local authority was spending money in private provision as well as providing within the local authority sector. It undermines the Government's position when they regularly tell us that they cannot expect the DHSS to pay students money because that is an education function, yet they are paying large sums of money—it may be £500 million, as the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South said —under the guise of supplementary benefit. That is a payment of allowances to people in the community, but we are talking about people who cannot live in the community and are covered by the provisions of an old people's home, whether private of public.

I end where many other hon. Members began, by thanking the Select Committee for producing this report. Like so many other of its reports, it is valuable. The subject that we have been discussing touches on a growing number of our constituents who, because of their frailty and age, are least able to look after and protect their interests. For that reason, if for no other, we are grateful to the Select Committee.

6.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. John Major): This is an important and wide-ranging subject, and the quality of the debate this afternoon has reflected that very well.

I take my grace note from the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and others by congratulating the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) on introducing the Select Committee report, and on the manner and style in which she did so. I thank her also for her courtesy in making available earlier this week an advance extract on "Private and Voluntary Residential Care for the Elderly" from the Select Committee on Social Services report, which was published this morning. That was most helpful as it was the staple core of the debate, and I am extremely grateful.

A number of highly relevant matters have been raised this afternoon, as they were in the Select Committee report, and I shall endeavour to respond to as many as possible. It is entirely appropriate that our discussions should be based on an estimate of expenditure because, as both the Select Committee and almost every hon. Member who has spoken have commented, there has been a dramatic increase in cost for supplementary payments for residential and nursing homes and care in recent years. There is a variety of reasons for this, some of which were touched on. They are the increasing numbers of elderly people, the rising age profile, greater knowledge of entitlement to supplementary benefit, which has played an important part, and the availability in recent years of the supplementary benefit payments.

There is no doubt that expenditure on provision of accommodation and care for the elderly has inevitably risen over recent years. The availability of the supplementary benefit entitlement has provided an option for the elderly which previously would have been open only to a minority with substantial private resources. Many hon. Members will welcome that extension of options. Without that option, however, the choices for the elderly would have been more limited than they are. They would have had to rely simply on the help of their own resources, if they had any, or on the support and resources of their family, if their family had any, or on the capacity of the local authority to use its permissive powers to assist. The provision of supplementary benefit limits, whatever the individual criticisms may be, has extended an option that has brought for many elderly people a level of care and individual satisfaction that otherwise they may not have received.

The present position has evolved as a result of a number of policy changes, largely familiar to the House and accurately detailed in the Select Committee's report and set out by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East. In view of the points that have been raised, I shall not reiterate the historical perspective of the situation in which we find ourselves.

It is true that in the period up to 1984 there was a huge increase in the number of people being helped with residential care and nursing home fees through supplementary benefit. The statistics, although already noted, are worth repeating, for they are startling. In 1978, supplementary benefit helped 7,000 people with their fees. The related expenditure was £6 million. In 1984, there were 42,000 claimants, and expenditure had risen to £190 million. Expenditure had in effect gone up thirty-fold in six years.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East specifically touched on this growth, as did my hon. Friends the Members for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price), for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie). They referred in detail to the certain demographic growth in the number of claimants. We have had to bear that in mind in determining the structure of assistance that we have provided. We have always to bear in mind the twin needs of providing the maximum amount of assistance that we can afford and ensuring that the relevant resources are used in the most satisfactory fashion; the Select Committee pointed out the desirability of doing that.

The new structure that we introduced in 1985, although not specifically the subject of the debate, is intended to target help better and prevent abuse. The old local limits have been replaced by a new national structure of limits related to the specific category of care provided. We did not just dream up those categories. They were drawn from the Registered Homes Act and the limits were determined from information about the differential costs of providing the appropriate levels of care for different client groups.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) for acknowledging, as did the Select Committee, the recent changes in the supplementary limits. Those changes were specifically designed to give extra help where it is most needed, and added flexibility to the new structure within which we operate. To put them in their context, the changes follow an interim uplift of £10 given last November for all types of residential homes, and a substantial increase of £37·40 for nursing homes. The main new changes in addition are a further increase of £5 in the new limit for residential care homes for the elderly, a new limit of £140 for elderly people who are blind or who qualify for the higher rate of attendance allowance, and a special extension of £17·50 for people living in residential care or nursing homes in Greater London. A number of points have been raised by hon. Members this afternoon, and I shall endeavour to deal with them as and when I deal with hon. Member's specific observations.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East spoke with all the authority of the Chairman of the Select Committee. She spoke specifically of the extent to which she believed that supplementary expenditure on residential and nursing home care may have been out of control. I emphasise that they were her words rather than mine. The normal supplementary forecasts are based on a disaggregation of different client groups, and not on different household categories. Because of the specific concern about board and lodging payments in 1984, special estimates were made in the Department about future expenditure in this sector.

As the supplementary benefit annual statistical inquiry showed, between December 1982 and December 1983, expenditure for people in residential care and nursing homes rose from £39 million to £105 million. Using those figures as a base, it was estimated that by December 1984 expenditure would increase to £190 million and would continue to increase by about 50 per cent. a year. Those estimates took account of foreseeable changes — for example, in the number of elderly people — but some other factors had to be considered which cannot be precisely quantified, such as the demand and need for residential care and the level of charges for it.

The expenditure figures from the annual statistical inquiry have not been fully analysed. In terms of the number of claimants, our estimates look remarkably accurate. We estimated that the number of claimants would increase from 25,800 in December 1983 to 42,500 by December 1984. The number for December 1984 was 42,000, so our estimates were perhaps rather more accurate than one may have been led to believe by the growth in global expenditure in that point. Perhaps the Department had the expenditure under tighter control than many may have supposed.

The hon. Lady also referred specifically to the desirability of comparable standards in public and private sector homes, and I agree with her about that. In 1984 we made it clear that local authorities should be consistent about standards across the sectors, and we have repeated our blandishments in 1986. The social services inspectorate inspects both public and private homes. It has a specific power to do so as and when it thinks it appropriate on a selective basis, but the prime responsibility for inspecting voluntary and private homes remains with the local authorities under legislation. So far as we can see, that is desirable and we expect that that will continue to be the case. We have a two-year monitoring study in hand and a report due towards the end of the year which may give us more information than we have had on an important and relevant part of this area.

The hon. Lady asked whether homes were being squeezed out of business. I understood her to say that, when the Department was asked, it appeared not to know the answer. I cannot respond precisely to the questions asked at that time and I do not have before me the answers that may have been issued, but there is no evidence now of homes closing because of the new structure. On the contrary, it remains a sustainable business, as the Select Committee stated in its report published this morning.

The Ernst and Whinney study on homes' costs also showed that homes could be profitable when charges were set at the supplementary benefit limits. I must emphasise that most residents are privately financed. Supplementary benefit supports about one third of those in independent homes, and more than two thirds are supported by their own resources or other than through the supplementary benefit system.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Minister confirm that the Ernst and Whinney assessment of the cost of homes was based on shared rooms, and that the Government's policy is for single rooms? Where does that put the assessment of the figures?

Mr. Major: I would not confirm that the assessment was based on the cost of shared rooms. The study took account of a variety of different factors. In reviewing the limits we considered a wide range of information on the gross unit costs per place and on charges for single and shared rooms, representations from interested people and organisations, and a variety of other factors. Therefore, the assessment was not based simply on shared rooms. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will find that explanation of some comfort.

I shall return to a matter which has run through the debate, but first I shall touch on a related matter which was perhaps not specifically raised today but which was certainly raised in the Select Committee's report, and that is the recommendation that we should consider urgently the relationship of board and lodging payments to the new income support scheme. We accept the Committee's observations in that regard. We shall consider the future structure of payments for ordinary board and lodging during the coming months and issue proposals for consultation as soon as possible.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh touched on a number of confusions arising from the various sources of assistance for elderly people through residential care in the private sector, care in the voluntary sector and local authorities. It is perfectly true that the present relationship between the main supplementary benefit scheme and other forms of support for people in need of residential care is confusing and unsatisfactory. That has been the view of many hon. Members who have spoken this afternoon.

Obviously, support for those who cannot afford to pay for themselves can be provided either through supplementary benefit or from local authorities. However, it is clear that the parallel systems of local authority and supplementary benefit support overlap, and that the differences between them are confusing for people who run the systems, the staff who work within them, and, most important, for the people who require to be assisted by them. There are, for example, different rules about the assessment of clients' resources for both systems.

Because we recognise the anxieties raised by the hon. Member for Oldham, West and others, we have a major programme of work in hand to review the arrangements for the financial support of residents in local authority, private and voluntary residential care homes, and to improve collaboration between the Department and local authorities in this area. We are setting up pilot studies which will test the feasibility of using local authorities' existing assessment arrangements to assess the need of supplementary benefit payments for residential care. That point was raised specifically by the hon. Members for Birkenhead, for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and for Oldham, West, and my hon. Friends the Members for Macclesfield and for Eastleigh. The report is in hand.

We are also seeking to examine the position of local authorities advising DHSS — [Interruption.] I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) has been present throughout the afternoon. He is always a welcome refugee from his sun lamp, but so far as I am aware, although he may have been actively engaged this afternoon, he was not actively engaged in the Chamber. If he will allow me, perhaps I can turn my mind to responding to hon. Members who have been actively engaged in a good purpose this afternoon.

The pilot study will investigate the possibility of local authorities advising DHSS local offices on appropriate levels of payments for particular homes. I acknowledge the reservations on assessment and the pertinent points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley). We have also set up with the local authorities a second joint working party to consider ways of harmonising financial support for people in residential care homes. The relationship between financial support for residential care and the income support scheme will depend on the outcome of the joint working party which we expect will report by Easter next year. The working party is considering three main options, at least one of which was trespassed on by the hon. Member for Birkenhead in his intervention in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh.

The first option is that all support for residential care will be funded through benefits; the second is the opposite approach, with all support being provided by authorities; and the third, which may appeal most to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield, is a mixture of the two with the support for the board and lodging element to be funded through benefit and with the care costs being met by local authorities. That matter was raised by many hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), and we shall have to await the results of the discussions and consultations on it.

At the moment all options are open, but, as the House will appreciate, any of the proposals would involve major structural changes and I do not underestimate the difficulty of carrying those through. However, we are anxious to find the best possible mechanisms for assisting the elderly to obtain suitable accommodation while retaining, as the Select Committee is clearly anxious that we should, a proper control over public funds. I can assure the House that once we have firm proposals we shall make them available to the House.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister see any chance of doing that by April 1988?

Mr. Major: I said a moment ago that we hoped to have the report by Easter next year, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that. As to legislative matters thereafter, that is not a matter for which I am responsible at this moment, despite the eager anticipation that raced into the hon. Gentleman's eye as he leaped to his feet.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West, alas, missed the benefit of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South which referred to many of the remarks that he made and in so doing substantially truncated the remarks that I would have made, for which the House may be truly grateful. The hon. Gentleman suggested that the national limits that we introduced in April last year might have been too low. The limits were set on the basis of the best information that we had available to us. They were intended to enable reasonable charges to be met and they were successful in that endeavour.

When we introduced those limits we promised a full programme of monitoring and research. As a result of the initial feedback from that programme, we made substantial increases to the limits last November which, as the hon. Gentleman will know, now range from £120 to £180 for residential care homes and from £170 to £230 for nursing homes. Hon. Members will know that we have just completed a full review of all the board and lodging limits, the results of which I referred to a few moments ago.

I am unable to accept the hon. Gentleman's underlying point. Broadly speaking, the limits were at a relatively adequate level and subsequent research has shown that to be the case.

Mr. Meacher: I said, not that the limits were too low, but that they failed because there is a single national limit, albeit with a variation for central London. They fail to take into account a wide variation in gross unit costs. Does the Minister have any intention to try to make the limits reflect economic realities more closely? In the absence of that, the shoe will pinch in a number of places and I fear that there may be evictions of a number of persons whom I am sure that neither he nor the home owners wish to evict, but that is the economic reality.

Mr. Major: I understand the point on which the hon. Gentleman now enlarges. He will be aware of the special assistance, particularly for the London area, that was made in the announcements which will come into effect from 28 July. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh also referred to that specific point, so I shall respond to it now.

We looked generally to see whether there are substantial regional variations. It is true that there are modest variations within regions and that will almost invariably be the case. The only area that our monitoring shows really merits a substantial increase in the limit is the Greater London area, and we have made a substantial increase in the new limits that will come into effect from 28 July.

I understand — some of the residential care home owners touched on similar points when I met them — that there are within regions areas that are noticeably more expensive than others, but it is also fair to say that if we are to retain the financial control that we are invited to retain, quite rightly, by the Select Committee, we must set relatively broad limits to ensure that residential homes do not necessarily spring up in what may well be the most expensive and not necessarily the best areas for their functions to be carried out. Therefore, I hope that we shall not face the gruesome possibilities that the hon. Gentleman outlined.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the question of residential care homes not taking people on benefit. There have always been homes where it would not be reasonable to meet the charges at the expense of supplementary benefit and that remains the position. I emphasise that limits are not designed to meet exceptionally high charges. We could not obtain budgetary control if we did that. However, if someone has particularly serious health needs, health authorities and local authorities retain all their powers and duties to provide or to pay for care at the appropriate rate. We hope and expect and have evidence that in those special circumstances they will take up the responsibility that Parliament has invited them to accept.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon in, to echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield, an excellent speech, asked for a view on the suggestion by the Spastics Society that people with multiple handicaps should be entitled to the amount of benefit available to people in nursing homes even though they may not be in nursing homes but are perhaps living in residential care homes. We recognise the particular problems of this specific group. My hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security has discussed the proposal with the Spastics

Society, but I am bound to say that supplementary benefit cannot meet all care costs however high and our local offices do not have the expertise to determine which groups need the higher levels of care. Local authorities have a role to play in the provision of care.

There are, as the hon. Gentleman will know, some topping up provisions which have given local authorities added flexibility to deal with certain people who fall in that particularly difficult area. We are hoping to have further discussions with the local authority associations and the voluntary sector on what improvements might be made to the particular difficulties faced by the group that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh spoke about regional variations and rightly had in mind the particular difficulties faced in Hampshire and in his constituency of Eastleigh. To add to the observations that I made a moment ago to the hon. Member for Oldham, West, our local office survey specifically showed that charges in the London south and London north social security regions were generally above the national average. But for most categories of home the difference was not significant. In all but one category in each region the difference was less than 10 per cent. and the clear pattern of significantly higher charges of London has not been repeated in the south generally. However, we shall keep a close watch on that, particularly in view of the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax spoke rather against the light in terms of the prevailing sentiments in the debate and a speech is none the worse for having done that. He had some qualms about an assessment system and the possibility of introducing a bureaucratic straitjacket. He mentioned related problems that clearly would exist were we to move towards a specific assessment system. I hope and expect that those particular concerns will be discussed in the meetings that we have in the study group to determine how we may take the problem further.

My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield, in a typically robust speech, ranged widely across the spectrum. His core concern was on the desirability of assessment of need. I hope that he will accept that my remarks a few moments ago about the studies that we are carrying out in order to look at the problem will give him some reassurance that we fully take on board the worries that he has mentioned.

My hon. Friend also referred to the desirability of the expansion of private residential care to complement part III accommodation. I wholeheartedly endorse the way in which my hon. Friend put it. It is a substantial complementary factor to the part III accommodation which, as my hon. Friend says, now has to deal with people who often require more care than has traditionally been the case. The assistance that is provided by the residential and voluntary care sector will have been of significant assistance to those people who provide splendid care in part III accommodation.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) spoke of the importance of the inspection of homes and related matters. He will know that local authorities have an obligation to inspect registered residential care homes at least once every 12 months, although they are encouraged to inspect them more often if they believe that to be necessary.

In addition, the health authorities have statutorily to inspect nursing homes twice every 12 months and the authorities have the power to withdraw registrations if standards are not maintained. I emphasise that that power exists for them to use if they feel that it is necessary. I can also tell the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone — he may find it reassuring — that the social services inspectorate is carrying out a two-year study to see how the Registered Homes Act 1984 is being implemented, including standards in the homes. We expect its report on this important matter at the turn of the year.

The hon. Gentleman also spoke of recent reports in the Yorkshire Post. He will understand if I do not refer specifically to the content of those reports. However, it is for the authorities with responsibilities to register and inspect the homes to examine those reports. In the belief that the hon. Gentleman may not have yet done so, I shall draw his remarks to the attention of those authorities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South spoke robustly as ever and with typical good sense. Her comments about parts of the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West robbed me of many of the golden remarks I would otherwise have made, for which the hon. Gentleman may be thankful and the House may be grateful. My hon. Friend spoke about the need for assessment for supplementary benefit claimants. I hope that she will find my earlier remarks of some reassurance.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon referred to the possibility of shared rooms. I believe that I dealt with that in an intervention during his speech. I hope that he will find those remarks acceptable.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead raised a series of matters, many of which I have already dealt with. He also raised the question of the treatment of attendance allowance under the transitional protection provisions. The chief adjudication officer issued revised guidance for adjudication officers some weeks ago. Operational guidance asking local officers to review cases during the uprating exercise has also been issued. Arrears of benefit will be paid where appropriate. The regulations have now been amended to put the law back to what was originally intended. However, claimants will get the benefit of an increase in their transitional protection through the uprating addition of up to £10 which we introduced at the same time.

Mr. Frank Field: May we take it, as a result of the chief adjudication officer's decision, that all of our constituents who are in old people's homes and who claim the attendance allowance and had part of it frozen under arrangements which I understood and support will have further parts of that unfrozen as the charges of the local authority home increase and rise above the supplementary benefit level?

Mr. Major: I believe that I know the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question, but it would be safer for me to write to him rather than mislead him or, more relevantly, mislead those outside the House who may read reports of the debate. I shall undertake to write to the hon. Gentleman within the next day or so on that point.

I believe that we have had a worthwhile and, I trust, helpful debate. My hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and I will reflect carefully on the many views expressed, especially those upon which there has been a broad consensus among those who have spoken in the debate. We are not in any way complacent about the present system and we entirely recognise the need for greater flexibility.

[Mr. Major]

As I said earlier, we have in hand already an urgent programme of work for the future and we look forward to carrying it through. What is certain and quite clear is our intention. We wish to ensure that residential care is on a firm footing so that the elderly can get the care they need. We wish to ensure that there will be alternatives to the excellent care so often provided by local authorities and that the resources used for that purpose provide the best value for the community that can be obtained. I believe that those are aspirations which command widespread support, and I commend them to the House.

Question deferred, pursuant to paragraph (4) of Standing Order No. 19 (Consideration of Estimates).

ESTIMATES 1986-87

Class VII, Vote 1

LABOUR MARKET SERVICES

Tourism

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a further sum, not exceeding £759,406,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1987 for expenditure by the Department of Employment on the promotion of tourism, including grants in aid, general labour market services, including a grant in aid, services for seriously disabled people and an international subscription.—[Mr. Trippier.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren).

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This Estimate refers only to tourism in England. Expenditure on tourism in Scotland and Wales comes under different headings. However, in view of the fact that the Select Committee report has significant effects on tourism in Wales and in Scotland, can you advise the House whether we are debating only this class of expenditure or whether we are combining with it expenditure that refers to Wales and to Scotland?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. Gentleman allow me to reflect on that for a moment or two? I shall advise him later.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It may be that I can be of some assistance. Hon. Members from Scotland and Wales have persuaded the Government to reject the Select Committee's recommendation which would have brought all of this expenditure under one Estimate. They cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not sure whether that is a point of order or helpful. Perhaps the House will allow me to reflect on the point raised by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley).

7.5 pm

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): I beg to move,

That Class VII, Vote 1, be reduced by £500 in respect of Subhead A1(1) (Grant in Aid to the British Tourist Authority).

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) for setting the tone and making sure that everybody in the House understands that we are debating tourism problems and opportunities for the whole of the United Kingdom.

In the many months during which we looked at the problems and opportunities of tourism, the Select Committee not only learnt a lot but received much help from all those engaged in that great enterprise. I think that I can speak for the whole of the Committee when I say that we found that tourism in our economy was a breath of fresh air. It is an industry of new opportunities and far horizons. However, I do not think it is inappropriate to say that nobody on the Select Committee, least of all its Chairman, which I have the honour to be, regards tourism as a substitute for manufacturing industries. Markets and jobs have been lost because costs and quality in industry have exceeded customers' willingness to pay. Tourism must face up squarely to the fact that the need to hold on to its expansion and market opportunities will rest very much on its ability to deliver services in terms of opportunity and quality and of a size, price and sense that customers are willing to accept.

I should like to make one technical plea. Throughout our hearings we kept hearing the word "product"—a ghastly word—in relation to tourism. Tourism is about service to others. The word "service" is becoming an acceptable word once again in the English vocabulary. Pride in service to customers is a sound base on which we found many enterprises flourishing. With the permission of the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) I shall refer to some of the more excellent ones that we found in the Principality.

It is essential that service should be there at all times so that tourism can expand its strong enterprise base. I should like to pay particular tribute to Mr. Duncan Bluck and the members of the British Tourist Authority, the Scottish Tourist Board, the Wales Tourist Board and the Northern Ireland Tourist Board who, throughout our hearings, gave us every assistance. They tended to show us all the good things, and we had to look round the side to find some of the bad. However, overall I believe that we came away with a real understanding of what tourism in this country is all about.

Our elegant Clerks tried to talk the Select Committee down in the report. The Select Committee visited more than 100 sites, not just 80. We ranged from underground rivers in Northern Ireland, with Special Branch looking for mines in the river to make sure that our passage would be safe, to travelling on Snowcats in the Cairngorms in the middle of winter dressed in our city suits, much to the amazement of the skiers. In Wales, we had tea with an elegant lady, called Auntie Jean, at her mountain farmhouse, and we also sampled the disarray of the baggage pouring off the jumbo jets at Heathrow at dawn.

We recognised that tourism is about opportunities right across the United Kingdom, and it affects everybody in this country. Tourism is not just a good thing for many people: it is a bit of a bore for some. It causes problems in our cities, which the Government have to face in collaboration with local authorities and the other authorities responsible for tourism.

However, we must address ourselves to the Government's reply, because the move to reduce the vote is serious. If necessary, we may have to press it to a Division if we do not get a satisfactory response from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. However, we shall see how he copes, and whether he copes as elegantly as he has on other occasions.

Our report was published on 4 December. My trepidation about my hon. Friend's response is conditioned by the fact that it took the Government over six months to give us their reply. It is true that the grace of the Select Committee allowed them an extension beyond the 60-day period that is normally granted, but we looked forward to a strong and virile reply from my hon. Friend and from the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Employment. We noted along the way their production of the document entitled "Pleasure, Leisure and Jobs". We found it a little disappointing and slightly humiliating that the Government's reply to one of our main recommendations was slipped out in the House of Lords on 27 February, when we were told that that recommendation was not acceptable to the Government. The fact that it was unacceptable would not have been so bad, but it went against convention, and there was not even a nice little letter to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry explaining what the Government were going to do. We are an understanding crowd until we find that other people are unkind to us. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will take note of the fact that there is a convention, and it would be helpful if it were followed at all times, not just for the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, but for all Select Committees.

I should like to explain why the Select Committee on Trade and Industry is tackling the debate, not our elegant brothers in the Select Committee on Employment. It is merely because, during Government reorganisation, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary tried to slip away from Trade and Industry to Employment and leave us high and dry studying tourism. However, we were able to persuade the powers that be that he should not get away with that and that we would still be after him shouting tally-ho, as we are tonight.

Her Majesty's Government's reply is disappointing, bearing in mind the strong quality of Ministers and civil servants whom we met during our inquiry, who were dedicated and eager to make a success of the growing tourism industry. I thought that there might be three reasons for that. First, they were uncertain how to answer the questions where answers could not be avoided. We did not study Sunday trading, but I have no doubt that tonight some hon. Members will wish to question whether that should have been included in the reply.

Secondly, I wondered whether they were stopped in their tracks by the Treasury, as so many enterprises that should be pursued are stopped nowadays by that awesome hand. That would be a pity. The Government are dedicated to the enterprise culture and looking for new opportunities for employment, so there are times when they cannot avoid being the entrepreneur. They must twist the arm of the Treasury so that it does not hold up the progress that is being called for at all levels of Government.

Thirdly, I wondered whether the Government were worried by the size of the challenge presented to them. When I look at the response on education needs, it seems to me that three or four agencies are being cobbled together to act as an answer rather than there being a dedicated policy recognising how much training there needs to be in all the opportunities that tourism presents, such as hotel management, catering, transportation, and so on, and understanding the scale of enterprise and education that is required to take advantage of the opportunities.

The Government's reply shows that perhaps they still have not understood the lack of rationale that one has found so frequently in the way in which the Government deploy their resources for stimulating tourism. After all, tourism is big business. It now employs more than 1 million people. It is a much larger employer than the electrical and instrument engineering, mechanical engineering, transport, equipment, chemicals and man-made fibres, paper, printing and publishing industries. All those industries employ fewer people than are known to be currently working in tourism. The contribution to our gross domestic product is now approaching £10,000 million a year. It is the biggest single industry in this country, exceeded only by the oil extraction and natural gas industry, which I think everyone will agree is not atypical of industry. Tourism is a big business opportunity, which the Government must measure up to rather than just turn away from some of the home truths that we produced in our report, which sells at the reasonable price of £5·40, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although complimentary copies are available to you.

Tourism's contribution to the gross domestic product also shows the tremendous number of people who visit this country. In our report, we drew attention to the visits by overseas residents to the United Kingdom, excluding our own people going backwards and forwards to the seaside, visiting the Tower of London, the fens or Scotland. Whereas in 1973 there were about 8 million visits to this country, now there are over 12 million, which is more than 50 per cent. higher. Perhaps some of the birds have stayed on their roosts in the United States of America, although the word "chicken" would not occur to me.

The industry has grown rapidly. The Government might be good enough to consider whether they have recognised the dimension of that growth. With respect, perhaps they will have a second look at their reply to see whether it matches the opportunities that are available.

The rationale problem is real. Let me refer to the aid distributed round the country. Hon. Members from the Principality and Scotland will cheer lustily when I say that they do very much better than the bulk of people in the other part of the United Kingdom called England, which produces most of the income from tourism. The latest data available to the Select Committee showed tourist spending in England approaching £8,000 million a year out of the £10,000 million spent in the whole of the United Kingdom. Scotland had nearly £1 billion and Wales £500 million, although I am sure that it is all well spent.

In the report we draw attention to the amount of Government aid. The hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) was instrumental in producing that part of the report. Government funding is in no way related to spending. One can argue that where spending is low, it is better to spend more money on investment. On the other hand, where the spending is high one would expect Government support to reflect in some way the amount of money being spent.

Mr. Wigley: Were the Committee's recommendations in relation to Wales and Scotland geared towards improving the performance of tourism in Wales and Scotland?

Mr. Warren: From my experience of visiting large parts of the Principality and of the northern kingdom, I and the Committee found little to criticise there. Indeed, we found more to criticise in England.

That brings me back to the rationale. The investment needs to go to the places where the money is being spent to raise the quality. The performance in Wales, particularly at an excellent hotel that we stayed at in Llandudno, which exceeded anything that one would ever find in London, is evidence and justification of what I am suggesting to the House.

In England, tourist spending is about £8,000 million per year, yet Government funding is only one thousandth of that at £8·6 million a year. The ratios in Scotland and Wales are five to seven times higher than that in terms of income from tourism. The Government must tackle this problem of rationale. Tourism is a big business producing £10,000 million a year. It makes no sense not to consider the income and how the industry can be incited to grow more rapidly. The return on investment in Scotland and Wales is very reasonable, but I am pleading for a rationale. I am not asking for cuts in enterprise or investment in Scotland, Northern Ireland or Wales.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I am slightly reassured by the final comment made by the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren). However, he will appreciate that in the part of the country that I represent, the highlands and islands of Scotland, for reasons of geography the degree of investment compared with the return will always be more unfavourable than it would be in Edinburgh or in London. The same argument can apply to Wales.

I am sure that hon. Members will be interested to learn that I spoke to a friend in London this afternoon who had just returned by car ferry from France. He told me that on the maps handed out by the British car ferry company, no routes are shown north of Carlisle. That is very worrying, and it acts as a disincentive.

Mr. Warren: I am sure that the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) will have noticed, as he hares south to Westminster, that there are no signs indicating London on any motorway north of Birmingham. The hon. Gentleman would do well to recognise that the ratios are so adverse against investment in England that the Government must take action, although we do not believe that there should be a decrease in investment in Scotland, Northern Ireland or Wales.

One of our essential recommendations — almost like casting a fly across Whitehall waters — is that it would be a good idea to abolish the tourist boards. Quangos are not popular on this side of the House although they may be popular elsewhere in the House. However, we thought that abolishing the tourist boards was a good idea not simply because change would be a good thing in itself but because Britain is the only country in Europe—the only country in the world, according to our survey—which has separate tourist authorities carrying out the same function. In France, a tourist would visit the French national tourist board, and the same applies in Switzerland or Italy. Those countries have a single tourist authority. I hope that the Government will face the need to rationalise the unusual position in Britain. In the same way, I think that it is about time that we had a United Kingdom football team competing in the World Cup.

Mr. Wigley: No way.

Mr. Warren: I recognise that that view is not shared by some hon. Members representing Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland. However, the Select Committee and I want to bring the best to bear on the opportunities available. Before the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye, who is representing the whole of Scotland in this debate tonight by the look of it, challenges my view——

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): What about me?

Mr. Warren: I apologise to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman). I meant also to refer to my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley).

Before anyone challenges my idea, I hope they recognise that the Scottish Tourist Board is allowed by the British Tourist Authority to spend only £200,000 a year on advertising abroad. Furthermore, no one in Wales is allowed to advertise abroad unless they have the authority of the BTA. I hope that Ministers, especially the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales, will recognise that the Select Committee report represents an opportunity for them to gang up against my unfortunate friends who represent English interests in the Cabinet in relation to tourism. That was the fly that was floated across Whitehall waters, but again it was not snatched eagerly by the Government.

The Select Committee has tried to bring a kind of rationale to the tourist industry and its relationship with the Government. The Select Committee made 37 recommendations to the Government to review and report back to the House. I would not dream of recounting all 37, as many other hon. Members wish to speak tonight.

I should like to comment on one or two of those recommendations as I represent a coastal constituency which has many problems in trying to develop tourism. Members of the Select Committee who visited Hastings and other areas found a common theme: that change was required to develop opportunities for generating tourism.

We welcome the opportunity for the development of tourism in the industrial heritage of Britain which spawned the industrial revolution. It was good to see that old factories and waterways are not being destroyed but are being renovated and retained as symbols of the start of the industrial revolution. However, when we saw how other enterprises, such as museums, were maintained, it came as a surprise to us to discover that the Government—even though they were often a source of funds for museums—are content to allow the local authorities running the museums to decide when they should be open. Tourists wanted to visit museums on Saturdays and Sundays and many were not open at those times.

We were conscious of the fact that some large enterprises carried enormous muscle in getting loans and aid from tourist authorities to generate new business in tourism. We came across a hotel which had received £300,000 from the taxpayer with no pay-back required. The company which owned the hotel could have afforded to borrow that sum from a bank. In another case, a bigger and more beautiful swimming pool had been built. We learnt that the swimming pool was built with Government funds, even though there were plans to build it before the grant was made available. Needless to say, we all enjoyed our swim.

I am not frowning on people who have had such success. Indeed, I must tell the House that we believe in sampling tourism at every opportunity. I do not condemn success in obtaining grants, but in many cases there was not the rationale which we sought through the Select Committee report and which we looked for in the Government response.

The Select Committee thought that a loans system would be a good idea. There should be a limit on grants so that more people can share in the opportunity to get the money that is available, and the money should be recycled as new investment in further tourist ventures. The Government replied that that could not be done through the high street banks. We think that is nonsense. After all, the banks are capable of lending money anyway. I fail to understand why they cannot act as Government agents in this case as they do on loan guarantee schemes. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister can enlighten me on that point.

We were also concerned about the basic quality of education and management which is available. I would like to pay a small tribute—it is never too late to do so—to my late hon. Friend the Member for Fulham, Mr. Martin Stevens, who put so much effort into the educational and training aspects of the report. There seemed to be too much variation in the Government's reply on the quality of knowledge about careers advice in tourism. Several agencies were involved, but concentration would be more sensible.

On classification schemes for hotels and catering, it was disappointing that the Government did not appreciate in their response that it would be a good thing to have their heavy hand ready, if necessary, as is the case in so many continental countries, to ensure that classification takes place. Although one welcomes voluntary schemes—the one in Scotland is very good—it would be valuable to have the Government pushing hotels and catering establishments towards a common scheme. That has not proved impossible in any other country of which I have knowledge, and it is long overdue here.

I shall not dwell on the licensing laws or the shops legislation, save to say that in peripheral areas such legislation or lack of it nullifies many endeavours, especially in coastal areas where the tourist season is far too short to make the necessary killing to bring wealth and employment to the community and establishments need to be able to open at the right time to take advantage of the tourist trade.

In terms of regional grant, local authorities need far more Government help in recognising that it is not just a matter of "night visitors". Day trippers are very expensive to entertain, taking up a great deal of local authority time and investment for a relatively small return. It is high time that the Government acknowledged that the peripheral resorts, as well as some of those in the centre, should have recognition in terms of grant from the Department of the Environment for what they are doing for the rest of the country and encouraging the invisible export of tourism.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): Would my hon. Friend include among resorts those towns which specialise in drawing conference trade? This is a great problem in Harrogate. The conference centre costs our ratepayers a great deal of money and brings a great number of people not just to the town but to Yorkshire generally. However, we cannot get the formula for grant-related expenditure to take account of this and enable the town to flourish.

Mr. Warren: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend, whose devotion to the tourist cause in Harrogate is well known. I pay tribute to the valuable document that he produced during our study. Indeed, recommendations Nos. 20 to 22 refer to business and conference tourism as a new opportunity. What has been done in Harrogate, Bournemouth, Brighton, and now at the Queen Elizabeth hall, represents a style that must be enhanced, but this can be done only with direct and indirect Government help. The Government must recognise the value of those facilities both to the community and to the Treasury.

[Mr. Warren]

Another recommendation relates to tourist information centres. I am glad that the Government intend to do something about this aspect. I hope that bodies such as the British Airports Authority and the ports authorities will ensure that information centres are so strategically placed that tourists actually pass them and that leaflets will be available. One that we sampled had nothing available other than advertisements for day trips to France, which did not seem a very good idea. Whatever one thinks of the Channel tunnel enterprise — personally I support it — tourists going in and out of that hole in the ground will expect to be welcomed and to know, when they come up and sniff the beautiful air of Kent or Sussex, where they can go from there and how they can do so as speedily and pleasantly as possible.

The problems of tourism in London are well known, but the response of authorities such as Westminster city council has been disappointing. I hope that the Government will get together with local authorities in the capital to ensure that there are adequate facilities for coach parking rather than just shunting the problem back as something that local authorities ought to deal with. The whole of London — indeed, the whole country — is affected if one cannot get around the streets in a timely and reasonable manner.

A particular concern relating to the way in which the Government look after tourists entering and leaving the country was illustrated during our visit to Cardiff airport. We heard, to our dismay, that one day in the early spring of last year every other airport in western Europe was closed but the stacks of jumbo jets could not land at Cardiff, where they would have been good revenue earners, because Customs and Excise had not been alerted 24 hours in advance. The vagaries of the weather men, let alone the weather, do not often bring such a chance twice. The responsiveness of Customs and Excise needs to be much more real and imaginative—I dread the next time I try to get through the green channel having said that —and not tied to outdated rule books probably devised in the days of the stage coach.

Finally, throughout our study we found that tourism was a good symbol of United Kingdom enterprise, a creator of new enterprise and new opportunities for wealth and employment, bringing wealth and new life to our coasts, our cities and our countryside—and long may it prosper. I commend the amendment to the House.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should put beyond doubt the matter raised by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). It will have become clear during the speech of the Chairman of the Select Committee that the debate will cover England, Scotland and Wales. I am glad to confirm that the promotion of tourism in all those places may be discussed in the debate.

7.37 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I am grateful to be called so unexpectedly early in the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Let me therefore be the first to welcome the opportunity of this debate and of the debates which followed publication of the Select Committee report. Although I do not agree entirely with the analysis by the Chairman of the Select Committee, for territorial reasons which he may well appreciate, the report provoked a debate which was healthy in itself and generated a useful debate in the Scottish press and among Members of Parliament for Scotland.

Mr. Wigley: And Wales.

Mr. Kennedy: And Wales. It raised the whole profile of tourism, which was most helpful and constructive.

Having said that, for once I find myself complimenting the Government on their response to the Select Committee with regard to the retention of the Scottish Tourist Board. I join the Chairman of the Select Committee in deploring the manner in which the manner in which the Government chose to issue their response, but many of us were extremely relieved at the view that they took.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): As there is no other Liberal Member and no Member at all from the SDP in the Chamber for this important debate, will the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether he speaks on behalf of the Liberal party or merely on his own behalf, and whether he also speaks on behalf of the wholly absent SDP?

Mr. Kennedy: I am happy to set the record straight. I am a Member of the SDP.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Good heavens!

Mr. Kennedy: On this occasion my particular interest is as a Member representing the highlands and islands of Scotland. [Interruption.] Perhaps the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) will listen to my reply to his question. In political terms, the highlands and islands speak with a united voice, having two Liberal Members of Parliament and two SDP Members. The hon. Gentleman may take it, therefore, that on this issue I speak for my three hon. Friends completely.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: The hon. Gentleman is confirming that he is the spokesman for the Liberal party, is he?

Mr. Kennedy: That is rather obvious. I speak on behalf of the alliance in this debate, in the same way as, under the conventions and time constraints of the House in the earlier debate, a Liberal Member spoke on behalf of the SDP and the Liberal party.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop rose——

Mr. Kennedy: I think that that is enough. I want to come to more substantive issues.

Mr. Crowther rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's intervention is concerned with tourism and not with party matters. We are discussing the promotion of tourism.

Mr. Crowther: I hope to bring the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) back to the point that he was making before he was interrupted. I wonder whether hon. Members properly understand the recommendation in the Select Committee report on this matter. When it was printed, I pointed out that there was a misprint — although nothing was done about it — in recommendation (2)(c), which states:

"the creation of boards, for the promotion, within the UK, of tourism in each region of England, of Scotland and of Wales"——

but which should read,

"in each region of England, in Scotland and in Wales".

In other words, we were proposing a board for each of the English regions, a board for the whole of Scotland and a board for the whole of Wales, each of them exercising similar powers, responsibilities and duties. I think that that recommendation has not been properly understood.

Mr. Kennedy: That is a very different proposition indeed. If I understand the hon. Gentleman correctly, the remit of the boards, both regional and national, would not extend to international promotion. The hon. Gentleman is nodding, and I must tell him that I am concerned about that. In Scotland we are rather zealous in guarding some of the promotional ability that we enjoy abroad, not necessarily in tourism, but with such projects as the Locate in Scotland Bureau and the Scottish Development Agency.

Dr. Godman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that hard evidence demonstrates that Scotland has been treated badly in respect of tourism promotion in international markets?

Mr. Kennedy: I endorse the hon. Gentleman's remarks. I am concerned about international promotion of the highlands because, for example, it is easy in Tokyo to find out that one can fly to London, but one is not told that it takes only another one and a quarter hours to get to the highlands of Scotland. Therefore, even though the hon. Gentleman and I may be happier about the revised version, we remain unhappy about international promotion.

I had not expected so many interventions in what I thought would be a fairly non-controversial speech. As I know other hon. Members wish to speak, I shall move on swiftly.

In January the Paymaster General set out some of the additional steps that the Government were taking and they were referred to in the Government's response on an organisational basis through co-ordination at ministerial level of tourism as a whole. The priority that the Government are giving to that is welcome, and I

However, several points of concern remain. The first ranges across a variety of Government Departments and public concerns, and was reflected both in the Select Committee report and in the speech of its Chairman. Rather like the National Health Service, where too often we think only about decisions by the Minister for Health and not about decisions of Ministers in other Departments, such as Environment or the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which have health implications, tourism can also be greatly affected by decisions in other Departments. I welcome the greater degree of integration, which I hope will lead to greater emphasis on tourism and to the projection and promotion of tourism as a whole.

I referred earlier to the non-publicity for air connections to Scotland, especially the highlands. We are not satisfied that international promotion is making people aware that, having flown into a major international airport such as London, it is easy to take the next short hop to the highlands. The Civil Aviation Authority has put forward a proposal, which requires the approval of the Department of Transport, to change the pattern of flights out of Inverness away from Heathrow and into Gatwick. That would have serious consequences for inward investment, tourism and business. At least the Government's approach allows Ministers in other Departments to have their say about the implications for their Departments of something that is essentially a transport matter, and I welcome that thrust of Government policy.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): On two occasions the hon. Gentleman has laboured the point that the British Tourist Authority office in Tokyo tells inquirers about flights to London, but not beyond. Does he accept that if the principal recommendation of the Select Committee had been accepted, a future office in Tokyo would have come under the British Tourist Board and, under that recommendation, would have absorbed not only the current international tourist interest but a far greater involvement in domestic tourism, thereby possibly meeting the hon. Gentleman's point?

Mr. Kennedy: I obviously realise the potential on paper of that argument, but on a variety of issues experience north of the border — I speak not as a political nationalist, but as a nationalistic Scot — has taught us that the best laid schemes somehow do not work out in practice. What is presumed would happen does not happen in the way that we would wish.

Both the Select Committee's report and the Government's response refer to the Government's recognition of the importance of obtaining a good mix between the public and the private sectors inmarketing many of the facilities of tourism. That is a sensible policy. I echo what Dr. Pattison, the chief executive of the Scottish Tourist Board, said about the public sector exercising a prime pumping function to catalyse growth. That sensible emphasis is most welcome.

I can cite the example, which I have mentioned to the Minister previously, of a project in my constituency that involves the possible construction of a mountain railway and ski slopes on Ben Wyvis. That would achieve something that the Select Committee was anxious to achieve — an extension of the parameters of the present tourist season in that area. In that sense, the proposal would be welcome. I believe that it contains the right mix for public and private sector capital. Obviously, the proposal presents exciting opportunities for the highlands, and we may well hear more about that. Also, it has implications for employment which are not insignificant.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): I appreciate, as I am sure other hon. Members do, that the hon. Gentleman has been extremely kind and generous in allowing so many interventions. It is important that I intervene at this stage. The hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) intervened earlier. What he said made me think, and perhaps it will be quoted in later speeches. The matter is of direct relevance to those who may be fortunate in catching your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, who represent constituencies in Wales and Scotland. I think that it is quite clear what the report says in its summary of conclusions and recommendations. I think that what is printed is precisely what the Select Committee intended to say.

Mr. Crowther: No, it is not.

Mr. Trippier: I must intervene at this stage because it may be appropriate for the hon. Member for Rotherham, who may be fortunate in catching your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to make that clear. There is a difference of opinion between the hon. Gentleman and some of his hon. Friends, and certainly between him and me.

Mr. Kennedy: I appreciate that there is a difference of opinion about the interpretation and exactitude of the words that have been used in the report. Given that there is such a difference, I hope that it will be teased a little further during the debate. The Minister will appreciate that I have tried to respond to what I thought was the position. I have also given a further response to the redefined position that the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) put forward. I am grateful for the Minister's intervention. There have been quite a number of interventions. I shall not prolong the issue any further.

I welcome the fact that the Select Committee took time, in considering the problem almost internationally, to get down to the nitty-gritty of some issues. I was pleased that the Committee highlighted the issue of signposting. The north of Scotland is cursed by the constraints that are applied on local authorities and private developers in erecting signposts and direction indicators.

The hon. Lady the present Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, told us in a debate several years ago, when she was a Transport Minister, that experiments would be carried out. Experiments were carried out in two parts of England, and steps were taken as a result. The brown road signs in the north of Scotland for bypass communities, and so on, are absolutely hopeless. They do not tempt anyone to follow a tourist route. The Government tell us that they are keeping the matter under review. I hope that they will be sympathetic to those who are sick and tired of not being able to get a sign up when they want to indicate to people that they can turn off the road and find a facility. Communities such as those off the A9 in the north of Scotland which find themselves bypassed have only the consolation of a sign that would not tempt people to turn their motor car off the road and explore the area. I do not think that the signs are good enough.

I know that the Scottish Office has an input in that respect. I have argued the matter with the relevant Minister. This debate provides a further opportunity to do so. I am glad to see that the Secretary of State for Scotland is present. I hope that he will endorse the sense of frustration that I have for the inadequate signposting that his Department is putting up in the highlands of Scotland. I hope that he can do something about it. Many matters are to be debated. I welcome such debates. From the earlier interventions, the debate looks as though it will be slightly more controversial over the exact meaning of the Select Committee's report.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Although tourism employs over 1 million people in this country and makes a vital contribution to the economy, unfortunately its image is not a good one. People in manufacturing industry tend to look down their noses at the services sector, and tourism comes so low down that it is almost touching the floor. Tourism has an uneasy relationship with manufacturing in areas such as Bradford and Keighley which are steeped in textiles and metal-bashing. We still have a job on our hands to persuade people that a belief in the importance of tourism does not reduce one's commitment to the view that this country cannot prosper unless its manufacturing industry is strong.

The latter belief is, I think, self-evident, but it is also a fact that a strong economy is a balanced economy. One of the reasons why many parts of the north of England have suffered so much from unemployment in recent years is that, in common with other regions, we have been dependent on manufacturing. A satisfactory balance between manufacturing and services provides greater flexibility, which enables the slack to be taken up when there is a downturn in the economy.

Much of my constituency is fortunate enough to be served by a newspaper, the Keighley News, which has earned respect because it takes important political issues seriously, even though its editorial policy differs from my own in many respects. Like myself, the newspaper believes that the importance of the manufacturing industry is paramount. I believe that tourism, in its widest sense—the Select Committee pointed out that tourism can include people who are predominantly involved in making visits in connection with their work—can make a significant contribution, while the newspaper regards it of no significance whatsoever. Part of the reason is that it is difficult to quantify employment that flows from the tourist industry. Even the Department of Employment has difficulty in assessing how many people owe their jobs to it, because they are scattered here and there in small units, including retail and catering establishments. However, if it were taken away we would soon recognise the difference.

A distinction is rightly drawn between overnight stays and day trips. There may be justifiable cause for complaint when visitors go to a relatively compact area, such as the south Pennines, as day trippers, imposing extra burdens on local services, but not staying overnight and bringing the extra benefit to the economy that would result. The Select Committee on Trade and Industry, in its report "Tourism in the UK", stated in paragraph 117:

> "We recommend that Government investigates immediately whether the impact of tourism expenditure, particularly from day visitors, is adequately taken into account in the grant related expenditure allocation to local authorities."

In their response, the Government admitted that the data on visitor nights which are used in recreation and environmental health GRE allocations were collected during the 1970s. That information is out of date, especially for an area such as Bradford where there has been a big change in recent years, with a new emphasis on tourism that did not previously exist.

The Government state that a more up-to-date system will be considered for possible use in 1987-88, taking account also of a national survey of British leisure day trips undertaken by the tourist boards in co-operation with the Department of Employment. I urge strongly that a firm decision is made to use more up-to-date facts which take account of the growth in tourism in areas such as west Yorkshire, and especially the incidence of day trips. We are losing out in our grant-related expenditure allocation. That will continue unless adequate allowance is made.

When the Local Government Act 1985, which abolished the metropolitan county councils, was completing its passage through Parliament, we heard a great deal about the funding problems that would be experienced by the regional tourist boards. I believe that those fears proved to be unfounded. While there was undoubtedly a period of uncertainty, the issue has been satisfactorily resolved.

The involvement of metropolitan county councils in tourist activities created a great deal of overlap. For a tourist attraction in my area to have to rely on not only the English tourist board but also the west Yorkshire metropolitan county council—which no longer exists—the Bradford district council and the Yorkshire and Humberside tourist board to market its attractions, involved a great deal of wasteful effort and expenditure. Although there is still some joint marketing by the districts in west Yorkshire, Bradford people are far better placed to publicise the attractions of the area and their tourist and recreational activities than an authority based some distance away in Wakefield.

Bradford has led the way regionally and nationally in developing its tourist potential, and it has broken a few myths along the route. It is entirely appropriate that Bradford should be one of the four or five areas where the English tourist board has established a tourist development action programme involving a substantial industrial heritage element.

The principal vehicle for tourism development projects is the use of section 4 grants. It is intended that they should be provided only when there is an element of additionality—when the projects would not be embarked on if the grant were not forthcoming. It is difficult to test the validity of such a proposition, but when a grant is offered to one hotel project rather than another in the same area it is difficult to defend such distortion of the market unless one has some basis for the distinction. I know of at least one entrepreneur in my area who is making a good go of it despite having been refused a section 4 grant for no very obvious reason.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: My hon. Friend is making a valuable point, but a major recommendation of our Committee was that the Government pay 30 per cent. of the cost of extending the season by one month, whether at the beginning, the end or both. It must be truly additional. The PAYE returns would show when each establishment was open the previous season. Does my hon. Friend support that recommendation, which the Government have not seen their way to support?

Mr. Waller: That is an interesting suggestion. There is a need to extend the period during which tourists visit Britain, but it is paramount that money invested in the industry, whether through section 4 grants or otherwise, should show a proper benefit. I am reluctant to accept distortions in the market. By and large, I prefer investment to go into infrastructure projects which have an effect throughout the tourist industry.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Does my hon. Friend consider that to be a distortion? Prolonging the season would mean getting better value for the money invested in infrastructure. Is it a distortion for the Government to provide money so that entrepreneurs can, with 70 per cent. of their own money, discover whether the public will respond to an extension of the season?

Mr. Waller: That is an interesting point. I hope that my hon. Friend is able to develop it, perhaps in his own speech.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: It is in the report.

Mr. Waller: I shall be very interested to hear what my hon. Friend says.

There should be some rationalisation to take account of the fact that the Department of the Environment, which has no direct responsibility for tourism, controls more than 50 per cent. of development funding spent on it by the Government, when one takes into account grants from the European regional development fund. The system by which those resources are disbursed is somewhat unsatisfactory and amounts to a sort of charade whereby certain schemes are tailored to meet the criteria established by the Commission to recycle taxpayers' money into the economy.

Thus, the spending of £8 million on the remodelling and modernisation of the Alhambra theatre in Bradford was justified partly because we could not possibly turn down £2 million which was described as being "from Europe." The Alhambra theatre is complete and undoubtedly an asset to Bradford, and there is now no point in becoming involved in an argument about whether it represents good value for money, although £8 million is a great deal of money. There is, however, something nonsensical about the process by which such projects are assessed.

The Alhambra should teach us another lesson. Nobody who visits it could doubt that, internally, it is marvellously equipped, but tourism demands a high quality of service for visitors. Although the staff are courteous and helpful, I have heard repeated reports of tables piled high with dirty plates, mediocre food, but one typed and tatty menu for the use of all diners and people waiting 40 minutes to be served. It is not surprising that one of my informants told me of the complaints made by a party of Americans at the table next to her. First impressions are important, and if that is what happens I am afraid that people are not likely to come back for more.

One might say that Bradford council should have considered offering the catering service in its new showpiece theatre for tender to the private sector. I am afraid, however, that that is not the type of radical step that we are likely to have with an administration at the city hall which recently put before ratepayers a programme which would have required an increase of more than 70 per cent. in the rates.

We must also pay more attention to the needs of visitors to different parts of the United Kingdom when erecting signposts, as the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) said. I noted his comments about the efficacy of the white-on-brown signposts, but Ministers in the Department of Transport reported in April that the experiment with such signposts for tourist attractions had been a success. Irrespective of colour, there is a great deal of potential for the use of new signs.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Have I suffered a sudden defect of eyesight, or have we no Minister on the Front Bench listening to the debate, only the duty Whip?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a matter for me, but he has drawn the Government's attention to the position.

Mr. Waller rose—

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Get a Minister immediately.

Mr. Waller: Many visitors travel by train.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Get a Minister immediately.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Waller: It is important that British Rail should go out of its way to make it easier for people who are not used to travelling by train in Britain to find their way around the system. Everybody agrees that, in view of overcrowding in London, it is important to spread the benefits of tourism more evenly throughout Britain. In the 1990s, it seems likely that many visitors will arrive via the Channel tunnel. British Rail is already planning to introduce a link between the tunnel and the north-west which avoids a change of station in central London by following a route through Olympia and Willesden. Much of the latent opposition to the Channel tunnel in Yorkshire and the north-east can be mitigated by ensuring that there is a link to the east coast main line as well, although that presents greater difficulty. That should be a priority for British Rail, and I hope that Ministers in the Department of Transport will take an interest in the matter.

The Select Committee drew attention to the possible use of investing funds earmarked for tourism into outstanding rail routes. Among them, the Settle to Carlisle line stands out a mile. Since British Rail started to market it again, the number of people using it has increased tremendously and some stations that have closed are opening again this summer in connection with the Dalesrail venture. In the past few months, the relevant transport users consultative committees have been looking into BR's closure proposals. Although statute provides that such investigations are supposed to take only cases of hardship into account, I know that the excellent chairman of the transport users consultative committee for the north-east, Mr. James Towler, has interpreted the matter somewhat widely. I hope that we can agree that the continued and enhanced use of the line could generate new jobs for many people and that the loss of such jobs would constitute hardship.

Tourist earnings count as an invisible export. Tourism is undervalued because nobody sees the work force streaming into work at the beginning of the day and out again in the evening as they would at a factory, but it is important. It employs more than 1 million people. We should not undervalue it. I hope that we shall put increasing emphasis on it.

8.9 pm

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): I must take up the suggestion made by the Minister earlier and try to clarify the real meaning of paragraph 2*(c)* of the recommendations made in the first report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry which has caused some dismay. As I mentioned earier, the word "of" repeated in the second line should be "in". I took that up on the day that the report was launched. I discussed it with the Chairman, the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), and with the Clerk to the Committee. It was understood that an erratum slip would be issued, but apparently it was not. I am worried that this has led to so much misunderstanding. I repeat that the intention of the recommendation was that there should be a board in Scotland, a board in Wales and a board in each of the English regions exercising identical powers. I hope that that is now clear.

I shall mention only two or three of the matters brought out in the report. For far too long it has been assumed in many quarters that some parts of the country are suitable for tourism and other parts are not. In the report we tried hard to dispel that myth. Nowhere in Britain could tourism not be developed to the great benefit of the local economy. Many local authorities in the older industrial areas—I include Rotherham—have been too slow in the past to recognise the potential of tourism for economic growth and job generation.

In following the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) I must say that Bradford city council is an exception. Bradford, along with Sheffield and some other councils, has recognised the importance of tourism and is doing something about it. I am pleased that other councils are beginning to catch up. I do not pretend for a minute that tourism can compensate for the appalling loss of jobs in areas such as mine, although it can make a contribution —[Interruption.] I should be most grateful if the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) would allow me to continue my speech.

Tourism can make a contribution to the local economy by bringing new money into an area to the benefit of many service industries, especially the retail and the licensed trades, on which I shall comment later. All this requires a conscious effort. It does not happen by accident. It comes down, in the end, to the local authorities showing a little imagination and then making a firm decision to take tourism seriously. They must accept that things on the local scene which they have taken for granted for years may be of great interest to visitors, especially to American visitors, who are always fascinated by the fact that our history goes back so much further than theirs.

Those things must be exploited, but it all needs organisation. As hon. Members have said, that exploitation needs a good local transport system, adequate car parking, a well-thought-out system of signposting and attention paid to the general attractiveness of the street scene, to cleanliness and to landscaping. When all that has been done, it needs proper promotion in conjunction with the tourist boards. All that costs money. It should be considered as an investment but, unfortunately, the Department of the Environment will consider it merely as an item of revenue expenditure. That can cause problems for authorities which already face the threat of grant penalties or even rate capping.

As the report stated, the Government must consider tourism seriously. If they are to do something about tourism on the scale that we want, and if the authorities are willing to take their share of the work, the Government must show a sense of responsibility by making proper allowances for it in the grant-related expenditure assessment and in the rate support grant settlement. That is vital if we are to make any progress.

I mentioned earlier that an influx of tourists can contribute to the licensed trade in an area. That is mentioned in the report. People cannot spend money in a pub that is not open. The Government agree in their response that there is a need for reform, and their point has been proved, but they say that the problem is to find an opportunity to put the reform into the legislative programme. They must find the legislative time. I do not know why that should be a problem. They have decided to leave water alone, so let them turn their attention to the stronger liquids. There must be plenty of time in the next session for the matter to be dealt with adequately.

I am surprised that the Government got things wrong in the present session. Why on earth did they bring in the silly Shops Bill, which was bound to arouse enormous controversy, and which in the end was thrown out, instead of bringing in a sensible reform of the licensing laws, which they would have got through without much difficulty? That is now all in the past. As I have said, the opportunity will be there next session to do something about this issue. If they will not deal with water, let them deal with beer. I hope that we shall see that legislation in the next session.

Our report has not had as warm a welcome from the Government as I would have hoped. Nevertheless, it has been a useful study. We have made many recommendations, and—who knows?—over the years, many of them may be implemented.

8.15 pm

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Just as Mrs. Worthington has, since time immemorial, been urged not to put her daughter on the stage, so most hon. Members here this evening will know that, until recently, to become actively involved in the tourist industry in the broad, especially in hotels, was, to some extent, lacking in respectability. I am delighted to say that that is no longer the case. It is now understood that the tourist industry offers an opportunity for growth and employment. That must be a good thing to discover in a period when not too many growth areas confront us.

I speak at a time when tourism is very much in the public eye, not, I regret to say, because we are in a period —as we have been for the past five or six years— of expansion of tourism, but because in 1986, for various reasons, the number of tourists from the United States appears to have fallen considerably.

In 1986, there is no likelihood that we shall get back the tourists who changed their minds early and booked in groups to visit other places. Yet I wonder whether it is not a good thing that the constant expansion of tourism, which we had almost started to take for granted, has been arrested this year. I do not know whether it is because of the value of the dollar, the Chernobyl nuclear fallout, or terrorism — although I am told by all and sundry that that is the basic reason — but I know that, as the tourist industry has been expanding during recent years, there has been a tendency to take incoming tourists a little for granted. I wonder whether, at the heart of the reduction this year, there is not, to some small extent, an implication that the hotel industry and many other tourist interests have in recent years not been as caring as they might have been. That is just one observation I make, because the debate comes at an important and interesting time.

Some references are made in the report to investment in tourism projects. As one who has some connections with the City of London, I must say that until recently the average City institution would not touch a tourism project with the proverbial bargepole. I have always thought that that was not only a pity, but that it was rather shortsighted.

Just as tourism has become more respectable as a means of employment, so I detect a sign that investment in tourism by the City is becoming more acceptable. I welcome that and hope that it will develop, not only in the theme park areas, to which City attention has already been directed, but to areas for which the Committee discovered little provision — for example, two and three-star hotels in London. There is no doubt that London is well-served by luxury hotels and that many boarding houses and one-star hotels exist on the periphery, if not close to the centre, but the lack of two and three-star hotel accommodation, to which the Committee drew attention, is something which I hope will be remedied by investment, not least from the City. I learnt today that there are proposals to develop hotels in Greenwich and in the docklands area, and I welcome that prospect.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will not mind my saying that the Government's response to the Select Committee's report is, to say the least, disappointing. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), the Chairman of the Select Committee, that the speed with which the principal recommendation for a major shake-up in the administration of tourism was rejected was mildly insulting to the considerable thought that went into that report.

I did not expect the recommendation to be acceptable, especially in Scotland and Wales, and, of course, I was not disappointed. However, I was a little surprised that the Government allowed themselves to be subjected to what was evidently considerable pressure from Scotland and Wales to the extent that, well in advance of responding to the other recommendations, they felt it necessary, mildly surreptitiously, to reject the recommendation. I adhere unashamedly to that recommendation. I must tell the Minister that, if we are ever to get tourism on to the same organisational basis as it is in other countries, and to take maximum advantage of its potential, the suggestion of a British tourist board, in one form or another, is an idea whose day will yet come.

The Scottish and Welsh representations misunderstood to some extent the fact that they were to be redirected in their tourist efforts. There should be a British tourist board with two arms, one arm to attract tourists, not to Scotland or to Wales, but to Britain, and the other arm to try to maximise the tourism potential within the United Kingdom, not just Wales or Scotland. I must tell the Minister that the speed with which he rejected that recommendation, and the Government's complete failure to recognise that there may be something not absolutely right with the structure of the administration of tourism, is a defect on the part of his Department.

Some time ago I noted a movement in the general direction of the recommendation, in that the chairman of the English tourist board and of the British Tourist Authority had become one and the same person. That could be projected further. The British tourism effort would have been advanced considerably had the basic recommendation been accepted.

The other recommendation made by the Committee which was treated in a cavalier fashion was the suggestion that, to extend the season of tourist activities, there should be some financial inducement. I am prepared to listen to any alternative suggestion which the Government believe is more suited to achieving that objective than the Committee's proposal.

It is distressing that nowhere in the Government's report is there a recognition that some Government assistance might be justified in this area. It may be needed for only one year. It may only be a question of keeping open tourist interests for a little longer. To reject the Committee's suggestion, and seemingly to put nothing in its place, is to underrate the importance of extending the season of tourist operations. I hope that the Minister's reply will be a little more forthcoming than the Government's response to the recommendation by the Select Committee.

I have no inherent wish to see a bureaucracy develop to classify hotels. However, I must draw the Minister's attention to the fact that foreigners, especially Europeans, coming to this country are distressed to discover that whereas they can look in the bedrooms of hotels in, for example, Spain or France, to ascertain the classification of that hotel, in Britain there is no sign to that effect other than those provided in the semi-voluntary schemes of the AA and RAC. Visitors to Britain have a right to expect that there will be some sign of the quality of the hotel that they propose to use, without having the confusion of three stars from the AA or RAC being equivalent to five crowns in another scheme.

If the Government do not believe that they have a responsibility to introduce a classification system — I would accept that—I hope that they understand that, at the very least, they should introduce some sanctions to encourage a much wider voluntary conformity with the schemes that already exist. They have not responded to our recommendation in the way that we had a right to expect after putting in so much thought.

The hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) mentioned licensing hours. I agree entirely that it would benefit tourism enormously if more flexibility were introduced into licensing hours. I hope that the Government will be persuaded to move in that direction, but if the hon. Gentleman believes, or is trying to make the House believe, that the Government could introduce a Bill along the lines that he suggested without opposition, as he seemed almost to promise, he is either naive himself or he assumes that we are naive. I do not expect that there will be a rapid or early move in this direction, but I hope that the Minister will accept that the United Kingdom's licensing hours remain a major anomaly and create much disturbance in the hotel and catering industry. The sooner there is a move towards greater flexibility the happier I shall be, and I suspect that that is the attitude of the Government as well.

The Committee laboured long and hard to produce the report. We did not expect all our recommendations to be accepted; we understood that some were especially controversial. However, we are disappointed, because not only was our major recommendation rejected out of hand, with what could only have been scant consideration, but the Government's response to our other fairly profound recommendations, whether in accepting or rejecting them, did not provide alternative suggestions. I hope that the Minister will go beyond the Government's response and give us some heart after our labour.

8.30 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I represent a constituency which is not normally associated with tourism. However, I am sure that the House will agree, especially the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley), that that is to change over the next few years. My concern with the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry — here I disagree utterly and completely with the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) — lies with recommendation 2(a) that the Scottish tourist board should be abolished. I rarely compliment the Government, but I am bound to say that they acted wisely in their response to that recommendation.

The report contains a great deal of sense in its observations on education and training, which are matters on which I shall spend some time. First, it states that tourism in Scotland has an annual value of £1,300 million and accounts for at least 5 per cent. of the work force in Scotland. These facts are to be found in paragraph 54. If we take into account the direct and indirect effects of tourist spending in Scotland, it has been estimated by the Scottish tourist board—long may it stay in existence—that tourism supports about 100,000 jobs, provides over £230 million of income to Scots and contributes over £130 million to the public purse. Given the remorseless decline of large segments of Scottish manufacturing industry — I refer especially to steel, shipbuilding and engineering and the coal industry — tourism remains one of the few bright prospects for the rehabilitation of the Scottish economy.

It is vital that Government policy is designed to secure the maximum benefit for our growing tourist industry. Tourism, however, remains vulnerable. It is an amalgam of many diverse activities and carefully selected policies are needed that are designed to protect its health and sustain its growth.

Despite what I said about my constituency, I wish to raise a constituency matter. I say to the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) that I regret that a Scottish Minister is not on the Government Front Bench this evening. I am sure, however, that the Under-Secretary of State for Employment will pass on my remarks to the Secretary of State for Scotland. My constituency is racked by unemployment and has a male unemployment rate of fully 26 per cent. It has seen the continuing decline of numerous traditional industries, some of which have disappeared in recent years. Shipbuilding and marine engineering have declined and only one sugar refinery remains. Rope making has declined as well. Many traditional industries have suffered, yet the record of IBM demonstrates that in Greenock and Port Glasgow and the rest of Inverclyde we have a marvellous supply of skills and knowledge.

The Scottish Office, by way of the Scottish Development Agency, has helped to create the Inverclyde initiative. The initiative is seeking to regenerate the Inverclyde district and all of us — certainly all Scots Members—wish those involved well. My chief complaint against the Scottish Office and its Ministers is that public investment is somewhat meagre. I have sought unsuccessfully to persuade Ministers to provide more money for the initiative, and it is my view that Inverclyde could be an important area of tourism in Scotland. To that end, I hope sincerely that the Government will give every encouragement to the application which is being made by the Inverclyde initiative for a grant from the European social fund for a tourist industry training scheme. The scheme is designed for the unemployed who are aged under 25 years. It is a three-year innovatory programme that will experiment in different forms of training that are allied to the creation of new businesses in the tourist industry, which the Inverclyde initiative intends to stimulate.

For the year 1988, the initiative is seeking £48,000 from the European social fund. That will have to be matched pound for pound by the Government. Given such a modest request, the Government should support the application wholeheartedly.

Tourism spending penetrates all aspects of the Scottish economy. It remains remarkably vulnerable, however, to fluctuations in the patterns of tourist activity. A strong pound, for example, tempts ever more British tourists abroad and deters foreign visitors from coming to Great Britain. Other international events have the same effect, and we must bear in mind the Libyan crisis. I think that it was the Department of Employment which suggested recently that the number of American visitors to Great Britain had declined by 19 per cent. in the year that ended in June. Overall, the number of foreign visitors is down by about 15 per cent. over the year.

The consequence is inevitably a downturn in economic activity and a quite serious loss of jobs. Tourist-related jobs in Scotland are still largely of lowly status and are dominated by temporary and part time employment. Much needed employment is created for women, but these jobs are often lowly paid and insufficient to provide a primary wage.

There are structural weakenesses in the tourist industry which must be tackled with assistance from the Government and the state. For example, tourist businesses in Scotland are typically small scale. Almost two thirds of them employ no more than five people. Secondly, there is a substantial turnover among tourism-related businesses. As many as 50 per cent. of the businesses that offer accommodation in Scotland have been established in the past five years. Thirdly, few business men in the tourist industry in Scotland — less than 25 per cent. — have formal qualifications for the work that they do. Fourthly, the majority of these business men have no experience of the tourist industry when taking up ventures within it. These are major structural weaknesses, and I suspect that they are not peculiar to the Scottish industry.

I shall direct myself to key areas in the determination of state policy. The Government need to be more sympathetic to the case that is being made for tourism. I welcome wholeheartedly the Select Committee's report, despite its recommendation that the Scottish tourist board should be abolished. Government sympathy towards the industry should be based on a recognition of the benefits to the public purse. It has a job-creating capacity and its role, which has been outlined by the sole SDP representative in the Chamber, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), is in regional, economic and social developments, especially in more remote communities. The Government must always recognise the potential for growth.

Much more emphasis needs to be placed on the domestic market. We must recognise that fluctuations in the value of sterling will make the industry vulnerable to reductions in foreign visitor levels. We in Scotland must do much more to persuade English visitors to come to Scotland. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) will agree with me, but there have been dramatic changes in west central Scotland. I am pretty sure that five years ago most Scots Members would not have thought that Glasgow would receive more visitors than Edinburgh. It should not surprise us that Glasgow, with its unparalleled Victorian architecture — if it is matched at all, it is matched only by Sydney — the Burrell collection, fine churches and many different buildings and activities, is an important tourist centre. I look forward to the day when the lower Clyde becomes an important tourist centre.

I return to my central theme. The Government should ensure that tourism planning policies must relate to local development programmes which benefit and stimulate economic and employment growth in the area. I commend to the House the work of the Highlands and Islands Development Board in that respect.

There are many other areas in which the Government could do more. For example, they must develop infrastructures, and recognise, as has been said, the important role played by local authorities in the development of tourist facilities and resources. However, I think that time is against me, so I shall not elaborate on that.

Wider training opportunities for both employers and employees in the tourist industry can and must be provided through the existing educational establishments and facilities. The Government recognised the new needs of Scotland's leisure industries and the deficiencies in existing educational training by establishing the Gunn committee in 1979. However, the Gunn report has still not been published even though the English equivalent, the Yates report, was, I believe, published about two years ago. The Secretary of State for Scotland has a duty to the House and to the STB to ensure that that report is published.

I welcome the Select Committee's report, because it outlines the problems facing the industry. Paragraph 121 reads:

> "At present the provisions for training for a career in tourism are pathetic".

I agree with that. I suspect that it is true of the whole of the United Kingdom. The report continues:

> "The BTA estimate that currently the tourist industry in the United Kingdom is generating upwards of 50,000 new jobs a year. This makes it the single biggest provider of new jobs in the economy, and it is vital that adequate education facilities are provided to ensure that people trained in basic skills are there to take the jobs."

I wholeheartedly agree with that analysis.

It is encouraging that the Committee also welcomed the intervention of the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry in stressing the need for spending in higher education in order to reflect the importance of training for tourism. The Committee recommends that > "the Government gives urgent consideration to ensuring that the higher education system is structured so that, throughout the United Kingdom, sufficient people trained with tourism-related qualifications arrive on the job market to meet the needs of the tourism industry."

Given the industry's importance to the Scottish economy, that is vital. That recommendation and the accompanying injunctions to develop collaborative links with industry and commerce are timely and are compatible with education institutions working within the framework for academic planning.

The report of the Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council has an important role to play in leisure management training and tourism training. A responsiveness to changing needs must be a central tenet of any educational institution in that area.

I believe that the key issue is the role of the existing institutions in providing education and training. The Secretary of State's decision, the report of the STEAC and the publication of the Gunn report are all vital. The Dunfermline college of physical education, which is in Edinburgh — so there are no constituency marks for my next point — has earned itself an important role by diversifying into this area of education and training during the past decade. I am happy to pay a richly deserved compliment to that college's management. It is vital that everything should be done to ensure that it continues to play that role, and that the college management should be allowed to continue its pioneering work unfettered. Education, training, research and development are as important to the tourist industry as they are to any other industry in the United Kingdom. That cannot be stressed enough.

8.44 pm

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I congratulate the Government on rearranging the business this week so that we can debate this subject tonight. I believe that there is no more important subject than the development of the tourist industry. But the timing of the debate is also good, because the number of tourists coming to Britain has taken a bit of a dive due to anxieties felt in the United States about the possibility of terrorist attacks — which have not, thank heaven, occurred — and to the strength of the pound against the dollar.

Nevertheless, it is important that we should consider the long-term strategy for developing tourism still further in this country. As has been said many times, jobs in the tourist sector are real jobs. We are talking about career opportunities and jobs. In the tourist industry, there are many diverse types of job. Moreover, many of those involved in manufacturing depend on tourists as well as on people in this country to buy their goods.

There is also a large labour content in tourism. The hotel and catering industry employs many people, and provides them with real jobs. Those jobs are not servile. For some reason, we have allowed it to be accepted that it is a servile occupation to wait in a restaurant or to serve in a hotel. The same attitude is not found in other countries — notably, the United States. In the United States, it is a joy to be served by people who have a professional interest in doing the job. They do it extremely well, and no one would ever say that they had a servile occupation.

We must raise educational standards in this country and train people in the right way. We must achieve the necessary attitude of mind if they are to play a real part in developing our tourist industry. I read with interest the Government's response to the recommendations contained in the excellent report of the Select Committee. Indeed, I pay a warm tribute to the work carried out by the members of that Committee for investigating the matter thoroughly and producing a stimulating and informative report which can be built on. I am not necessarily saying that I agree with everything in it, but there is an enormous amount with which I agree. I know that much work goes into providing the information available in the report, and I also know of the time involved in visiting different parts of the country. Such visits are vital if Members of Parliament are to obtain the right information and have first-hand knowledge.

The Government should take a bold step on education. It is not enough for the Government to say that they will encourage colleges to increase the number of courses available for career training in tourism. We must do something much bolder than that. We must increase the number of courses available and their content. It is important to have full discussions with those in the industry, so that our school leavers can go into the jobs that are available in the industry. It is vital that we should consider this issue within the broad context of what we are trying to do, and ensure that enough money is made available to do it. It is estimated that up to 250,000 new jobs will be created in the tourist industry during the next five years. We must provide people to fill those jobs.

A number of important courses are held within our universities, polytechnics and colleges. I do not criticise any of those courses, but I have to say that they do not go far enough in covering the breadth of the disciplines in the tourist industry. I should like to see a new college of excellence set up, and I have made that recommendation before. It could be set up on the lines of the Royal College of Art. That is one of our most excellent colleges and is regarded as such in the architectural design and art professions in Britain. It could also be a college on a par with Imperial college. The industry needs a focal point, and that is my reason for making that suggestion.

The subject of conferences is important for many hon. Members, and not least for me because my constituency has a fine conference centre. The report refers to the need to improve the promotion of Britain as a base for conferences. I echo that recommendation. Something more should be done to build Britain's reputation as a pleasant, enjoyable and safe place for international conferences. It is a highly competitive business, and we must recognise that we are in strict competition with Europe, the United States and other countries.

The Government have said that they will have discussions about this with the British Tourist Authority. I hope that they will take it further than just having discussions and will ensure that there is sufficient promotional finance available. Whichever way we look at it, money will be necessary if proper promotion is to be undertaken.

The report refers to the difficulties in constituencies like mine over the wholly inadequate system of calculating the grant-related expenditure formula. As my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) said, the data on which grant-related expenditure and visitor numbers are calculated go back to the 1970s. That is wholly out of step with changes that have taken place, not least in my constituency. It seems unfair that a town which has built a conference centre without any grants from Europe or from the Government, but has funded it wholly from the resources available to it in the form of loans and capital which bear heavily on the ratepayers, should, over successive years, have a reduction in the amount from the grant-related formula that has resulted in a high proportion of rates falling on each ratepayer to finance the conference centre. That also applies to a number of towns in Britain.

We have to recognise that a conference centre is not just for the benefit of a single town; its benefits go much wider. If the Government will relate the grants that are given to the development of facilities and to certain areas, that mechanism will allow the Government to encourage expenditure on the service sector in different parts of the country where the need is greatest.

Many of my hon. Friends have spoken about flexible licensing hours. I share the desire to see a change in the situation because for too long we have been wholly out of step with Europe and with most of the other countries in the free world. We must do something to change the ridiculous system under which somebody who comes out of a theatre in the evening and goes into a pub for a drink has to down it quickly before he is thrown out into the street because the pub is not allowed to stay open. I hope that in the next session some way will be found to bring licensing legislation before the House.

There is a minor but important way in which we could help people in the catering industry. At the moment restaurants are not permitted to sell alcohol with meals outside normal licensing hours. Extensions are applied for and in many cases freely given, but it is ridiculous that at certain times there is a cut-off and those dining in the restaurant find they cannot order a drink even though they are having a meal. Legislation introduced to correct that would not arouse a great deal of controversy and would go a long way towards easing the problem in restaurants.

We need a more positive approach to planning. Local authorities have begun to see the advantages of tourist projects. By responding quickly to applications, we can arouse enthusiasm and harness it to ensure that projects funded by private enterprise get off the ground. All too often an application is submitted and then there is a delay because of an inquiry or whatever. By the time it gets to the point where the planner is told that he can go ahead with the project, the people who are sponsoring it are fed up with the whole thing. That is because the climate has possibly changed and interest rates have gone up or down and nothing has happened and everybody has wasted two years of effort. Something needs to be done to spur on projects that will lead to employment.

We need to improve our methods of disseminating information about tourist areas. It is ridiculous that one cannot get adequate information at the point of port entry or at railway stations where people from abroad want to find out about travel. I know that something is being done, but let us do it fast and firmly.

The Select Committee report speaks about the grant of 30 per cent. towards the labour cost of keeping facilities open during an extra month at an unpopular time in the year. I depart from the members of the Committee on this recommendation because it could lead to a number of facilities being kept open for which there was no proper demand. One cannot successfully keep an ice cream parlour open if there is no one around to eat ice cream or go to a fun fair. Such money could be applied to building an infrastructure that would allow people more time to enjoy their leisure pursuits protected from the vagaries of our weather.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Does my hon. Friend think that people who have to pay 70 per cent. for keeping facilities open, because the recommended grant is only 30 per cent. of the labour costs and includes nothing towards overheads, would abuse that as they have to pay 70 per cent. out of their own pockets?

Mr. Banks: One of the problems would be defining which facilities or types of projects would apply for it. There is also a bureaucratic element in providing the grants for one twelfth of the year, and it could be abused. People would be inclined to take a gamble on the weather. If the weather was good, the results might be successful. It would be much better to provide people with protection from the weather.

Once again, I reiterate the importance of this debate. Our last debate on tourism took place some time ago. The tourist industry will provide more jobs, and that is what life is all about.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): I, too, welcome the report on tourism. It focuses attention on an extremely important industry.

First, I must declare two interests. Neither of them is particularly recent, but they are relevant to this debate. Early in this Parliament I was a member of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. It was at the time that the study of tourism was mooted. I had left the Committee by the time it began its deliberations on tourism, but I am pleased to say that during its deliberations the members of the Committee visited my constituency. Knowing of my interest in tourism, the Chairman of the Select Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), invited me to its meetings. They took place at Battle abbey and at Herstmonceux castle. Both meetings were interesting and useful. I shall deal later in my speech with the considerable and widespread interest in tourism in my constituency.

The second interest that I have to declare is that I began my business career by working in the tourist industry. When I left an American business school 20 years ago I went to work for the president of the American Express Company in New York. From that vantage point I quickly saw the importance of tourism to the national economies of countries large and small. Equally evident were the business ramifications of the international travel trade, not simply for hotels and restaurants and the turnstiles at historic monuments, but for high street shops, local transport, car rental and local publishing companies and many other businesses besides.

The Select Committee's report has highlighted the fundamental importance of tourism to this country. I shall not dwell on the statistics. However, the spending of £9 billion on tourism and the employment of 1 million people full-time and another 400,000 part-time speaks for itself. The British Tourist Authority has predicted that in 1988 about 16 million foreign visitors will come to this country. If tourist traffic continues to grow at the rate of 4 per cent. a year, another 400,000 people could be employed in the tourist trade by the early 1990s.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) pointed out that the tourist industry cannot be compared with the engineering industry or with any of the other great manufacturing industries in that there are no centres of mass employment. Employment in the tourist industry is diffused across the country. Nevertheless, employment in the tourist industry is vital. In our seaside resorts and in many other places the local community identifies its prosperity with the volume of tourist business that it enjoys.

Comments have been made about the Government's role in tourism and their response to the Select Committee's report. A number of Government initiatives are highlighted by the report. They are very welcome initiatives. The report says that, under the Development of Tourism Act 1969, about £14·5 million was spent on tourism in 1984 and that the Department of the Environment spent £17 million. Some of that money was spent under the guise of English Heritage, to which I shall refer in a moment.

The report also points out that under this Government central ministerial responsibility for tourism has been established. The responsibility is now in the hands of the

[Mr. Charles Wardle]

Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who is sitting on the Treasury Bench, my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier).

I wish to refer to two aspects of tourist development in my constituency, both of which were touched on by the Select Committee when it visited Battle abbey and Herstmonceux castle. There are numerous tourist attractions in my constituency of Bexhill and Battle. There are the seaside resorts, such as Bexhill-on-Sea, Norman's bay and Pevensey bay. It also contains a number of historic sites. Apart from Battle abbey, there are three castles in the constituency: Bodiam, Pevensey and Herstmonceux.

When the Select Committee visited Battle, it would have seen that tourism is very much part of the way of life there. People are attracted to Battle not only during the summer. For example, the Battle bonfire boys have been in existence for 300 years and they attract about 10,000 visitors to their bonfire night. That means much to local business. Furthermore, local business is making its own contribution by means of the "1066 Country" initiative. The East Sussex county council, the Rother district council and others are determined to focus as much attention as they can on the attractions of the history of that part of Sussex.

The Government are also playing a part by developing the local infrastructure, both in roads, as in the case of A21 and A27 improvements, and in the railway line. However, two particularly important points need to be brought to the attention of my hon. Friend. The first concerns investment by English Heritage in that part of Sussex. The Select Committee saw Battle abbey, where there are positive plans to develop tourism. It did not see Pevensey castle, however, where there is a small but nevertheless definite problem. The castle is looked after by English Heritage, but the Pevensey Town Trust is supposed to look after the environs. Only a few weeks ago the trust found that it had no funds to maintain the Pevensey cattle market site, which is the local car park, and had to close it. This has had a direct effect on local tourism. That is a typical example of how English Heritage could extend the scope of its activities if it were a little more ambitious and looked further than the project at Battle abbey.

English Heritage has also recently examined the Roman ruins at Beauport park, which could be developed and would bring more tourist trade both to Hastings and to Battle, and to the surrounding areas. Perhaps most important of all is Herstmonceux castle. I suspect that I would be ruled out of order if I were to embark on the various scientific arguments that surround the proposed move of the Royal Greenwich Observatory. However, the future of tourism at Herstmonceux castle is inextricably bound up with the decision to make that move.

The Chairman of the Science and Engineering Research Council said in March that tourism was not part of his brief. Together with my hon. Friends the Members for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone), for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) and for Hastings and Rye we pointed out to the Science and Engineering Research Council that tourism was a significant business in Herstmonceux and had attracted over 60,000 visitors. Since then, the council has made some important concessions on tourism. It has agreed to leave the astronomy exhibition centre in the park surrounding Herstmonceux castle, and will also leave some working observatories—the Equatorial Group—which should be sufficient attraction in themselves to make sure that the local tourist trade is not impaired.

The future of the castle remains a central concern to all those in east Sussex who wish to see tourism develop. I have suggested to English Heritage and to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science that the council should begin urgent consultations with English Heritage to see whether it cannot transfer or sell Herstmonceux castle to English Heritage. It would be a tragedy if, to raise the money that it needs to fund the proposed move of the observatory to Cambridge, the council sold the castle into private hands and the public could no longer visit it. Even with the astronomy exhibition centre in operation, the attractions of the castle itself would be lost to the visiting public, and that is something that we must avoid at all costs.

I hope that my hon. Friend will bear my next point in mind. Yesterday during Education and Science Questions, it seemed clear from the answers given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would not interfere with the council's decision. If that means that he will not guide it on the sale of the castle, tourism in east Sussex will be badly damaged. That is of central concern and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will respond to it in replying to the debate. I hope that my hon. Friend will consider that English Heritage can expand its investment in east Sussex at Battle abbey and at Herstmonceux castle. If so, we shall see more people employed in the tourist trade in that part of southern England.

9.9 pm

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): I wish to address myself to a restricted focus within the Select Committee report and the Government's response to it, that of seasonality. Great as is the employment provided by the tourist industry, its greatest single shortcoming is its seasonality — the fact that it does not provide employment for 12 months of the year. In most cases it does not provide pensionable employment. Therefore, the Select Committee was much taxed by the means through which the Government could assist in promoting what must be Government policy — that this enormous industry should be perennial rather than seasonal.

We discovered a circular position. Hoteliers complained that they could not attract residents because the facilities either did not open, or had closed, while many of the operators of facilities complained they could not keep their facilities open because there were not sufficient people in the hotels to patronise them. Both claims have demonstrable truth and justice in them. How, therefore, do we break out of that? How do we persuade operators to stay open later, or to open earlier in the year than they are prepared to do in their commercial judgment?

The Committee's answer was that the Government should pay a grant of 30 per cent. of the labour costs, not the overheads, of operators staying open for one month extra, for two years. We claim no magic for the figure of 30 per cent. We did not make any recommendation about whether the month should be in one slug, at the beginning or the end. PAYE returns will show when businesses were open in the previous year. The Committee has also recognised that many of the enterprises providing facilities for tourists are run by the self-employed, so that recommendation must apply to the self-employed as well as to the employing.

I am deeply disappointed that the Government's response was wholly negative, and I do not know how the Minister wishes us to interpret his apparent assertion that the tourist boards are responsible with him for rejecting the recommendation. Page 8 of the Government's response states:

"The Government's view, shared by the tourist boards, is that the combination of creative marketing with selected project development is the most effective way of dealing with the problems of seasonality and that the growing success of the Boards' campaign makes it unnecessary to explore alternative approaches such as subsidising the labour costs of tourist facilities in the way the Select Committee has suggested."

None of the tourist boards had the courtesy to write to the Select Committee to say that they were advising the Minister to reject the recommendation. I do not wish to accuse them unjustly, and I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to intervene now if his reply has been misread. If he is attributing to the tourist boards advice to him to reject our suggestion which they have not made to him, I ask him to intervene now and correct me so that I do not attribute to them something that they have not done.

Mr. Trippier: Let me make it absolutely clear that the view expressed by the boards is the view shared by the Government—the Department of Employment—and, if my hon. Friend wishes, me in particular. I shall refer to that when I reply and try to develop the reasons why I reject the proposition.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I am wholly happy that my hon. Friend should tell me why the Government reject it. But he appears to be attributing the Government's rejection to the tourist boards' rejection. The tourist boards have not told the Select Committee that they rejected our suggestion. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to send the Clerk of our Committee the letters from the tourist boards in which they have advised him to reject the specific recommendation of our Committee. My hon. Friend is inviting the House to reject our recommendation in paragraph 109 on the basis of the tourist boards' advice, and I am wholly unaware that the tourist boards have given any such advice.

Mr. Trippier: I do not understand how my hon. Friend interprets that from the paragraph that he has read out which is at the top of page 8. The first line says:

"The Government's view, shared by the tourist boards". What is wrong with that?

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: The tourist boards have not expressed any such view to the Select Committee. All I am saying is that if they have expressed such a view to my hon. Friend the Minister, but have not bothered to tell the Select Committee, I, and I am sure my colleagues on the Select Committee, would like to know the terms in which they have advised my hon. Friend the Minister to reject that.

I can do little better than specifically to draw to the attention of the House paragraph 109—and I am not given to reading to the House. We said:

"A circular situation can exist whereby tourist facilities of all kinds close as what is seen as the 'season' draws to its end: and accommodation for tourists closes as there are not enough facilities still open to attract people into an economic occupation of the accommodation. Yet it is in the public interest to lengthen the holiday season, both to prolong employment and to get the best return from the public investment in infrastructure and holiday facilities."

I do not see how anybody can depart from that reasoning. We go on to say:

"PAYE records will, in most cases, show during what period facilities were in fact functioning in a given year. It might be possible therefore to break this unproductive cycle by offering public money to pay a proportion of the labour costs of remaining open for a specified period longer than the previous year, both to promote longer employment, and to measure the cumulative effect of such a prolongation."

The Committee did not claim that it knew the answer to such an experiment. We believe that such an experiment is worth while, and that nobody can know the answer until the experiment has been conducted.

We then go on in bold print with our recommendation, which says:

"We therefore recommend that for two years the Government should pay a grant of 30 per cent. of the labour cost of tourist facilities remaining open for one month additional to the period which the enterprise concerned (be it accommodation, catering, or other holiday facility) was open in the previous year, the regional tourist board being the arbiter for payment and qualification."

That is one of the most constructive and positive suggestions that the Committee put forward. From whomever we took evidence, the point was made that it is an immensely seasonal business.

I must point out to my hon. Friend the Minister that the Government are moving more and more in the direction of wanting the private sector to take over the financing of pensions for people in this country, rather than the public sector. If they hold that view coherently and consistently, they must want the tourist industry, which is now such a major employer, to be perennial and to supply pensionable employment rather than seasonal and not supply pensionable employment.

It is all very well for the Minister to reject our recommendation and say:

"The Government's view, shared by the tourist boards, is that a combination of creative marketing with selected project development is the most effective way of dealing with the problem of seasonality".

But has it been effective? It has not.

I do not believe that the tourist boards have written to my hon. Friend saying, "Reject the Committee's view and we will support you." I believe that if they had done so my hon. Friend would have the elementary courtesy to send the Committee copies of the letters concerned, which he has not done. I also believe that the tourist boards would have sent us copies. I believe, in the absence of such evidence, that he is attributing to the tourist boards a view which they have not expressed.

Mr. Kennedy: A conspiracy.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I am not indulging in conspiracy theories, but I do believe that he is attributing to the tourist boards a specific view of our recommendations that they have not expressed.

I have focused on this point because my personal opinion is that the seasonality of the industry is one of its greatest vices as an employer. The Committee was much seized of that point. Of course, we covered many other things as well; but my dedication is not to expanding peaks, important as that is, but to turning the industry into a perennial one.

Look through the rest of our report, with its many useful and valuable recommendations, and accept them if the Government will, but why reject one of the most creative suggestions, where 70 per cent. of the labour cost risk and the whole of the overhead cost risk falls on the entrepreneur who applies for the grant? Why is it likely to be abused, when 70 per cent. of labour costs and the whole of the overhead costs fall on the entrepreneur who takes advantage of it? I suspect that it is rejected because it involves spending a bit more money. That is my honest opinion. I ask my hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who is now in charge of tourism throughout the United Kingdom, to reconsider this. It is a very good bargain for the taxpayer because the people who will be taken on would otherwise be drawing unemployment benefit or supplementary benefit.

Undeniably, it costs hoteliers more money to open earlier or stay open later. Staying open later can involve heating costs which can be considerable. Opening earlier may involve them in additional advertisement costs, but we want to persuade them to put their foot in the water and find that it is not freezing. We want to persuade them to try a longer season, slightly reducing their exposure, and then find that it pays them, so that after two years they would do it wholly with their own money and not at all with the Government's. We say two years. In the second year – let there be no misunderstanding about this – it would have to be a month longer than in the first year — [Interruption.] Does my hon. Friend the Minister wish to contribute?

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): No.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I hoped that he would.

In the second year, those who wanted to benefit would have to be open two months longer than in the base year. That is the proposition that has been dismissed in such a cavalier way. I should like to see the letters from the tourist board because I should like to know the reasons that they gave the Minister — if they did, because I do not believe that they did — for turning down that positive recommendation.

The only other comment that I wish to make is about our structural recommendations. The money spent on promotion of tourism can do three things. It can persuade people to come from abroad to the United Kingdom who otherwise would not have come. It can persuade people from abroad to spend money on a longer tourist season in Britain, or it can rob Peter to pay Paul: it can merely persuade people to go to one location in the United Kingdom rather than another.

Unfortunately, it is that third facet that can well involve much public expenditure. At the moment, because we have a different system of financing from public money, from the Consolidated Fund, from the same taxpayers' money, tourism in Scotland or Wales or Northern Ireland compared with England, there are no cohesive parameters to that expenditure. That is why the Committee recommended a structure for the United Kingdom as a whole. We did not make recommendations as to what its criteria should be internally, but we recommended having a coherent structure, which we do not have at the moment.

My hon. Friend the Minister and, indeed, the House may be unaware that when we asked the civil servants from the Department of Trade and Industry who was responsible for the overall allocation of money within the United Kingdom on tourism they said that the Treasury was. We then sent for Treasury Ministers and said that the Department of Trade and Industry had said that they were responsible. We asked what their criteria were. The answer was, "They were wrong: we are not responsible." So we ended up discovering that nobody is responsible. This must be the only aspect of public expenditure in which no Minister acknowledges being responsible for the allocation of expenditure within the United Kingdom. That is unique.

In rejecting the Committee's recommendations, the Government have not put anything in the place of our recommendation. It is just left hanging in the air, with the Government rejecting our recommendation. Remember — I say "remember" because it is forgotten — that the Select Committees were set up in the first place to replace the old Estimates Committee and to try to bring coherence into public accountability. That is often forgotten.

If my hon. Friend the Minister rejects the Select Committee's solution to the problem of a coherent allocation of funds throughout the United Kingdom, what does he propose to put in its place? Does he propose to put nothing in its place, and to continue the existing system where there is no rationale within the United Kingdom for expenditure from the Consolidated Fund between England, Scotland, Wales, and Ulster? That is the conundrum into which my hon. Friend the Minister will plunge the Government if he rejects the Select Committee's recommendation.

My hon. Friend the Minister was perfectly entitled to find another solution in place of that suggested by the Select Committee. However, if he rejects the Select Committee's solution after the problem has been exposed and puts nothing in its place for the coherent allocation of funds for the promotion of tourism, by default he will state that he and the Government are happy with a chaotic, unjustifiable, illogical, irrational and capricious allocation of public expenditure between the different parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): We have had an example in this debate of Select Committees working at their best. I believe that the Select Committee report is of a high quality. It is full of interesting and positive ideas.

The contributions by the Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), and by the other members of the Committee have shown the wide range of expertise that was brought to the task. Reading the report was an education for me.

On the other hand, the Government response to the report has been — to be polite — dismal. We have seen a fund of interesting ideas and a dismal Government response. The Government, in the face of these interesting recommendations, have more or less said, "Very interesting, but none of them is workable and the Treasury would not like them anyway."

Enough hon. Members have stressed how vital tourism is. Expenditure in the industry was £10 billion in 1984 and the forecast for 1988 is £14 billion. The industry employs more than 1 million workers and is on course to be the largest employer in the nation. Some of us have been guilty in the past – and at times we should admit such guilt — of ridiculing service industries such as tourism. Many of us have learnt that we should not do that to an industry which is bigger than most of the other manufacturing sectors and which has more potential than most.

The Select Committee report has produced some fascinating information. It reveals that 50 million overseas visitors come to this country, of whom 20 per cent. are business and conference visitors. That is a healthy trend and things appear to be on course, although there has been a sad setback. Over the past weeks I have spoken to people in the tourist business. Many believe that they are entitled to compensation from the Government as they have received a tremendous slap to their revenue, income and livelihood because of the Government's decision to offer bases to the United States. Perhaps some of the costs of the promotional work being carried out by British Airways and others in the United States should be taken up by the Government. I do not see why British Airways, British Caledonian and others should have to pay to correct a problem which has arisen through no fault of their own.

The Select Committee also dug up other worrying matters. The hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) referred to the seasonality of tourism in some depth and made some interesting points. Employment in the tourist industry is not all short-term, seasonal, low-paid or on the whim of an employer for a few days or weeks. There is much long-term, pensionable employment in the tourist industry and the Opposition would be the first to admit that. But there is also a lot of the other kind of employment. As in every other industry, I hope that good, non-seasonal, well-paid jobs will emerge in the tourist industry. One way to achieve that is through better trade union organisation and better standards of work.

The very high level of unemployment in this country also affects domestic tourism. As the Select Committee pointed out, we are talking about not just foreigners coming here but British people holidaying in Britain. The most chilling figure in the report is that 40 per cent. of British people never have a holiday away from home, either here or overseas. That is a sobering thought for those who, like most Members of Parliament, have holidays every year, and it is a sad comment on the perspectives and prospects of many people's lives in 1986. There is major scope for the expansion of domestic tourism.

We have a vital and important tourist industry, but there is much to be done. What seems to emerge from the report of the all-party Select Committee is a desire not just for coherence, to which the hon. Member for Tiverton referred, but for a positive, creative Government policy for tourism. The Government brag about developments in tourism, sometimes as a political move to draw people's eyes away from the terrible decline in manufacturing industry, but at the bottom line of their response to the report there is no positive policy for the development of the tourist industry in the long term. Many of the Select Committee recommendations suggest that there should be such a policy, but that Government policy at present is uncertain, fragmented and unco-ordinated.

One does not have to agree with all the Select Committee's proposals on structure to understand the need to do something about the national, regional and local organisation of tourism in this country and its promotion overseas, and nothing that has been said in the debate has persuaded me otherwise. This most important industry must have a positive, planned approach, because without such an approach — ironically, this is the problem — it runs against market forces. The Government are still dominated by the idea that everything will turn out all right if market forces are allowed to go their own way, but in the tourist industry the result will be disaster. In this, as in so many other industries, we need a positive relationship between the private and the public sectors.

I mention just one small instance. There has been the most wonderful rebirth of the canal system in this country, especially in my constituency and in that of the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), both of which are linked by canals. The canal system has been brought back to life not by private investment but by public investment. That development has just begun and it has a great future. Once the public sector, whether it be central or local government, makes the heavy investment necessary to bring the system back to life, the private sector will move in to build hotels, leisure facilities, pubs, and the rest — and so it should. But first there must be a planned investment in the infrastructure. A positive relationship between the private and public sectors is therefore vital.

Planning is also important in relation to the short season of employment in the tourist industry. I have listened carefully to what has been said about this aspect, and I believe that the Government should think again about the very positive measures that have been suggested. They have been rejected because it means the Government taking an initiative and saying — pragmatically, not ideologically — "We shall try having the public sector take a lead."

A matter to which the Select Committee did not turn its mind, but which affects me as I have four children of school age, is the blight on tourism of school holidays and the traditional works and factory holidays. As many people are restricted to taking their holidays in just six weeks of the year, it is no wonder that the tourist season is so short. It might be sensible to discuss that narrow vision of holidays with the Department of Education and Science because it is important to expand the tourist season.

I have great sympathy with the Minister, who has a large brief. I know that, because I have a large shadow brief. It is impossible to give a Minister a brief for education and training, virtually the whole of the Manpower Services Commission, co-operatives and small businesses, and at the end to add tourism. We need a Minister who can devote a great deal of his time to tourism. It is a vital industry, so why is there not a Minister responsible for tourism who could bring together the Departments concerned?

I believe that the shift in responsibility for tourism from the Department of Trade and Industry to the Department of Employment was a retrograde step, made for political purposes.

Mr. Trippier: Rubbish.

Mr. Sheerman: The Minister and I have to disagree on some matters.

There should be not a positive public relations exercise, but a real shift in emphasis to a Minister with real power co-ordinating all the efforts in the tourist industry. There must be a more positive lead from the Government in creative partnership between the private and public sectors. A creative partnership in many tourism and leisure projects could be beneficial in the medium to long term. The public sector could provide the essential infrastructure and the private sector could build on it. How can there be forward planning without a real move towards thinking and planning for the long term?

The Select Committee must surely have noticed, as it went about the country, that some of the most important initiatives in tourism development have been taken by local councils. West Yorkshire has suffered a body blow to tourist development with the abolition of the metropolitan county council, which was carrying out positive and creative work in tourism. That gap cannot be filled in the short term by the local councils. The Select Committee must surely have realised that, with the one hand, the Government have abolished some authorities while, with the other, they have placed the remaining local authorities in a straitjacket as regards the amount of finance and initiative they can put into tourist development. They are hampered at every turn. They have lost their ability under section 142 to raise money, and they have no compensation because of the abolition of the metropolitan counties. That has been a sad blow to local authorities which have been trying to show the way forward. Local councils know what they can do in their own areas.

We want a tourist policy that reaches the parts that tourist policy has never reached before. Tourism is ready to be exploited all over the region in areas such as my own. Good jobs can be created out of tourism.

Promotion is not enough. Someone said to me the other day that tourists come to this country to learn about British history, not to experience it. That is important to remember.

These days, people expect high standards of service. I have heard many remarks about poor service in this country. That leads me to education and training. The Government's policies and their answers to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry are laughable. If industrial training boards are abolished, training takes place on a voluntary basis. We know that not every industry carries out training. The tourist industry cannot be excused for not undertaking enough training and for not achieving high quality training.

The hon. Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks), made an excellent point when he said that we need a centre of excellence. Cornell university, across the Atlantic, has a magnificent hotel management course. That course is renowned. It is in one of the best universities in America. Let us compare that with our education and training effort. We need to train people properly.

Many people in this country do not like service. The class system does not exist in the United States. I dine in restaurants in London quite often. I have seen guests treat waiters and waitresses in a way that they would never treat them in the United States. That is another reason why people do not like service. Let us have tourism, but let us have a positive, planned tourist policy that takes us somewhere, and let us have a Government who will deliver it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): We have had an interesting and wide-ranging debate on what is, I think we would all agree, one of the most important subjects that we could discuss on the Floor of the House. I am disappointed that members of the Select Committee are concerned about the Government's reply to the Committee's recommendations. I found that the Select Committee carried out a detailed and thorough study. Its contribution to the debate on tourism is widely welcomed, and I can agree with much of the report.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) accurately described some of the issues as controversial. It was the major ones which were controversial and which, in the end, we rejected. I think that I am under a moral obligation, in the short time that I have at my disposal, to try to elaborate on the reasons why we rejected the two major proposals. My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar referred to one, and my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) referred to the other.

I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) said at the outset that it had taken a year for the report to be completed. When the report was started, the responsibility for tourism was vested in the Department of Trade and Industry. It is perhaps somewhat strange that it should end up with that Department, but I am glad that it did. It is a bit like Magnus Magnusson on "Mastermind", where once something is started it must be finished. One does actually start with an initiative. I am glad that after all the research and hard work, the report was completed and I welcome many of the proposals. They are a great contribution to the debate.

Of course, an awful lot happened in that year. Although hon. Members have been kind enough to refer to one or two events, the point made by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), is the most significant of all. Responsibility for tourism moved from the Department of Trade and Industry to the Department of Employment. Not only did that give a higher profile to the industry, which all hon. Members seemingly support, but it was a clear recognition that we had a sector that had the wealth and job creation potential that we could not see in others.

At the same time, and for exactly the same reasons, we moved the responsibility of sponsorship for small firms. That was pointed out by my noble Friend long before he became Secretary of State for Employment. He was able to see the enormous potential in the sector. Not everybody who has spoken today saw that potential when he did. I should have thought that more credit would be given to him for taking on board the production of PLJ, as we affectionately know it—pleasure, leisure and jobs. That was developing all the time. The White Papers on deregulation are an important part of the process, but as far as I can remember nobody has mentioned them today.

It would be churlish of me to avoid answering questions that hon. Members have asked. The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) asked me to draw to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland what he said about signposting. I am not sure whether my right hon. and learned Friend was in the Chamber at the time, but I am now under an obligation to write to him. I shall do that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) made an important point. The Department has an enormous task in trying to convince people in the north, especially in local government, of the enormous advantages of tourism and of the potential in their areas. My hon. Friend drew our attention to Bradford. The hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) talked of local authorities realising the potential in their areas. The Bradford example can be held up to the whole nation. It all started with a photographic museum, which now attracts more than 1 million visitors a year. Who would have thought it? If somebody had told me or the hon. Member for Rotherham 10 years ago that Bradford could be turned into a tourist area and that a major tourist attraction would draw 1 million visitors a year, we should

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): On behalf of Bradford council, may I thank my hon. Friend for that advertisement? It will be greatly welcomed and I hope that it will generate a lot of custom from hon. Members during the summer recess.

Although it is obviously beneficial to widen the areas of tourism away from the traditional centres, tourism brings to areas such as Bradford an improved environment. More important, it brings an improved image, which leads to all manner of other benefits when it comes to attracting industry and improving the morale of local people in a depressed city area.

Mr. Trippier: The knock-on effect is often missed when we consider these matters. The best thing to come out of the debate — it was hinted at in the Select Committee report — is an acknowledgement of the fact that, whenever possible, we should approach these matters in a bipartisan way. I should like to take this opportunity to pay a compliment to many Labour councillors whom I have met and who have taken responsibility as members of regional tourist boards, for example. Many Conservatives are also involved. When it comes to tourism, they seem to bury the political hatchet and get on with the job, recognising that we have here a sector that can create wealth and work. Unfortunately, the same is not true for the House.

The thrust of the Select Committee's report is that there should be a British tourist board. The Committee used several tables. I appreciate that officials in the House and hon. Members have put in an awful lot of work, and I pay tribute to them for that. The tables, especially those on pages xxix and xxxiii, try to develop the argument that Government funding shows a disproportionate spend in favour of Scotland and Wales compared with England. The correlation between the tourism spend in England and the lower percentage grant is set out elsewhere.

The table that appears on page xxii is interesting, but no one seems to have referred to it. I studied it this afternoon at some length. If we extrapolate the correlation to which my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar referred to its logical conclusion, the tourist spend in London appears to suggest that the Government should support London more than any other area. The spend in London is obviously far higher than elsewhere, and disproportionate. However, I am sure that no one in this place would seriously suggest, unless he were fighting for his London constituency a little overmuch, that the Government should contemplate more spending from the tourism grant on London. It is the Government's policy to try to encourage the dispersal of tourists, which the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye acknowledged, from London into the regions, including areas of higher unemployment.

Mr. Crowther: The Minister is overlooking the fact that according to the table on page xxii the Government are already spending almost twice as much on tourism in London as in any other area listed in the chart.

Mr. Trippier: I thought that someone would say that. When spending is considered in proportion to London's population, it is a drop in the bucket.

No reference has been made to the level of unemployment in Wales and Scotland and how that compares with the average level in England. The latest figures show that there is 16·8 per cent. unemployment in Wales, 15·6 per cent. in Scotland and 12·9 per cent. in England. When Ministers at the Scottish and Welsh Offices gave evidence to the Select Committee they argued effectively, as some hon. Members have today, including the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), that it is extremely difficult to stimulate tourism. The region which I represent in part has the same problem. The problem is faced by the north-west, and very much so in Yorkshire and Humberside. Bradford, however, has shown us what can be done. It has shown other local authorities what the private sector and the Government can do together in partnership. I have no disagreement with the hon. Member for Huddersfield on that ground.

I welcome the contribution of the hon. Member for Huddersfield. It was quite a revelation for me, but not because he said it. I know the hon. Gentleman to be a decent chap. However, he is peddling propaganda which perhaps has not been approved by the Labour party. A number of Labour Members — some of them could be described loosely as distinguished members of the Labour party, like the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) — seem from time to time to delight in rubbishing tourism.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East refers to those who are engaged in tourism as glorified ice-cream salesmen. Mr. Ken Livingstone has referred to jobs in tourism as Mickey Mouse jobs. This is serious. The hon. Member for Huddersfield will recognise that as a Minister I have a number of responsibilities and a great deal of work to do, and I think that he will have his work cut out in trying to persuade his right hon. and hon. Friends that they should stop the silly business of rubbishing tourism. We get it whenever there are employment questions, and it does an enormous amount of harm. Most important of all, it is an insult to those who are working in tourism. It is a gross insult to them at whatever level they work.

I hope that I have demonstrated that the Government have given careful consideration to the Select Committee's report. I feel that I am under an obligation to write to my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton to explain our thought processes. I shall detail them as far as I am able as they are set out in any letters that may be available to him.

I assure the House that we have given the report very serious consideration. I welcome most of its recommendations. I suppose that the most welcome thing is that we all agree that we have a most dynamic industry, which will certainly go from strength to strength.

9.59 pm

Mr. Warren: I wish only to acknowledge the value of this debate. I commend to my hon. Friend the Minister further study of the statistics that he quoted. At first sight, he may not have interpreted them correctly. However, I value his kind assistance to us in answering the debate, and I hope that his work will lead to extra incentives to promote tourism.

[Mr. Warren]

Accordingly, I beg to ask leave to withdrawn the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

The original Question was deferred, pursuant to paragraph (4) of Standing Order No. 19 (Consideration of Estimates).

It being Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the deferred Questions necessary to dispose of the proceedings on Estimates 1986-87, Class XV, Vote 2 and Class VII, Vote 1.

Class XV, Vote 2

Resolved,

That a further sum, not exceeding £4,290,850,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1987 for expenditure by the Department of Health and Social Security on supplementary pensions and allowances.

Class VII, Vote 1

Resolved,

That a further sum, not exceeding £759,406,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1987 for expenditure by the Department of Employment on the promotion of tourism, including grants in aid, general labour market services, including a grant in aid, services for seriously disabled people and an international subscription.

Northern Ireland (Housing)

10.1 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Richard Needham): I beg to move,

That the draft Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 12th May, be approved.

The draft order provides assistance for eligible owners of certain defective houses sold by the public sector in Northern Ireland. It also extends the right-to-buy provisions of the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1983 for secure tenants of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and provides new statutory rights for secure tenants of the Housing Executive and registered housing associations.

The draft order was the subject of wide consultation. In addition to the Assembly, comments were also received from 16 other sources and individuals, and all these were considered carefully before deciding on the text of the draft order which is now before this House.

The method of assistance in part II is based on a similar scheme provided in Great Britain in the Housing Defects Act 1984. However, in Northern Ireland we have only the Orlit type of prefabricated reinforced concrete house and it is the intention that only this type of house will be designated under the draft order in the first instance.

Of course, we received a number of representations during the consultation period for other house types to be designated, notably aluminium bungalows and houses with defective flues. However, although the legislation provides a general framework within which other house types can be designated, I am not satisfied that these particular house types meet the criteria for designation as set out in article 4 of the draft order. I must tell the House that at the moment there do not appear to be any other substantial classes which are likely to be designated.

The Housing Executive has sold only 200 of the Orlit houses out of a total stock of about 3,000. Initially our proposals will apply only to those 200. The assistance to be provided under the draft order will be either a grant towards reinstatement or, in certain circumstances, repurchase. However, I think that it is only fair that I should say that in practice assistance will take the form of repurchase rather than reinstatement. That is because it seems very likely that the costs of repair on those Orlit homes will be higher than the market value of the houses after reinstatement.

As for the 2,800 Orlit houses which remain in the Housing Executive's ownership, I must stress that the process of deterioration is gradual, and I wish to assure the tenants who occupy them that the Housing Executive has carried out full technical investigations which have confirmed there is no immediate danger. Even those Orlit houses in which the corrosion is most advanced have a serviceable life of between five and 10 years without the need for remedial action, while the others have a life of up to 30 years. Many of those homes will provide good housing for a long time to come. None the less, I am conscious that there are genuine anxieties about the future of Orlit houses especially from tenants who will not benefit from the provisions in this order. Therefore, the Housing Executive is presently considering ways of dealing with the Orlit houses which remain in its stock. Some proposals have already been announced and other proposals will be developed on an estate-by-estate basis after the Housing Executive has consulted the tenants and their public representatives.

Part III of the draft order deals with the rights of secure tenants. Since 1979 over 30,000 houses have been sold by the Housing Executive under its voluntary sales scheme and it has provided tenants with better terms and conditions of purchase than the Government's statutory right to buy. The scheme already incorporates all the advantages for tenant purchases included in the Housing and Planning Bill at present before Parliament. Nevertheless, although we do more, it must be right that we bring the statutory scheme in Northern Ireland into line with the parallel legislation in Great Britain, although the voluntary scheme of the Housing Executive goes considerably further than the proposals in the draft order.

The order enacts the improvements in the right-to-buy provisions in the Housing and Building Control Act 1984. At the earliest opportunity I intend to introduce the further advantages contained in the Housing and Planning Bill currently before the House. Chapter I deals with the right to buy and makes some important improvements in the statutory scheme. The proposals before the House which have already been incorporated in the executive's voluntary sales scheme will, first enable tenants in property in which the Housing Executive has a leasehold to have the same right to buy as tenants where the executive owns the property outright. Secondly, they will reduce the minimum tenancy period before entitlement to discount starts from three years to two years, and, thirdly, they will raise the maximum level of discount from 50 per cent. to 60 per cent. In addition, the range of public sector tenancies which can be considered for qualification for discount purposes is extended. Tenants of the executive will have the right to purchase their homes on an equity sharing basis. I repeat that on a voluntary basis we have been doing that for about a year.

Sheltered housing for the mentally disordered is added to the other types of sheltered housing already excluded from the right to buy and I am sure that hon. Members agree with that. The criteria used to identify sheltered schemes and housing for the elderly are clarified. These are designed to reflect the way that sheltered accommodation has expanded and will also ensure that only houses which are clearly identifiable as suitable for the elderly will be excluded from the right to buy. The remaining provisions of chapter I are designed to remove uncertainties and anomalies in the existing legislation.

Part III, chapter II, contains two new rights for secure tenants; the right to exchange and the right to repair. The right to exchange is an extension of existing practice and the right to repair will give registered housing associations new responsibilities towards their tenants. Under the right to exchange a secure tenant will usually be able to assign his tenancy to another secure tenant. Under the right to repair a secure tenant will be able to carry out, or to have carried out, repairs for which his landlord is responsible and to recover the costs. I will, of course, consult the Housing Executive and other organisations such as housing associations representing public sector landlords about the details of the scheme.

Part IV of the order contains a number of miscellaneous and supplementary provisions dealing mainly with recovery of grants to housing associations, indemnities to private sector lenders, and succession rights to statutory tenancies. The proposals on PRC homes are important to the private sector as they give relief to certain private owners who, through no fault of their own, purchased defective houses from the public housing stock. Part III of the legislation beings the law into line with existing practice and is a further step in giving tenants an individual say in the management of their homes. I trust that the House will agree that this is a sensible and a desirable measure. I am sure that the House will support it.

10.8 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I congratulate the Minister on his fluency, on his grasp of the order, and on the way he took the House through it. He will pardon me if I speak with less fluency in trying to make a number of small points about the order. As we know, and as the Minister said, it is designed to provide legislation in Northern Ireland which corresponds to the provisions of the Housing Defects Act 1984 and the Housing and Building Control Act 1984. Both these Acts are now consolidated in the Housing Act 1985. Thus, there is parity in United Kingdom legislation. It knits together provisions that are equally appliable to England, Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales.

The order has two primary objectives. The first is to compensate those who bought system-built houses which were previously in the public sector and which have now been found to have fundamental defects. The Minister sought to assure those who are living in the system-built houses that are not defective. We welcome his assurances. I am sure that Northern Ireland tenants will also welcome them. The second objective of the order is to promote the purchase of public sector houses by their tenants.

We welcome the first objective. Nevertheless, we should like to examine some of the discussions that took place in the Northern Ireland Assembly and some of its recommendations. The Northern Ireland Assembly scrutinised this order. I do not wish to bore the House by referring again to the dissolution of the Northern Ireland Assembly. The decision to dissolve the Assembly was taken by this House, but it is a matter of regret that Northern Ireland Assembly Members are unable to continue their effective scrutinising role.

I have before me three reports of the Northern Ireland Assembly. One of the reports deals with this order. The others deal with homelessness in Northern Ireland. It must be a matter of some regret that those who best understand the problems of Northern Ireland and who produced these reports are no longer functioning in the interests of their constituents and in the interests of those in Northern Ireland who look to them for help. I hope that it will not be too long before those hon. Members who were members of the Northern Ireland Assembly again participate in our affairs.

It is also a matter of regret that the recommendations that were made by the Northern Ireland Assembly's scrutinising committee were not acted upon by the Government. The Minister referred to some of the recommendations. There were 24 further submissions by organisations and individuals, and their recommendations and suggestions were not taken up by the Government. I trust that their failure to take into account the views of others does not arise from indifference but, rather, from the weakness of the arguments that were put before the Government.

I have to confess that I was somewhat bemused by the illogicality of the Northern Ireland Assembly's first recommendation. It recommended that the Department of the Environment should consider means whereby the owners of house types in the private sector should be treated equally with those which had been in the public sector but which had been sold off by the Housing Executive. The Minister referred to aluminium bungalows and to those dwellings with defective flue linings and said that he was not satisfied that they ought to be part of the order. We must accept his explanation.

The Minister also said that that although the Government's reinstatement grant amounts to 90 per cent., whereas that Northern Ireland Assembly recommended that it should be 100 per cent., he is looking for the repurchase of those houses, in which case the reinstatement grant will not necesasarily be taken into account.

Is the Minister able to tell the House why the other recommendations in the report of the Northern Ireland Assembly's scrutinising committee were set aside and why other submissions by various interested parties were not taken into account? I am aware that copies of the Government's response to the Northern Ireland Assembly's report are in the Library of the House of Commons, but a brief explanation of why the recommendations were set aside would be welcomed.

We note what the Minister said about the sale of council houses, but we are anxious to ensure that the overall level of public housing in Northern Ireland is not reduced. Housing is a major issue for those who live in Northern Ireland, as it is for those who live in the rest of the United Kingdom. We acknowledge the work done by the Housing Executive over the years to ensure better standards of housing for all people in Northern Ireland. Nevertheless, the housing lists are long enough without their being made longer by the sale of council houses.

There is no doubt an ideological difference between the two sides of the House about the sale of council houses, but many who buy their council houses are unaware of how difficult things can become when one loses a job and ends on the dole and finds it difficult to meet mortgage payments. A reduced housing stock would make it even more difficult to house people who are already homeless, and also those who might find themselves unable to keep up with the purchase of their house and need to move back into a council house.

The Minister has told us that council houses have been sold for a year. What happens to the proceeds from those sales? Are they held by the Housing Executive as capital receipts and subject to the same rules as those that affect local councils in this country, so that only 20 per cent. of such proceeds can be used to reinvest in housing, or will there be, or is there, a special dispensation for Northern Ireland? The Opposition feel that the present levels of funding will mean that the Northern Ireland Housing Executive will be forced to end virtually all repair and renovation grants and to cut its new build programme.

Articles 38 and 39 deal with other rights of secure tenants, whether the rental will increase as a result of certain improvements, and the right to carry out repairs. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) has already welcomed a report published by the Private Housing Action group which touches on these articles, but relates to the operation of the Rent (Northern Ireland) Order 1978. My right hon. and learned Friend pointed out that the timely publication of this report, coming so soon after the McDowell judgment, which highlighted the predicament of private housing in Northern Ireland, provided valuable information on the true situation of those covered by the court ruling.

The report made a clear and cogent case for reform of the Rent (Northern Ireland) Order 1978, which refers to rent-controlled tenancies. It is our view that until such reforms take place many thousands of tenants will be left without any recourse to the law, even if injured by the failure of landlords to comply with the law. Such a situation clearly negates one of the central purposes of the rent order, allowing no effective remedy for those faced with dilatory or recalcitrant landlords. Private tenants in Northern Ireland are thereby left without the right that provides important protection to similar tenants in England.

I accept that we might be moving somewhat wider than the order, and I do not wish to detain the House longer on that issue. However, it is a matter of regret that the order cannot be amended and therefore we are not able to take into account the curious situation resulting from the McDowell judgment on private tenants.

We welcome the order and accept the thrust of the Minister's argument. We have expressed our anxieties, and no doubt at an opportune moment he will respond to them.

10.18 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I do not wish to be disagreeable to the Minister when I say that this is a cock-eyed way to proceed. The Secretary of State, in his letter says:

"The main purposes of the Proposal are to provide legislation in Northern Ireland corresponding to the Housing Defects Act 1984 and to the housing provisions of the Housing and Building Control Act 1984."

When the Bill that underlay the Housing Defects Act 1984 was first brought before the House, my hon. Friends and I asked that it might apply to Northern Ireland. We saw no reason why the benefits to purchasers of ex-public authority housing which were provided in Great Britain by the 1984 Act should not become available at the same time to those similarly situated in Northern Ireland. Indeed, the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who was then the Minister, at one stage believed and hoped that that might be possible. That hope has not been realised. A glance at the order will show that it comes into force two months after the order is made following the approval of a draft, which will no doubt take place tonight. In other words, for between two and three years the citizens of Northern Ireland have been deprived of the advantages accruing to those in identical circumstances in Great Britain simply because of the determination which has hitherto existed to legislate for Northern Ireland separately from the rest of the United Kingdom and by Order in Council under the 1984 Act.

There was no practicable difficulty in bringing Northern Ireland within the scope of the 1984 Act. It is true that the provision of public housing and the public housing authority in Northern Ireland is of a different character from the public housing authorities in the rest of the United Kingdom. Nevertheless, there is nothing outside the scope of the skill of parliamentary draftsmanship to have devised either clauses or a schedule which would have applied the provisions of the 1984 Act simultaneously to that part of the United Kingdom.

I followed with interest the speech of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) when he drew attention to the scrutiny given to this order at an earlier stage by the late, defunct and, by some, unlamented Northern Ireland assembly. It could not be accepted in the House that our procedures for dealing with legislation by way of Committee and Report stages and the scrutiny to which legislation is submitted by the means available to this House are less satisfactory than any alternative methods that are available for giving effect to the wishes of constituents and to opinion in this country.

After all, when the House and its Members are confronted with a Bill, it is the business of hon. Members concerning themselves with that legislation to ascertain and put forward for improvement or amendment matters which are brought to their attention by interested parties in their constituencies. Obviously, that does not occur when part of the United Kingdom is deliberately omitted from such legislation. It is not practicable or within the scope of human nature when a Bill by its terms excludes part of the United Kingdom for the representatives of that part to be in a position to bring forward arguments, amendments and suggestions for the improvement of that legislation on the basis that in due course, by Order in Council, it will be applied to their constituencies. The fact that the Northern Ireland Office has been scrutinising the orders is no substitute for the scrutiny which would be available, if the principal legislation had in the first place applied to Northern Ireland, as it always was intended to apply and was stated that it would apply, so that Northern Ireland Members could have the same opportunities as anyone else to participate in debate upon it and on measures for its improvement.

The same considerations apply to part I of the Housing and Building Control Act, relating to the sale of houses by public housing authorities to sitting tenants, which is the other named subject matter of the order. Again, I agree with the Minister that from the beginning it was obviously desirable, if such sale was to be regulated by statute, that those statutory provisions should apply to Northern Ireland as they applied to the rest of the United Kingdom and as they are being applied by this Order in Council. There was no practicable reason why part I of that Act should not have extended to Northern Ireland and why the facilities for debate and for scrutiny should not have been available two years ago in that context.

The Minister was right to say that the massive sale of houses by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to tenants has been one of the most important and gratifying social events in the Province in the past 12 years. Indeed, it would not be an exaggeration to say that the sale of public housing to sitting tenants was piloted by the schemes which were voluntarily promoted by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive.

Anyone who is acquainted with Northern Ireland and its housing can bear witness to the improvement of the scene that that sale has brought about. Hon. Members for other parts of the Kingdom may not be aware of the extraordinary phenomenon of what is called in Northern Ireland labourers' cottages — houses of a standard pattern which were provided at the end of the last and in the early years of the present century and which must at the time have represented a revolutionary improvement in the conditions of living for the class which was then without shame designated as labourers.

Those houses, instantly recognisable throughout the countryside by their standard pattern — window, door, two windows — are extraordinarily popular to this day. It may seem surprising, but large prices are paid by sitting tenants to secure possession of those labourers' cottages, often dating from the early years of this century, which have to some extent been improved by the addition of porches and kitchens, but which, once they come into the hands of those who have previously been their tenants, become the object of frequently grant-aided improvement which makes a very real addition to the usable housing stock of the Province.

Nothing gives more pleasure in travelling the roads of Northern Ireland than to pick out the labourers' cottages and see those which have undergone that process of improvement over the years, not least because so many thousands of them in recent years have changed hands from the property of the Housing Executive to the property of those who were their tenants.

Perhaps I might be permitted, since it illustrates how deeply housing is woven into the social fabric of Northern Ireland, to relate one particular fact about these houses which puzzled me in my early years as a Member of Parliament for a Northern Ireland constituency. A wing was attached at right angles to the main frontage of the house. What seemed to me to be curious about that wing was that it did not look like a later extension because it was covered by the same roof-tree and the same pattern of roof.

One day, when I had been a Member for some years, I happened to be visiting a constituent who lived in one of those houses and I referred to the extension. I said, "I suppose that was an improvement." "Oh, no," he said, "that is the weaving room." These houses, built in the early years of the 20th century, were unacceptable to many of those who would be their tenants unless they included a weaving room which was either short for one loom or long for two looms, and which is still to be seen today as an important addition to the living accommodation in these houses.

Therefore, I dissent in no way from the stress that the Minister placed upon the value of the sale of Housing Executive houses to sitting tenants and his admission that in many cases the facilities that have been voluntarily extended under the scheme by the Housing Executive go beyond those which are rendered compulsory by the legislation which by this Order in Council we are now applying to Northern Ireland.

Notwithstanding that, it is right that there should be a common code for the sale of housing to tenants, that that should apply to the whole of the United Kingdom, and that it should be so made belatedly by this order, although it could perfectly well have been made two or three years ago by the inclusion of Northern Ireland in the original legislation, to the general saving of the trouble of the House and the improved participation of representatives of the people of Northern Ireland.

In case the Minister should say that there are other minor items in the order to which the same stricture does not necessarily apply, I notice that even the amendment which is made in the law relating to housing associations is a carbon copy of an amendment under the Housing Associations Act 1985 for Great Britain. In short, we are engaged in a duplicating process which is not only unnecessary but is inimical to good legislation for the Province of Northern Ireland.

I hope that the lesson, which I fear has been inculcated ad nauseam in one after another of these debates upon Orders in Council, will not be lost upon the House and the Government now that we have the opportunity, with the disappearance of the Northern Ireland Assembly, to consider afresh the manner in which Northern Ireland legislation is passed by Parliament.

10.30 pm

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I welcome this order on behalf of the serried ranks of Liberal and Social Democrat party Members. I also welcome the presence of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), especially when he gives us such fascinating passages from Irish social history. I apologise to the Minister for missing the beginning of his speech and if I am unduly vulnerable as a result I hope that he will be characteristically generous. One regrets the absence of other hon. Members for the North of Ireland. One would have hoped that our colloquy would be graced by their contributions to the debate and I am sorry that that is not the case.

It is right and proper that the Housing Defects Act 1984 should be applied to Northern Ireland in the best possible way. I wonder whether the Minister could enlighten us as to what has been learned from the problems that have been faced by the application of the Housing Defects Act 1984 in England and Wales since its inception. Those of us who represent constituencies which are particularly affected by the Act are well aware of the imprecise nature of many of its provisions, especially since it applies to concrete houses and not particularly to those with timber frames. It is possible to envisage that it could be applied more generously to different types of housing in Northern Ireland?

The Minister will be aware that in the provision that has been applied in England and Wales it has been for the local authority to bear the burden of different types of housing included within the Act. I hope that the Minister will enlighten us about whether that will be more flexible in the case of Northern Ireland.

I shall broaden my comments slightly. Can the Minister enlighten the House on the situation with regard to the Divis flats? I understand that the great campaign with regard to the Divis flats has come to some conclusions. I read in the paper yesterday that there is some confusion about the future. Can the Minister tell the House whether they are now to be demolished? I am sure that the House would be pleased to hear about that.

What provision is the Minister making to hear representations on behalf of different communities within the Province under paragraph (6) of article 4 where it states:

"Any question arising as to whether a building is or was at any time in a class designated under the Article shall be determined by the Department"?

If the Minister is accruing to himself virtually sole powers to designate properties under the order, he should tell us whether he will be giving an undertaking to accept representations on behalf of different communities, different towns and different parts of the Province.

I agree with the comments of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) as well as those of the right hon. Member for South Down that if we had more devolution within the United Kingdom we would all welcome, in our different ways, being able to deal with this in a different context. Nevertheless, one accepts and welcomes the order as it is presented.

Mr. Needham: I thank the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) for his kind comments about my fluency. They were particularly kind, coming from him, as I have always admired his fluency more than mine.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is a pity that we shall not have the Assembly to give us the benefit of its advice in the future as it had done in this case. While I accept the arguments of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) about the need for close discussion and consideration before orders are brought forward, I believe that the Assembly and the method of devolution through the Assembly is a more effective way of going forward in the context of Northern Ireland than relying only on the House of Commons.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough referred to the responses to the proposals in the draft order. I hope that he will forgive me if I do not read out at great length the Department's reply to the other suggestions that were made. Of course, I shall provide him, if he so requires, with our responses to those proposals. Let me assure him that we took all of them very much into account. The order is based on the need for parity with United Kingdom law. Therefore, it would not make much sense for us to propose different legislation for Northern Ireland.

The hon. Gentleman asked what happens to the proceeds of council house sales. They remain with the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and are then spent by the executive — 100 per cent. — in the provision of new housing. That takes into account the stress that the Government lay on the importance of renewing and upgrading the housing stock in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Gentleman referred to one of our problems when he mentioned the cutback in the housing budget. It is not so much a cutback in Government funds as a reduction in the number of sales that the Housing Executive had expected which meant that it did not have the funds that it had projected to spend this year on new housing. Unfortunately, because of the other current stresses and strains on the Northern Ireland block, it has been impossible for the Government to make up the difference between the reduction in capital receipts and what the Housing Executive hoped it would be able to spend.

The hon. Gentleman referred to articles 38 and 39, on rent control, and the McDowell judgment. I have taken careful note of the points that he raised. We are fully committed to the private rented sector in Northern Ireland. It has long had, and will continue to have, a valuable role in providing houses for those who, for whatever reason, cannot buy their own home or are not housed in the public sector. We shall ensure that that important role continues to be backed and understood.

The right hon. Member for South Down told the House that this was a cock-eyed way in which to proceed. Perhaps that is a fair comment on much of what happens in the House with regard to Northern Ireland. In my judgment, it is a cock-eyed way to proceed that we do not have Northern Ireland Members present when we are talking about an extremely important matter, and when the Assembly has disappeared and there is no other forum where those issues can be thoroughly and properly discussed. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not take it amiss if I say that his contributions to the debate are extremely important to the Government because they give a view of the feelings of the elected representatives in Northern Ireland.

I cannot go into a historical analogy of why the Housing Defects Act 1984 did not apply to Northern Ireland. All I can say is that because it is the Government's policy and preferred option to work towards devolution

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: It was.

Mr. Needham: And it still is. These issues would form part of a devolved administration were that to happen. Therefore, we have followed the course of separate legislation.

The right hon. Member for South Down rightly said that the voluntary scheme that we have applied in Northern Ireland is considerably more advanced than the statutory scheme that now underpins it by this order. I hope he will agree that the voluntary scheme has in some ways allowed us greater flexibility to introduce proposals at an earlier stage than would have been the case with a statutory scheme. For example, we have raised the discount from 50 to 60 per cent., and that began in June 1986. We have reduced from five years to three years the period for which someone must own a council house before losing discount, also from June this year. That is an advance on anything that has happened in that connection on the mainland. The right to repair has been in existence through the Housing Executive for more than a year, as have the equity sharing proposals which form part of this legislation.

While I accept that it is important and necessary that the schemes should have statutory backing, I hope that the right hon. Member for South Down will accept that the relationship between the Department of the Environment in Northern Ireland and the Housing Executive is close enough for it to bring forward the Government's intentions as early as is practicable for the benefit of those people in Northern Ireland who, as the right hon. Gentleman correctly states, have benefited to such a great extent from the right-to-buy provisions.

With regard to the point raised about Orlit owners having suffered, the fact is that only very recently has a scheme of repair been brought forward by PRC homes for these houses. I do not think that these owners have suffered either more or less than their counterparts in the rest of the United Kingdom.

In response to the points raised by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft), I can state that only 200 Orlit houses in Northern Ireland have so far been designated. Therefore, the problems in Northern Ireland in that respect are not of the extent, breadth or scope that exists in the constituency of the hon. Member for Leeds, West, or in mine for that matter. That does not mean that we are not worried about the problems to which I referred at some length in my opening remarks. Because of the cost of repair of these homes, I stress again that, with hardly any exceptions, we shall re-purchase these homes. That would be the sensible way to proceed.

[Mr. Needham]

The issue of the Divis flats does not fall within the scope of the order. I can tell the hon. Member for Leeds, West that what happens at Divis has to be determined in the first instance by the Housing Executive. As yet, I have received nothing from the Housing Executive to suggest that it has any intention of changing the policy that it has laid down over a considerable period of time. However, I stress that in the first instance it is for the Housing Executive to determine. If it has any change of heart, I hope that it will inform me before I read about it in the newspapers. One can never be too sure about that when dealing with the problems of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I accept the Minister's comments on the Divis flats. However, on the question of defective housing, is he referring to the 200 that are PRC problems, or is he including timber-framed houses, which are not covered by the English and Welsh legislation but which are known to be a problem?

Mr. Needham: I cannot give a full answer to that point. Article 4(1)(a) states:

"buildings in the proposed class are defective by reason of their design or construction, and (b) by virtue of the circumstances mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) having become generally known, the value of some or all of the dwellings concerned has been substantially reduced."

The key point is that not only are they defective by reason of design or construction, but that because that has become widely known they have lost a substantial amount of their value. If, in those circumstances in Northern Ireland, owners who have bought from the public sector a class of building that meets the provisions of article 4(1) (a) and (b), I shall ensure that under 4(6) we look carefully at any submissions that come to us from those owners. We have looked carefully at all submissions currently before us, but there are no substantial classes of buildings that fall under the provisions of article 4.

The House has discussed this order with the usual degree of interest and depth that applies to Northern Ireland business. It is important that we have this statutory backing to a voluntary proposal. Nevertheless, I believe that the current voluntary scheme is a major and significant benefit to the people of Northern Ireland.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 12th May, be approved.

Northern Ireland (Criminal Justice)

10.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I beg to move,

That the draft Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 24th June be approved.

Before dealing with the content of the order, I should perhaps explain that following publication of the proposal a number of amendments have been made to the order. One of those relates to the retrospective nature of the continuing offence of wrongful occupation of premises. The draft order, as originally published, provided that even where the wrongful entry to premises took place before the order became effective an offence would nevertheless have been committed if that entry were combined with a failure to leave on being requested to do so after the commencement of the order. As a result of representations, we have amended the application of the new offence to relate only to entries after the commencement of the order.

In the same article we have now extended the power of magistrates to stay the issue of warrants in cases involving publicly-owned property from a maximum of four weeks to one of three months. We have also amended the reference to a stay or suspension of the execution of warrants in such cases to refer to a stay or suspension of issue of warrants. That was to clarify and remove misapprehensions that had become apparent and may have inferred some new direct police involvement rather than construing that the enforcement of warrants would still be subject to the existing enforcement of judgment office procedures in Northern Ireland.

The House may also wish to note that provision has now been made in the renumbered article 5, which deals with the duration of training school orders, to allow for their suspension during a term of detention in a young offenders centre. That has been introduced to avoid the complications caused by dual liability in cases where young people are being considered for compassionate or other home leave from centres.

A further amendment to this article limits the type of orders under which persons are liable to be detained in training schools, which will cease to have effect. We have basically drawn a line here so as to include those involving findings of guilt and to exclude orders imposed on young people requiring care and protection or for persistent truancy, and so on. It was felt that the exercise of administrative discretion with regard to cessation was more applicable to the latter types of case.

Two items have been omitted from the order because of technical reservations expressed during the consultative process. One involved the clarifying provision relating to duration of sentences where committals to prison for contempt of court were involved; the other provided for extended remand periods where persons were already serving sentences for contempt of court. We have decided, in the light of comments about difficulties with the practical operation and interpretation of these provisions, that they should no longer be included in the order. A further minor change has been made to the amendments and repeals provision by the addition of a correction of a printing error in the Magistrates' Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981.

These changes in the content of the order since publication have, through deletion and the consequential renumbering of articles, altered its format to some degree. The amendments, which we consider to be improvements to the order, reflect the benefits to be gained from the consultative procedure for Orders in Council under the 1974 Act.

Having dealt with the amendments since publication of the proposal, I now wish to cover the main content of the order which makes provision for a miscellany of necessary alterations in the administration of criminal justice in Northern Ireland. Some of the provisions that are included are designed simply to bring criminal law in Northern Ireland into line with similar measures introduced in England and Wales over the past few years. Others are planned either to clarify or to strengthen existing law in the light of experience; while the remainder are steps to set right minor defects in earlier legislation.

One of the significant features is the alteration of the mode of trial for a range of offences. At present these offences are subject to trial only on indictment by a Crown court. The provisions of article 3 allow for summary trial of offences such as unlawful carnal knowledge and some types of burglary detailed in schedule 1 with the consent of both the accused and the prosecution. In addition, article 4 makes some less common offences contained in schedule 3 punishable on summary conviction only and sets new maximum penalties. These provisions should assist in reducing the number of cases, generally of a less serious nature, coming before Crown courts in Northern Ireland and they relate to provisions introduced in England and Wales by the Criminal Law Act 1977.

The primary purpose of article 5 is to remedy a current defect in Northern Ireland law affecting training school orders. These provisions now ensure that such orders imposed on findings of guilt are not rendered ineffective by orders for detention in a young offenders centre either as a result of non-payment of a fine, or which are suspended or quashed on appeal. As I mentioned earlier when dealing with the changes to a proposal, provision has also been made to suspend training schools during terms of detention in young offenders centres.

Article 6 amends the powers of Northern Ireland courts to order a convicted person to compensate the injured party; reflecting similar changes made in England and Wales. Compensation orders will be able to be made instead of, as against in addition to, any other penalty. Preference is also now to be given to the payment of compensation orders where fines are also imposed and where the offender is unable to pay both.

I shall now turn, if I may, to a number of provisions which are included under the heading of "Miscellaneous" in the order. The existing maximum period for which a court can remand a defendant in custody where both the accused and prosecution consent is increased from 14 to 28 days by article 7. Under article 8 it is proposed that prisoners may be removed from a prison to a hospital, or similar institution for medical investigation or observation in addition to medical or surgical treatment. This amendment, which is by way of clarification, corresponds with one made for England and Wales by Criminal Justice Act 1982.

Article 9 makes a minor technical repeal consequential upon the provisions of the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 in the Health and Safety at Work (Northern Ireland) Order 1978.

Article 10, read with schedule 5, in part re-enacts with amendments the existing law in Northern Ireland, which has been in force since 1946, regarding the wrongful taking possession or use of premises. These important provisions are specifically designed to provide a quicker and more effective means whereby those entitled to possession of residential premises can repossess them from those wrongfully occupying them. We are essentially dealing here with the problem of squatting. The House should take note of the safeguards contained in paragraphs (3) and (7) of the article, whereby protection is afforded to those with rights to possession. There are four main changes to existing law. These are the establishment of a continuing offence when persons fail to leave after being asked to do so by those entitled to possession; the mandatory issue of a warrant for repossession on conviction by a court, if appropriate, although the issue may be stayed; a general limitation of three months on a court's powers to stay the issue of such warrants in relation to premises owned and needed by certain public bodies—the Northern Ireland Housing Executive falls within this provision—and an increase in the maximum penalty on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £2,000 and/or up to six months' imprisonment. These are similar penalties to those already available to courts in England and Wales when dealing with the generally comparable offence of adverse occupation of residential premises.

A further parity measure with England and Wales, in food and drugs, is introduced by article 11 and the associated schedule 4. These major amendments to the Food and Drugs Act (Northern Ireland) 1958 allow for trial on indictment for some of the more serious offences with associated increased penalties, and also include and extension of the limiting period under which prosecutions must be brought. These provisions should be viewed as a major strengthening of the powers to deal with those who place the health of the general public at risk.

I do not propose to deal with the remainder of the order as it contains minor consequential matters and corrections of defects in earlier legislation. I hope that the House will feel that I have given a reasonable summary of the main provisions of this order, which is by nature one generated by an ongoing process of review and update of criminal law in Northern Ireland. It should contribute to the improvement of Northern Ireland legislation in a range of unconnected areas. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): The Minister began by saying that certain provisions would not be retrospective. We welcome and appreciate that announcement.

The proposed Order in Council would make several changes in the administration of criminal justice in Northern Ireland. I am reminded that a wag, who is not an hon. Member, has said that change and progress are not the same thing. Although the explanatory notes to the order refer to "improvements" in the administration of criminal justice in Northern Ireland, it is devoutly to be wished that they are improvements rather than changes.

I welcome the fact that some of the proposed changes correspond to those made recently in England and Wales. Others have arisen through the experience of operation of the existing law in Northern Ireland. I am not entirely sure where that leaves the constitutionalists. Does it mean that there is to be parity of law between England, Scotland,

[Mr. Stuart Bell]

Northern Ireland and Wales but that the administration of criminal justice in Northern Ireland will be delineated in accordance with experience?

In an abstruse way, we see that integration and devolution are not mutually exclusive. As long as Northern Ireland is a part of the United Kingdom, it is right that it should be governed by the same laws that govern the rest of us, and that, as it is separate from the rest of the United Kingdom, lessons should be learnt from the course of justice there.

The fact that the order also includes some minor or technical changes to remedy minor defects in earlier legislation is necessary, if incidental

The parliamentary draftsmen of the Northern Ireland Office in the criminal law branch have, at least in the explanatory notes, unconsciously, no doubt, revealed how two opposite concepts can live side by side and make for better law.

Article 10 deals with the law governing protection against the

"Wrongful taking possession, or use, of premises."

I note that it relates solely to the taking of premises rather than land. Although the image of the so-called peace convoy instantly comes to mind, it is not entirely apt, for those in the convoy were essentially looking for a home on land rather than in premises.

The Opposition were worried that those in Northern Ireland who have been in what might be described as unlawful possession of premises since the present troubles began in 1969 and 1970 might be caught by this Order in Council. They were the early victims of this last sectarian war between people of the same race, the same colour, the same language, the same religion—in that they worship the same God—and the same culture, but who, because of a gulf of history, are unable to live in a peaceable atmosphere as we understand it, buttressed in part by a sense of alienation, a lack of identity and, therefore, a common cause in life.

Those who lost their property in those days, and who have been squatting ever since, would have felt the scourge of the new regulations and might have been caught by the Order in Council. We welcome the Minister's statement that, after representations made to him, he has altered the terms of the order. That is in the best traditions of our democracy.

However, we must consider the provisions as they relate to squatting, as the Minister called it. He said that other changes had been made in the Order since its publication in draft form, and we welcome them, too. But we must ask whether it is desirable to criminalise squatting per se. After all, there are remedies in civil law, and, although it is often said that the law is an ass, essentially the law tries to keep a balance between the rights of parties. To come before the criminal courts for a civil matter — trespass upon property — would seem to be an infringement of one civil liberty in seeking to redress another. The object of the changes has been said to be a speedier and more effective remedy against squatting. We have expressed some of our doubts on the subject, while welcoming the Minister's statement that orders on publicly owned property will be extended to three months and his statement on the involvement of the police.

Article 7 amends article 47 of the Magistrates' Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981, under which a magistrates court may remand an accused person in custody or on bail. In effect, the Government propose to extend the periods during which remand prisoners can be held with their consent without appearing before the courts. The period is extended to 28 days. I understand that the consent of the accused and the prosecution must be obtained. The prosecution will give its consent as a matter of practicality and convenience, but what of the accused? On what grounds is he likely to give his consent for a further 14 days in prison while his case is being prepared? Some remarkable reasons must be given to him, or he must be remarkably luckless or ill advised, for him to agree to spend another 14 days in gaol simply for administrative convenience. Of course, he can refuse, and will then spend only eight days in remand before being brought before a judge, except if he is already being detained under a custodial sentence.

We must be careful about the concept of administrative convenience. We must be careful that human rights are not further eroded. We must be careful that a person awaiting a proper trial should not be held in prison on remand for longer than is necessary. A remand prisoner is innocent until proven guilty and administrative convenience can lead to a lackadaisical approach to justice. The 28 days to which the order refers can so easily become the norm. I can imagine the view of the Northern Ireland Office that the purpose of article 7 is to reduce the necessary court appearances of the few prisoners who presently consent to appearance every 14 days. This measure might increase the potential for pressure to be put on prisoners to consent, and there is the additional danger that 28-day appearances may become the norm and find their way into later legislation, so eventually we find ourselves faced with the dropping of the concept of consent.

I seek not to draw the House into a discussion on its own legislative powers, however abundant they are, nor to query the vigilance of future legislators. But, with the mass of legislation by way of Bills and Orders in Council, it may be that in a few years consent is no longer a concept that drives along our administration of justice. The 28-day provision may become par for the course. If that happens, our system of justice will begin to silt up with its own delays. This institutionalisation of long periods of detention on remand will continue to cause us some anxiety.

I shall turn backwards again, no doubt to the confusion of the Minister and the House. We call it backmost, foremost where I come from. Article 5 deals with the duration of training school orders. The Minister has spent some time explaining to the House the precise nature of the article. It is designed to remedy a defect in the present law in Northern Ireland arising from the operation of section 87(3) of the Children and Young Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1986, which deals with the duration of a training school order. If a young person who is subject to a training school order appears in court on criminal charges and is found guilty, the court may decide to punish him in a number of ways.

This calls to mind the so-called Black report, which was the shorthand name for the report of the Children and Young Persons review group. I am not entirely sure whether the provisions of article 5 arise out of the report, but I am aware that on 30 March 1982 the then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior), made a statement to the House about progress on the implementation of the recommendations of the report. If the Minister has the opportunity to reply, perhaps he will enlighten the House on whether provision is being made for some of the recommendations. If not, when can we expect the Government to implement the recommendations? If that is not done in this Session, possibly it will be done in the next.

I note from a briefing document kindly issued to the Whips' Office that if the enactment of the extended remand provisions is delayed there may be difficulties in relation to the proposed Bill to amend the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, which the Government hope to introduce in the next Session. We welcome the Secretary of State's statement that he will be implementing many of the Baker report's recommendations. We have long pressed the Government, including successive Secretaries of State, to do just that. I should like an explanation of how the present order relates to that proposed legislation as I wish to ascertain whether it will affect the bringing of that legislation before the House.

In the main, we welcome the order. We welcome the parity that is being brought about between Northern Ireland legislation and that governing the rest of the United Kingdom.

The debate provides us with an opportunity briefly to state that, although the Labour party believes in a united Ireland, an Ireland united by consent and through peaceful means, it also accepts that as long as Northern Ireland consents to remain part of the United Kingdom legislation affecting it should have parity with other legislation.

11.10 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): It is only right to acknowledge with appreciation the Minister's courtesy in supplying most of those taking part in the debate with an explanation in his letter of 13 June, which he has partly repeated tonight, of the differences between the proposal form of the order and the draft before us.

In every respect, it would appear that the changes made between those two stages are beneficial, and it is right that they have been made. But it should be put on the record that, whatever may be achieved by comments on proposals for an Order in Council, there is no substitute for the degree of scrutiny provided by the publication of a legislative proposal in Bill form or for its subsequent consideration in Committee and on Report. There is something about the Committee procedure, whereby queries, difficulties and objections have to be framed in advance in the form of amendments, which concentrates the minds of hon. Members and of the Government. It is unfortunate that under the Order in Council procedure, we have dispensed with the rigour introduced into legislation of the procedure by Bill, which applies to most of the substantive legislation that the House enacts.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) came near to making some assertions of principle about the relationship between the law of Northern Ireland and the law of the United Kingdom — or, rather, the law of England and Wales, not the law of England, Wales and Scotland, which is often different. I would associate myself with his view, that so long as Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom, the onus is on those who would argue that there should be a difference between the law applying to the subject in England and Wales and the law applying to the subject in Northern Ireland. Most of the order is concerned with assimilation of the law in Northern Ireland into the law as it has been produced in England and Wales by relatively recent legislation.

Perhaps I may briefly go through the order. Most of it is of an assimilatory character. For example, articles 3 and 4 refer to the mode of trial and involve assimilation with an England and Wales statute of 1977. Article 6 on compensation is an assimilation with an England and Wales statute of 1982. Article 8, on the removal of prisoners to hospitals, is an assimilation with an England and Wales statute of 1982. Article 9, involving forgery and counterfeiting, is consequential upon an England and Wales statute of 1981. Finally, article 11 on food and drugs is consequential upon an England and Wales statute of 1982.

If the principle enunciated by the hon. Member for Middlesbrough is generally accepted, I see no reason why Northern Ireland's citizens should have to wait nine years before the law applying to them is rendered uniform through changes made to the law in England and Wales. Convenience would accrue to the House and to all concerned, and would aid efficiency in the process of legislation, if changes to the law of England and Wales that inherently should apply in Northern Ireland were preceded by some thought during the, not brief, proceedings preceding legislation, so that the application can be made at the same time and in the context of a Bill, thus invoking those opportunities for concentration of attention on the part of those concerned which only procedure by Bill can provide. My emphasis upon that is reinforced by my study of article 13, entitled "Amendments and repeals." That is to put right acts or mistakes made on the occasion of legislation by Order in Council.

Perhaps tonight we are laying up work for a future sitting of the House in correcting mistakes which, unbeknown to us, we are making in this Order in Council. I wonder whether those mistakes in the legislation set out in article 13 would have escaped the proper scrutiny that the House gives to legislation before it in the form of Bills.

I have one substantive query to address to the Minister about article 10,

"Wrongful taking possession, or use, of premises."

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough touched on that. As far as I can see from the wording of the article, there is nothing which restricts its application to residential property, although in the explanatory material that accompanied the Order in Council it was constantly referred to as "residential premises".

I do not know whether this enactment applies to all premises or whether there is some provision, not visible to the naked eye, that restricts it to residential property. On balance, I come down, as did the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, in favour of the improvement of the procedure for gaining possession of property. I assure the hon. Gentleman that where squatting takes place in contemporary circumstances, it can rarely be justified by the emergency conditions that he said had existed in earlier years.

Squatting is commonly due to an attempt to get ahead of the allocation procedures that are rightly followed by the public housing authorities and to steal a march upon one's fellow citizens. Therefore, it deserves no sympathy and the more swiftly it can be dealt with the better for all concerned — including the squatters. I find from experience in my constituency that a family that squats loses in the end because its opportunity of being allocated accommodation suitable to its needs is diminished rather than accelerated by the unlawful act.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Did the right hon. Gentleman notice the phrase "land adjacent to"? Does he agree that against the background of the recent squatting and peace convoy activities that have taken place in Great Britain, that power could usefully be used to ensure that people do not squat on land adjacent to residential property, thereby invading the rights of other people?

Mr. Powell: That is an interesting intervention by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). I hope that he will turn out to be right, all the more so since part of my constituency is suffering at the moment from a plague of itinerants occupying sites which, under the most generous interpretation, are in no way suitable, but perhaps that is not directly related to the purpose of article 10. I hope that the Minister will refer to the scope of the premises mentioned in that article.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I shall not be other than succinct at this hour, and I certainly do not wish to emulate the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) in his skilful and lucid way of moving backwards through the order. Anything put forward by the Minister which eases the burden of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in its job of law enforcement will, I hope, be welcomed by the House. That is in contrast to the appeal made today by the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley), who urged the RUC to rebel against the provisions that it is currently asked to enforce.

I agree with the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) that we should examine Bills line by line and clause by clause. He is the lone voice among his Ulster colleagues, which may illustrate the fact that the undermining of that process has been encouraged by other hon. Members. Orders and legislation relating to Northern Ireland are introduced in an attempt to ameliorate the situation. To that extent, we welcome provisions which attempt to tidy up a miscellaneous conglomeration of issues.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough referred to remands. In previous debates I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) referred to the long period that is spent on remand by many prisoners in the Province and said that it was excessive. He would welcome its reduction. Is the Minister able to say whether the order will lead to the time spent on remand being reduced? Is he also able to say whether the provision to extend from 14 to 28 days, by consent, appearance in court on remand will reduce the pressure to shorten the time spent on remand before people are brought to trial, or whether this is just a way of hiding from the prospect of shortening that period? I should deprecate an extension of that period. In Scotland there is a limitation by statute to 110 days. A similar limitation ought to apply not only in the Province but in England and Wales.

I hope that all hon. Members will welcome the order. I hope, too, that the Minister will be able to reply to my points.

Mr. Scott: The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) gave a general welcome to the order. In particular, he welcomed the elimination of the element of retrospection from its provisions. It is a fine balance, but I believe that it is right that no element of retrospection should be enshrined in legislation. Strong representations were made to us, and I am glad that we were able to respond to them.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough and the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) referred to article 10. The hon. Member for Middlesbrough referred to the criminalisation of squatting per se. The order seeks to strike a balance between the rights of different groups of citizens. The right hon. Member for South Down made it very clear that those who squat frequently deny access to more deserving cases.

The Northern Ireland Housing Executive adopts a liberal and humane attitude towards those who squat. If premises are not immediately needed, in return for a modest charge for use and occupation that occupation is licensed until such time as the premises are needed. Where squatters are distorting the operation of the selection procedure for the allocation of housing, it is appropriate that the rights that are given to it by this order should be available to a public authority that is acting in the public interest.

Article 7 relates to the 28-day remand period. This is a modest proposal. It could lead to a useful saving of resources, as long as it is based on consent. Just under 10 per cent. of remands are, by consent, extended to 14 days. A somewhat smaller percentage may agree to an extension to 28 days. That would lead to a saving in the time of the court and also to a saving of both prison and police resources in Northern Ireland. It is a modest proposal, but I emphasise that in this case at least it is based entirely on consent. When we debate in the autumn the emergency provisions legislation, the principle of consent will not, as I made clear to the House on a previous occasion, be part of the proposals.

I was asked about training school orders and the Black report and progress on that. Consultations are still going on between the Government, those with training school interests, and those concerned with the care and welfare of young people. I appreciate that there has been a long delay in seeing how the principles of the Black report can be incorporated into the new arrangements for the treatment both of young offenders and care cases, and I hope that it will not be too long before we shall have proposals.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) asked about the provisions for 28-day remands and the delays in coming to trial, and I assure him that they have no link. I am extremely concerned about the delays in bringing cases to trial, although the delays are about the same as the average delay for those in England and Wales, and substantially shorter than the delays in the Metropolitan police district, part of which I represent.

My right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor has sought both the appointment of extra judges in the High Court and in the county court in Northern Ireland, and the appointment of a substantial extra number of Queen's Counsel in Northern Ireland to alleviate trial delays. We have likewise sought, by establishing a working party in Northern Ireland, to look into all the factors that make for delay in cases coming to trial to see how they can be minimised. Those of us who are familiar with the workings of the legal system in Northern Ireland know that in many cases the choice of defence counsel can be an important factor in the delays of some of the cases coming for trial.

I hope that I have dealt with all the specific points raised by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen. I commend the order to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 24th June be approved.

A140 Road (Suffolk)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

11.27 pm

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): I am extremely grateful for this opportunity of debating the subject of the A140 trunk road in Suffolk. When I made my maiden speech in 1983, I said that I thought that one of the biggest problems facing my new constituency would be the effect on its roads, villages and towns of the rapidly increasing volume of traffic. Little did I realise just how true my forecast would turn out to be.

After moving into my constituency and making our family home there since 1983, my family has had personal and daily experience of the problems facing some of the roads in general and the A140 in particular. The continuing success and expansion of our east coast ports and the growth of business generally in East Anglia have greatly increased the numbers of vehicles on our roads, and these numbers, particularly the high number of heavy goods vehicles among them, have caused problems that could not have been envisaged a few years ago.

The subject of the debate, the A140, is the only trunk road running north-south through the centre of Suffolk. My particular concern is with that part of it that runs through my constituency from its junction with the A45 in the south to the northern border of Scole.

I am able to speak from personal experience. I live in the north of my constituency, in the village of Mellis, and therefore have to travel regularly down the A140 to Ipswich, a quarter of which town is in my constituency. Moreover, for the past two years my daughter has been at school in Ipswich and my wife has regularly travelled that section of road four times a day.

The A140 is extremely deceptive. It looks as if it should be possible to travel on it in safety at high speeds, and along some sections that is the case. Unfortunately, other sections and hazards may be encountered which make it far more dangerous than it looks. The most recent accident figures sadly prove that beyond any shadow of doubt.

In 1983 the number of accidents involving personal injury on this stretch of road was 27, in 1984 it was 30 and in 1985 the figure rose to 40—a 33 per cent. increase on the previous year. I have personal knowledge of two of those accidents which occurred at exactly the same spot within the past 12 months, only a short distance from my home near the village of Yaxley. In both cases the drivers had been deluded by the character of the road's northern end into thinking that they could drive faster than they could and without the fear of any obstruction.

In the first instance, a coach, carrying a youth orchestra from Germany, did not realise that the vehicle in front, delivering newspapers, was stationary. At the last moment the coach driver swerved into the path of an on-coming lorry and collided with it. Fortunately, and mainly due to the quick reflexes of the lorry driver, no one was killed, although there were serious injuries. The outcome could easily have been much more horrific.

I visited the scene of that crash soon after it happened, and among the people already helping the injured was a constituent, Professor John Buxton, outside whose house the crash occurred. Some months later he was being driven home in the direction in which the coach had been travelling. The driver stopped before turning right into

[Mr. Michael Lord]

Professor Buxton's home to allow oncoming traffic to pass. In precisely the same way as before, another vehicle travelling in the same direction, southwards, failed to realise that the car was stationary and shunted him forwards and sideways across the path of an oncoming lorry. Professor Buxton, lucky to be alive, was taken to Ipswich hospital with multiple injuries and is only now recovering.

I am aware that it can be argued that such accidents are due to a lack of care on the part of drivers and that it is difficult to prevent them from happening, but this type of accident is much more likely to happen on some roads than on others. The A140 is a trunk road and several sections of it are long and straight and give the impression that it can be driven along at speed. Unfortunately, for many reasons that is not so.

Other hazards make the road even more dangerous. The sheer volume of traffic is increasing rapidly year by year. The national road traffic forecast published in December 1984 gives a range of national average growth rates between 1980 and 1985 from about 11 per cent. to about 16 per cent. Of the five sites along this stretch of the A140 where measurements are regularly taken, one falls below 11 per cent., three are between 11 per cent. and 16 per cent., and at one point the growth rate is in excess of 17 per cent. Clearly, traffic is increasing on this road at or above the national average, but, more important, there appears to be an extremely high percentage in those totals of heavy goods vehicles. As a major through route it carries a large number of heavy commercial vehicles which amount to one fifth of the daily total flow.

Perhaps more importantly, with accidents very much in mind, it needs to be said that along this length of road there are good and bad stretches. For example, there is a short piece of dual carriageway at the southern end of the A140 just before it joins the A45 near the village of Coddenham. The only problem is that while the good bits are not too bad, the bad bits are appalling.

Travelling northwards from the junction with the A45 there is a section of road known as Creeting Bottoms, which I can only describe as being more like the big dipper at Blackpool than a trunk road. My hon. Friend the Minister really would have to see it for himself to believe just how the road at that point dips and bends in the most alarming way. I shall return later to the question of my hon. Friend seeing it for himself.

A little further north, where the A140 is crossed by the A1120 in the village of Little Stonham, there are again extremely difficult bends to negotiate at the bottom of steep hills as well as at the intersection with the A1120 before that trunk road continues straight through the heart of the village.

Further north again, in the village of Brockford, there are no fewer than three minor road junctions off what is known as Brockford street. At that point, as long ago as 1978, 6,500 vehicles a day were recorded through the village, and 20 per cent. of those were heavy goods vehicles. The village takes a constant pounding from that volume of traffic, and turning into or out of minor roads, houses or shops is an extremely hazardous operation.

Bypasses to both Little Stonham and Brockford were approved as long ago as 1968 by the former East Suffolk county council when it had responsibility for the road, after considerable public consultation and taking account of views expressed by all local authorities and other consultees. Since then, nothing has happened, despite the mounting volume of traffic.

Again in 1968, when the county council had responsibility for the A140, it was proposed to make it dual carriageway. The idea was that the bypasses of Little Stonham and Brockford would be incorporated into the dual carriageway construction. However, since then the criteria which are used to decide those matters, such as traffic flow, and so on, have been changed. Although up to 1975 some improvements were carried out, which could ultimately have been incorporated into a dual carriageway, since 1979 no significant improvements have been made. I repeat, that is all despite the increase in traffic volume and the recognised black spots on the roads.

An additional, although in many ways separate, problem that occurs more frequently on the A140 than on other roads is that caused by slow-moving agricultural vehicles having to travel along stretches of the trunk road in order to get to and from the fields in the course of their daily work. Large numbers of vehicles travelling at relatively high speeds suddenly coming up behind such vehicles are frequently the cause of, at best, fierce braking, and, at worst, more accidents.

Clearly, the farmer cannot be blamed because he is only going about his normal work and has to get from one field to another with his machinery. However, the problem is being exacerbated by the fact that many farmers are now using the bodies from old heavy goods vehicles, modified as trailers, to tow behind their tractors. The result is that another motorist, when approaching that kind of vehicle from the rear, sees what he assumes to be a heavy goods vehicle which again he assumes will be doing a reasonable speed. Unfortunately, when he realises that it is only travelling at perhaps 5 or 10 mph it is often too late.

I have taken up that matter with the Department of Transport in the past and locally with the National Farmers Union and the county council. Apparently, it is permissible to use amber flashing lights on any vehicle which is incapable of travelling at more than 25 mph. There is a great deal of evidence to show that if such warning lights are used, other motorists spot those slow-moving vehicles well in advance and the last-minute braking and problems resulting from it can be avoided.

Unfortunately, although all those with whom I discussed this were in favour of some action, nothing as yet has happened. I ask the Minister to look into this again to see what steps may be taken, perhaps with the possibility of introducing legislation if that proves to be necessary.

I have discussed the problems of the A140 in some depth with Suffolk county council, and I know that the county surveyor believes that, in the matter of the trunk roads in the county, the improvement of the A140 from the A45 to Scole should now receive the highest possible priority.

Whether the road is made into a dual carriageway or whether improvements are carried out at the worst places along its length with a view to making the whole length a dual carriageway in time, I am not sure. However, I am sure that something must be done urgently. Whatever is decided will take some time to programme, and, for the reasons I have already given, I do not believe that time is on our side.

Here and now I would like to extend an invitation to my hon. Friend the Minister to come to central Suffolk and drive with me along the length of the road to see for himself the enormous problems that are occurring along its length and what my constituents are having to put up with, whether they are driving along the road or living in the villages affected by it. I am sure that if he will come he will be convinced of the need for urgent action.

We in Suffolk do not want roads for roads sake, nor are we anxious to encourage unnecessary traffic through our countryside. However, the traffic using the road at the moment has been forced on and through Suffolk by the success and activity of our east coast ports and other expanding businesses. In truth, we must not complain because much of it is helping to bring jobs to our towns and villages. However, it is crucial that that increased traffic is dealt with as efficiently and safely as possible. If that does not happen, not only will the quality of life in our villages deteriorate and the efficiency of our businesses be jeopardised, but I am sure that we will see more serious accidents, more injuries and more loss of life, which cannot be tolerated.

This is a trunk road. Responsibility for it lies with my hon. Friend the Minister and his Department. Having put the case before him on behalf of my constituents, I await his reply with the greatest concern.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) has a reputation as a fine and conscientious Member of Parliament. He and his family are well recognised, especially because, as he said, his wife and daughter spend all their time driving up and down to Ipswich. I do not know whether they carry advertisements for him on the side of their car. The days are long gone when a Member of Parliament could represent his constituency by remote control, and my hon. Friend has shown by the detail of his speech and the passionate way in which he has put forward his constituents' interests that they are well served by him.

I went to central Suffolk in the days of his predecessor; in fact in the days of the previous Labour Government. If I had been the Minister responsible for roads and traffic in those days, I would have had no words of comfort at all. The sad truth is that for all the calls for increased infrastructure spending, the real roads programme was cut in half between 1973 and 1979-80. Many historic towns and villages could not have their bypasses; and things got progressively worse. If I may speak confidentially, so much money is being spent in East Anglia now, and so much is proposed to be spent in the future, that if other regions of the country got to know about it they would feel jealous.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): Hear, hear.

Mr. Bottomley: I am grateful for that confirmation from my hon. Friend.

I went to open the Ely and Littleport bypass and briefed myself on the various proposals for what we call the eastern region, although it may be a rather wider description of East Anglia than my hon. Friend would accept, and it runs to hundreds of millions of pounds.

I feel a great affinity for my hon. Friend's concerns, because my great-grandfather was rector of Lavenham. I have spent many years driving from Cambridge across to the east coast for one reason or another on the good roads and the bad roads, and for a year I was a salesman in East Anglia having to travel north and south as well as east and west. East Anglia has, as my hon. Friend described, a number of roads which are not as safe as they should be.

The debate provides an opportunity for me to say a word in particular about the A140, which is a relatively young trunk road. It attained trunk road status in 1978 because of increased use of the road for strategic traffic between London and Norfolk. A high proportion is through traffic—about 30 to 40 per cent.—and over 20 per cent. is heavy vehicles.

There are communities that would still like to be added to the bypass programme. I have a paragraph in most of my speeches saying that I feel that I carry a similar responsibility to that of Home Secretaries in the days before capital punishment was abolished. I control where lives are saved. My hon. Friend is rightly asking for the risk of accidents to be reduced on his roads. Other hon. Members rightly put forward the same claim for their own areas. In fact, that is one of the advantages of our single constituency system of parliamentary representation. I somehow doubt that if we went in for multi-Member constituencies there would be the same attention to detail as we now have in issues concerning roads.

If I decided to approve major spending on trunk roads where it had a lesser benefit in terms of safety or economic growth, I would rightly be accused of not having the right priorities. I shall consider all that my hon. Friend said in the debate, and make sure that we have the best chance of getting small improvements or larger improvements on the A140 and go on giving proper consideration to the needs of the communities that he mentioned.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving illustrative examples. I hope that he will pass our best wishes to Professor John Buxton. It is not entertaining to be involved in a traffic accident, especially when it happened because one was giving way, as one rightly should, to oncoming traffic before turning right.

A week or so ago I spent a day with some of the county surveyors of East Anglia, looking at accident investigation and prevention sites. The AIP is a low-cost scheme, whereby it is possible to reduce the incidence of accidents, and accidents involving personal injury—roughly one in 10—by making sure that there is proper analysis and investigation of where accidents take place and in what conditions. Such investigations include accidents involving perceptual errors by drivers. That is a common theme to many of the points that my hon. Friend made.

My hon. Friend rightly said that we do not want unnecessary new roads, which are expensive in money and agricultural land. We want to make sure that the resources used are properly justified. As my hon. Friend would expect, in determining standards we must satisfy the needs of the traffic expected on particular lengths. We do not provide a particular standard just because a road is called a trunk road. We try to meet likely need rather than provide uniformity just because of classification as a trunk road.

I should like to say a word to those from the London area who think that just because we trunk about 70 miles of road it will automatically be dualled. My hon. Friend will confirm that that is not so. In fact, about 60 per cent. of our national roads are not dual carriageways.

[Mr. Bottomley]

We have introduced new departmental standards to allow greater flexibility in assessing the carriageway width to be adopted where we improve a road or provide a new road. This allows more new routes to be assessed as to whether they should be dual carriageways. I do not want to overstate the effect. Frankly, it is unlikely to alter dramatically the overall balance between single and dual carriageways. The new standards allow a lower threshold for considering whether dualling would be right. The road would not necessarily be built to that standard just because it came above the lower threshold that we can now use for consideration. It is one factor among others. We need to consider the economic and the environmental impact of particular schemes. I should like to pay a tribute to the staff of the Department of Transport in our regional offices and at headquarters. Most people now accept that the environmental considerations are taken into account to a greater extent than previously. The people who have worked out better methods of proceeding in this context do not normally receive any recognition. People now take for granted the fact that roads are blended into the landscape wherever possible.

The new threshold for considering dual carriageways is 11,000 vehicles a day. Current traffic flows on the A140 range from 7,500 to 9,000 vehicles a day. I must say—and I do not say this in any sense to comfort my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central — that the average accident rate for that route is not above average for that kind of road. I will continue to see whether factors arise which justify special measures and we will continue to monitor the route as traffic increases. My hon. Friend has stated that the rate of traffic growth in East Anglia and in his part of Suffolk has been above average.

I have mentioned that accident investigation and prevention teams continue to identify accident black spots. We are considering schemes that have a significant impact at specific locations where the rate is higher than we think should be tolerated.

Along the Suffolk length of the A140 improvements have already been made at the B1078 junction where a right turning lane has been provided. At the Yaxley crossroads signing and carriageway markings have been improved and the junction widened. Following representations from my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central, improvements were made at the B1118 Oakley crossroads early last year when the road was widened, traffic islands were constructed and improvements made to signing and to carriageway markings.

That is a good example of an AIP scheme. I would ask anyone involved in such matters, whether they be members of a county highway authority or in the Department, to keep their eyes and ears open for problems and also to pay attention to representations made by the public and by Members of Parliament. Consideration of ideas that have been put forward or anxieties about a particular junction or stretch of road can lead to improvements. If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have any roads that you are worried about, I hope that you, as well as other hon. Members present, will take up my invitation.

In the three years before the improvements at the Oakley crossroads there were seven personal injury accidents. Since then there as been one injury accident in 18 months. That is the level of improvement that we are seeking. We welcome the work which leads to such a reduction.

Another accident site has been identified at the A1120 Stonham crossroads. There have been 12 injury accidents there in three years and we are now considering what improvements can best be made. We are looking at the possibility of further additions where these can be justified.

My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central referred to the desirability of bypassing the villages of Little Stonham and Earl Stonham. I will consider my hon. Friend's points and if, after consideration, we have to decide that the economic case is not strong enough and that other competing claims on our resources appear to have higher priority, that will not be a final decision. These issues are reviewed and we will continue to keep an eye on the position. However, I cannot promise—certainly not tonight—that such a scheme would secure a place in the programme in the near future.

In conjunction with the county council, we are considering the case for bypassing Brockford, but we have not yet identified a viable scheme which might go into the programme. As I say, we give high priority to monitoring safety and to assessing road accidents. Last year road accidents were responsible for 5,200 deaths and 315,000 injuries.

I refer to the point raised by my hon. Friend about slow moving agricultural vehicles. There was one point which I have not heard before. He referred to the adaptation of what appeared to be conventional heavy goods trailers being towed behind agricultural tractors. I will try to gather more information on that and, if necessary, will ask my hon. Friend for examples for the experts to examine.

I also think that my hon. Friend is right about having talks with the National Farmers Union on the desirability of slow-moving agricultural vehicles having flashing lights so that other drivers may know what is happening. I give a warning to drivers: do not expect every slow-moving vehicle to have a flashing beacon. For example, a horse-drawn cart—normally used for recreation—may be on the road, as may be cyclists. There is always the possibility that car may have broken down around the bend or that a driver may be waiting to turn right into a drive. There is a responsibility on all road users, whether in private cars or commercial vehicles, to drive so that we can stop within the distance that we can see, and to notice what is happening in front of us.

I accept my hon. Friend's point about the need to make it easier for people to understand what they are seeing. I shall do all that I can to emphasise the message. I shall also consider, perhaps in consultation with others, whether in future there should be compulsory legislation to ensure that vehicles that owners know will be moving slowly are better identified.

I shall write to my hon. Friend about any of his points with which I have not been able to deal. We can discuss any points that he thinks we should go through together. I do not think that I shall be able to visit Suffolk this side of the recess, but if I can discover some suitable time later in the year I should like to see the conditions that he has described so eloquently to the House. Quite frankly, I should like to spend much more time going out and about, not only to assess potential needs but to stand at the crossroads that he identified as an accident site and to obtain more publicity for that sort of thing.

The 40 accidents last year on my hon. Friend's section of the A140 might illustrate other AIP sites with which we should deal. Even if dualling or some other major improvement has to be delayed, there may be works that can be done in an attempt to find a way of improving the safety and relieving some of the danger.

My hon. Friend has done a service to the House as well as to his constituents. There cannot be too much attention paid to these issues. As road safety improves, it will be because of debates such as this initiated by my hon. Friend.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheep

1. Mr. Kennedy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is yet in a position to announce details of compensation for farmers affected by the recent controls on the movement and slaughter of sheep; and if he will make a statement.

5. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to consider the payment of compensation to sheep farmers who have suffered losses as a result of the measures announced on 20 June.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): My colleagues and I have had discussions with the farmers unions on the compensation issue. We have agreed that, as yet, it is too early to assess the overall impact on producers of the restrictions, since that will depend upon the relationship between the length of time the restrictions are in operation and the individual farmer's marketing patterns. In this connection, I am happy to announce that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have today signed another order to come into effect at midnight to release a further area of Cumbria from the restrictions. I understand that he will be making a similar announcement today, in relation to further areas in Wales. These releases are based on the results of intensive monitoring, which is continuing. Full details of the area, and the results of latest tests, are being published today and a copy is being placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Kennedy: In thanking the Minister for that informative reply, may I stress to him that in my constituency in Easter Ross, which obviously and understandably will not be covered by the decisions that he is making today, we have the continuing difficulties of last year's bad weather, a 75 per cent. fall in farm incomes and, within the past 48 hours, confirmation from Lord Gray of a further increase in Scottish farming indebtedness to the banks of 9 per cent.? Given those difficulties, and appreciating what the Minister said, may I urge him to take all possible steps as and when sufficient evidence becomes available to help compensate those farmers, who are already suffering badly at the margins and who will be plunged even further into indebtedness, because the survival of the whole rural economy in the highlands of Scotland is dependent on their well being? Can the Minister give us that undertaking?

Mr. Jopling: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman. Many of his points are matters for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I remind him that I said on 20 June that we were prepared to discuss cases of compensation for severe loss in particular circumstances to specific farmers. That undertaking still stands.

Mr. Powell: That is not all that helpful to farmers. Recently we have also had discussions with the farmers union, and the farmers want to know the Government's criteria on compensation. When will the Government make a statement on that? Is the Minister suggesting that the Secretary of State for Wales may be making that statement somewhere else, because he should be present on the Front Bench if it is a measure affecting Wales? Is the Minister aware that in Wales the scare is so great that a butcher in Monmouth must use a geiger counter to sell lamb in his shop? Is it not time that the Government came clean and told farmers how they will compensate them and the criteria that they will lay down?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman should be a little careful before he starts making irresponsible statements of that sort. Questions today are for my Department and not for the Welsh Office. I shall repeat to him—he probably was not listening when I said it earlier—that the leaders of the farmers unions in England and Wales have recognised that until more data are available it is not possible to consider the compensation question in detail. I accept the importance that they attach to early decisions as soon as sufficient data are available.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend accept that we appreciate that he is concerned about the serious economic plight of many farmers in our part of the world? Will he deplore, as he did partly in his answer, the scaremongering that may lead people to cease to buy lamb which is perfectly safe? Will he continue to press the Russians, who are responsible for this disaster, to cough up some cash?

Mr. Jopling: I am glad that my hon. Friend has drawn attention to the perfect safety of consuming sheepmeat at this time. I believe that the British housewife has demonstrated that clearly because the market price for lamb, both last week and, as we forecast, this week, is rather higher than it was in the corresponding weeks last year. With regard to the points my hon. Friend made about the Russians, I warned Mr. Murakhousky when he was here last week of concern about the impact of the Chernobyl disaster on our agriculture. Of course, any matter of claims is one for the Foreign Office, and not for me.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will my right hon. Friend accept that I am reassured by the fact that he admits that compensation is needed? However, in addition to the sheep farmers, haulage contractors and auction markets have suffered a fairly dramatic drop in their income. Will their position also be considered? Will he confirm to the House, as I had hoped my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health would confirm, that there is no danger whatsoever to any man, woman or child in this country in eating sheepmeat?

Mr. Jopling: I can gladly confirm that there is no danger. With regard to the matter of abattoirs and markets, the undertaking that I gave to consider compensation was for specific farmers. One has to realise that abattoirs and markets were able, if they wished, to draw sheep from outside the areas in which the restrictions applied. With regard to compensation, I can only repeat what I said. We are prepared to discuss cases of compensation for severe loss in particular circumstances by specific farmers.

Mr. Mark Hughes: I am deeply disturbed by the right hon. Gentleman's comment that abattoirs can draw from elsewhere. The butchers and abattoirs in parts of north Wales cannot, without great loss, call from sources elsewhere. They are as eligible to compensation as anyone else. Will they be considered, and will the right hon. Gentleman please ask that his right hon. and hon. Friends from the Welsh Office are present on such occasions?

Mr. Jopling: With regard to markets and abattoirs, I can only repeat the truth. Markets and abattoirs, even if they were within the restricted areas, were and are entitled to draw their livestock and sheepmeat from outside the area.

Mr. Home Robertson: We welcome the fact that the Minister has felt able to lift the ban in certain areas. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office told me in a written reply on 1 July that the Government were reserving the right to press a claim against the Soviet Union for any losses, but does the Minister accept that farmers whose lambs have missed the market cannot possibly wait to press a claim through the International Court of Justice? The right hon. Gentleman gave a clear commitment on 20 June to the principle of paying compensation to people who had sustained losses, and he repeated that commitment today, but he appeard to be back-pedalling in a speech that he made to farmers at the Great Yorkshire show. Will the Government try to wriggle out of that commitment, or will they pay compensation where it is justified?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman is putting words into my mouth. What I have done today is to repeat precisely the undertaking that I gave to the House on 20 June. Perhaps some newspapers misreported what I said at the Great Yorkshire show the day before yesterday. If the hon. Gentleman reads the Yorkshire Post, I think he will find that, in its customary way, it has got it right.

Food Labelling

2. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has had on food labelling.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): We have recently received comments on our proposal for fat content labelling of foods and on guidelines for nutrition labelling, and on European Community proposals for amendment of the EC food labelling directive 79/112.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the Minister recognise that many hon. Members are getting weary of the complacent attitude towards food labelling and of the Government not going anywhere near far enough? When will the Food Advisory Committee's report on colouring be published, which has been suppressed? Will the Minister go further and issue instructions that labelling must include a warning that the azodyes, the benzoates, the sulphites, the sulphates, the nitrites, the nitrates, and the BHA and BHT additives, all of which are already banned from baby food, are possibly toxic to people in vulnerable groups?

Mrs. Fenner: The reasons why those additives are not in baby food is that there are two criteria for food additives —safety and need. If there is not an established need in baby foods, the additive is not put in, so that every additive that is passed as safe in adult food is safe if babies or children should eat it. Otherwise, it would not be in the food. I a sorry that the hon. Gentleman should think me complacent. We have a strict consultation pattern, which is required in the legislation. We issued our proposals on 13 February. We asked that observations should be received by May. We sent out to 700 interested parties, and we are now assessing their comments.

Mr. Coombs: As the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy report recommended an increase in the intake of complex carbohydrates and warned against an increase in the intake of simple sugars to make up for the deficiency in calories consumed from eating less fat, how does my hon. Friend expect the consumer to make the right choices in the absence of the mandatory labelling of sugars?

Mrs. Fenner: COMA did not request or recommend statutory labelling for other than fats and saturated fatty acids. As my hon. Friend says, it suggested some reduction in other things. I should inform him that sugars are already required to be shown in the listing of ingredients, which came fully into effect on 1 July this year. I should further tell him that COMA advised at the 20 June meeting last month that a panel be set up to examine the effect of sugars in the diet. We shall, of course, consider the implications of any such report.

Mr. Pike: While it is to be welcomed that on this occasion the Government are at least consulting, which is very unusual for this Government, when will they cut the waffle and take action on labelling, and ensure that accurate labelling is provided, which is what the public seek?

Mrs. Fenner: The hon. Gentleman speaks in contradictions. The Government do consult, as required under the legislation. His Government consulted on agricultural matters as they were required to do under the legislation. He cannot expect consultation and, at the same time, expect us to carry out labelling without taking due account of the consultation requested.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Is my hon. Friend satisfied with the labelling of so-called health foods? Does she think that the description on labels is substantiated by scientific research? Does she not think that the time has come for approved definitions in which the Government would have some say?

Mrs. Fenner: Labelling requirements must be complied with. For example, those foods which purport to aid slimming must be labelled extremely carefully. If my hon. Friend has any instances that he wishes to draw to my attention, I shall happily look at them.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Can the Minister assure the House, since the fast food merchants have taken considerable umbrage at the slight advances that have been made, that she will give priority to the consumer interests, and that all foods, with relevant cartons, will contain a complete and accurate note of the contents?

Mrs. Fenner: The regulations were introduced in 1984. They came into operation fully on 1 July. They require total ingredients listing in order of the amount in the processed food. Every additive must be put on the label in its generic form and with its E number.

Cereals (Co-responsibility Levy)

3. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his latest estimate of the proportion of cereals grown in the United Kingdom which will be liable for the co-responsibility levy.

Mr. Jopling: I estimate that about three quarters of the United Kingdom's cereals production is likely to be subject to the levy.

Mr. Lewis: Is the Minister not aware that this is the first time that he has given any indication of the way in which the scheme will work? It should have been in operation at least 10 days ago. The whole industry has been thrown into confusion by this vacillation, and the Minister should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. Jopling: We have continually made the industry as a whole aware of how the arrangements will work. We have had a good deal of difficulty, because we did not have the final version of the Community's rules in English until recently. It is wrong to suggest that the industry has been kept in the dark.

Sir Peter Mills: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the fact that the present proposals are a jolly sight better than the original ones. Having said that, many problems remain. Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that, especially in the south-west of England, feeders must pay at least another £2 a tonne as a result of the burden? The burden of the co-responsibility levy should be shared all over British farming.

Mr. Jopling: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his opening remarks. He is right in saying that we succeeded very well in the price fixing in reducing dramatically the discrimination that existed in the Commission's original proposals. I accept from my hon. Friend that many difficulties are inherent in the co-responsibility levy. That is why the House agreed that we should do everything we could to resist it. However, we found ourselves completely isolated and, at the end of the day, we had to accept it. I realise that it is likely that extra costs will fall upon the industry as a result of having to pay the levy.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: What opportunity and what powers will the Minister have to resolve the problems that have arisen over the interpretation of first-stage processing in the Commission's regulations in this context?

Mr. Jopling: So far there is no Community or national definition to work on as regards what is a holding. I think that that is what the right hon. Gentleman is referring to. We are still considering the detailed criteria necessary in the light of comments made to us by the trade organisations concerned. We shall be issuing guidelines to the industry as soon as possible. Ultimately, the intervention board must decide in individual cases.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Is my right hon. Friend aware that apparently the wretched tax is to be paid by compound feed mills but not by integrated units on farms, however large they may be? Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is highly discriminatory? Will he, at the very least, tighten up the rules to achieve a measure of equality and to exempte only those genuine individual farmers compounding their own feed and giving it to their own animals?

Mr. Jopling: Yes, but my hon. Friend should recall that, under the rules, a producer would be exempt from the levy if he processed grain on his own agricultural holding for use in animal feed on that holding. Exemption of an intensive unit would depend on whether an individual business met the criterion that compounding and livestock production were carried out on the same holding. We shall issue guidelines on that as soon as possible.

Mr. John: The right hon. Gentleman knows that this tax came into force and should have been levied 10 days ago. He said that the criteria are ultimately the responsibility of the intervention board. How much later is "ultimately"? I understand that at a meeting yesterday the trade was given no greater clarity about the criteria. Who is to blame for this mix up?

Mr. Jopling: The delay occurred because the Commission did not supply us with the detailed rules until a good deal of time had passed. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware, because he has read the regulations which have come from Brussels, that the levy will be paid on the new crop. The new crop has not yet begun to come forward for processing, or for exporting or to go into intervention.

Coal Mining Subsidence

4. Mr. Heddle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has recently had with the National Farmers Union on the subject of coal mining subsidence.

Mrs. Fenner: None, but the National Farmers Union copied to me its representations to my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Energy and for the Environment on the report of the Waddilove committee.

Mr. Heddle: Does my hon. Friend agree that many small farmers and smallholders, especially in mining counties such as Staffordshire, are suffering severe hardship because they cannot obtain compensation for consequential loss against coal mining subsidence? Will my hon. Friend use her persuasive efforts to urge our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy to implement some of the Waddilove proposals as soon as possible.

Mrs. Fenner: We are concerned that farmers whose land suffers subsidence should receive appropriate compensation where restoration of the land is not practical. As my hon. Friend knows, such compensation is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Home-produced Food

6. Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of food consumed in the United Kingdom is home-produced.

Mrs. Fenner: It is provisionally estimated that 60 per cent. of all food consumed in the United Kingdom was home produced in 1985.

Mr. Knox: What was the percentage before Britain joined the European Community? Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the level is to be maintained and improved, the Government must continue to give strong support to British agriculture, especially the livestock sector?

Mrs. Fenner: That percentage compares with 50 per cent. in 1973 and represents a considerable achievement by the industry. However, self-sufficiency in indigenous foods — those that can be grown commercially in Britain's climate—increased from 62 per cent. in 1973 to 80 per cent. in 1985. I think that that will reassure my hon. Friend that we are giving that support to the farming community.

Mr. Canavan: Is it not time that the Government took effective action against the high proportion of South African foodstuffs in our shops? Does the Minister not realise that sanctions of this nature would help home food producers as well as help to bring about the end to the evil apartheid regime in South Africa?

Mrs. Fenner: The hon. Gentleman's ideology should not persuade him that we could grow citrus fruit in this country.

Mr. Andy Stewart: My hon. Friend's comments are good news for the British producer. However, does she agree that much of this has been achieved by the promotional work carried out by the Women's Farming Union? Will she consider appointing a member of the Women's Farming Union to head Food from Britain, as Sir Richard Butler does not appear to be acceptable?

Mrs. Fenner: I note what my hon. Friend says, and I am trying very hard not to let my Freudian slip show. Of course I agree that the Women's Farming Union, the agriculture industry, the food industry and Food from Britain have all made a great contribution. It is also significant that, as well as home consumption, our food exports are now some £2·7 billion a year compared with £800 million in 1975.

Mr. Livsey: Will the Minister comment on the position in the dairy industry, which is only 85 per cent. self-sufficient, and which is having to accept a further 3 per cent. cut in milk quotas, with subsequent unemployment among dairy creamery workers? Will she please make a statement about New Zealand imports and say whether these can be offset against quota?

Mrs. Fenner: In relation to the hon. Gentleman's latter point, the Community has a commitment, which we fully support, not to deprive New Zealand of outlets essential to that country. It is significant that New Zealand exports of butter to the Community have less than halved since our accession to the Community.

Mr. Key: Does my hon. Friend agree that only rarely do urban consumers see the connection between what is happening in the fields in the countryside and what appears on their supermarket shelves? Would she therefore join me in congratulating Safeways and other supermarkets on displaying home-produced rape oil on their shelves?

Mrs. Fenner: Yes indeed. Of course, Food from Britain has, through its quality charter systems, also drawn the consumer's attention to the quality of British food.

Dr. Godman: Does the Minister agree that the British fisherman plays an important part in producing food for the domestic consumer? Will the hon. Lady and her ministerial colleagues give an assurance that the provision for the Sea Fish Industry Authority will be maintained so that a first-class product can continue?

Mrs. Fenner: I wholly agree with the hon. Gentleman about the great and increasing contribution that fish makes in persuading people of the high quality of British food. We support the Sea Fish Industry Authority in its promotion of fish. I am delighted to see that supermarkets also promote fish heavily.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Despite the fact that the agriculture industry has had great success in gaining a larger share of the home food market, will my hon. Friend accept that none the less, it is true that, since the introduction of milk quotas, that share has slipped back a little, to the benefit of French and Dutch dairy farmers, who produce a surplus, while British dairy farmers have had to cut back despite the fact that we are not self-sufficient overall in dairy products?

Mrs. Fenner: Domestic butter production, as a proportion of total new supplies, has increased from 57 per cent. in 1980 to 64 per cent. in 1985. For cheese, there has been a slight decrease from 70 per cent. to 67 per cent., but that figure reflects cheese imports and an increased range of choice.

Lamb (Radiation)

7. Mr. Hirst asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what checks his Department is currently undertaking into radiation levels in lambmeat; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Members for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) and for Ogmore (Mr. Powell). I intend to reduce further the size of the designated area in Cumbria as soon as additional sampling results confirm the continued fall in radiocaesium levels.

Mr. Hirst: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the radiation testing and the open approach of his Department are most welcome? Does he regard it as unfortunate that certain sections of the media have indulged in unnecessary scaremongering about lambmeat, to the detriment of farmers and butchers? Is it not true that I received a larger dose of radiation when I had an X-ray on a tooth recently than I would have received if I had eaten lambmeat for each and every meal—at breakfast, lunch and dinner—for a month?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend has done us all a service in pointing out just how prudent are the safety levels to which we have been working. His conclusions are fully borne out by the fact that this year the price of lamb on the market is higher than in the corresponding week last year. That shows that the housewife also has confidence in the prudent safety levels that the Government have adopted.

Mr. Torney: Will the Minister instruct Ministry scientists to research into whether the future offspring of lambs born during the Chernobyl disaster could be infected with caesium? The House should remember that caesium has a 14 year half-life.

Mr. Jopling: Scientists in my Department are already carrying out extremely extensive testing, and they will certainly consider that point.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that an essential factor in obtaining a reasonable price for one's products is confidence? When confidence has been shattered as a result of radiation checks, farmers are concerned that sheep, and sheepmeat from allegedly nuclear-free zones, could affect other areas that are not nuclear-free, where the price of sheepmeat has already been adversely affected.

Mr. Jopling: The nonsense surrounding nuclear-free zones has nothing to do with the fact that the British housewife fully understands that sheepmeat is safe to eat, and is very good value.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Minister aware of the interesting work done by the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology? It is now preparing a national survey of all vegetation and grassland in order to establish radiation levels, with particular reference to Cumbria and the Lake District, which have lately been the subject of some fairly vigorous criticism, which has in turn damaged the tourist trade and the farming industry. Without pre-empting the institute's findings, does the Minister agree that they will probably help to secure a better image for the county?

Mr. Jopling: I join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to the fine work done by the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology at Grange, in my constituency. It has been very helpful to us in the past few weeks in allowing us to isolate the areas where restrictions should apply. It has a very important future workload, and I hope that the results of those tests will help us, and will facilitate dealing with some of the rather silly criticisms about the safety of the Cumbria area.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Even if the Minister was misquoted in the press on the issue of compensation for sheepmeat producers, he could not have been misquoted yesterday morning on Radio Wales, because I heard him myself. Will he now state clearly the Government's policy on compensation? Will he also state clearly that, whatever the detail, the Government intend to pay the costs sustained by sheep producers in my constituency and others as a result of radiation levels?

Mr. Jopling: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber earlier——

Mr. Thomas: I was.

Mr. Jopling: Earlier, I said that the leaders of the NFU recognised that until more data are available it is impossible to look at the question of compensation in detail. But I am glad to repeat what I said on 20 June, as it still stands. We are "prepared to discuss cases of compensation for severe loss in particular circumstances to specific farmers." — [Official Report, 20 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 1321.]

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the Minister think again about his refusal to review the contingency plans for radiation emergencies in the light of the Chernobyl disaster? Does he not accept that there is evidence that the Ministry was caught napping during the first week in May, and that there were serious shortcomings in the advice made available to both producers and consumers?

Mr. Jopling: I strongly resist the suggestion that my Department was caught napping. Nothing of the sort occurred. The monitoring being carried out by my Department has been unsurpassed by any comparable department in the European Community.

Cereals (Co-responsibility Levy)

8. Mr. Fatchett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the cereals co-responsibility levy will apply to large-scale livestock producers who process their own feed.

Mr. Jopling: Any producer, whatever his size, who processes cereals on his agricultural holding for use in animal feed on that holding is exempt from paying cereals co-responsibility levy on that grain.

Mr. Fatchett: Does it not appear from the right hon. Gentleman's earlier answers that small and medium-sized producers, which are much more likely to have to buy feed rather than rely upon their own, will have to pay the levy? As a result, in an industry which is very competitive and in which margins are tight, is is not likely that some producers will go out of business?

Mr. Jopling: I cannot accept that final comment. The hon. Gentleman should understand that many medium-sized and smaller farms mix a good deal of their feeding-stuffs at home and therefore would not pay the levy. However, grain that goes for processing, including the manufacture of animal feeds, will be subject to the levy.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is considerable urgency about resolving the problem to which he referred earlier? There is much uncertainty in the intensive livestock industry as to who will pay the levy and costs are, therefore, affected in one way or the other. There is also uncertainty about the future purchasing arrangements for feed. Does he expect to have the problem resolved within days, or weeks?

Mr. Jopling: There is no uncertainty about who is exempt from the levy. A producer who produces grain on his own agricultural holding for use in animal feed on that holding is not liable to pay the levy. I am perfectly well aware that there have been delays in finalising the Community regulations and that that has disrupted trade. I regret this. I and my officials have kept in close and continuous contact with interested trade organisations. We have always sought to clear up the uncertainties as quickly as possible, and we shall continue to do that.

Mr. John: How can the right hon. Gentleman say that when his Department has not defined an agricultural holding for the purpose of the levy? This is important, because if integrated producers are exempted from the co-responsibility levy, it means that one third of the feed grain produced in Britain will be exempt and the statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) that small and medium-sized producers will be penalised unfairly is justified.

Mr. Jopling: I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands what he is saying. He must understand that the more farms there are that are manufacturing feed and which we ask to pay the levy, even though they may be large integrated holdings, the more money may unnecessarily go to the Community's funds from Britain. We must weigh one thing against the other.

Mr. John Townend: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the application of the levy will cause great unfairness, specially to producers such as Twydale Turkeys in my constituency, which purchases 45,000 tonnes of feed from four mills and will be put at a competitive disadvantage? It could also result in those mills having to reduce employment. What action can he take to make the application of the levy fairer among various sectors of the industry?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will recall that when we debated the matter before the price-fixing resolution we agreed that inherent in the levy system was some discrimination and unfairness, and so it has proved. That is why we did everything we could to avoid a co-responsibility levy in those price-fixing negotiations.

Finished Lambs (Sales)

9. Mr. Livsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the provisional figures for sales of finished lambs in markets in England and Wales, for the weeks ending Saturday 28 June and Saturday 5 July, compared with the same weeks in 1985.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): Figures from the Meat and Livestock Commission, based on 64 sample markets in England and Wales, show that 87,517 lambs were certified in the week ending 29 June 1985 and 77,692 in the week ending 6 July. This year's corresponding figures are 61,426 and 63,505.

Mr. Livsey: I am grateful for that information. In view of these figures, may I inquire whether, in respect of consequential losses outside the areas affected by the Chernobyl fall-out, the Minister will consider compensation for those lambs that did not qualify for the variable premium?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman will know that the change in the distribution of sales of lambs is largely due to the lateness of the season, and it is too early to make any kind of judgment. On the matter of compensation, my right hon. Friend has made his position clear.

Common Agriculture Policy (Expenditure)

10. Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest estimate of common agricultural policy expenditure in 1986; how this compares with the budgeted amount; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The Commission's preliminary draft supplementary and amending budget for 1986 provides 23,025 mecu for expenditure under the common agricultural policy. This compares with 22,009 mecu in the present budget as adopted by the European Parliament.

Mr. Deakins: Has the Secretary of State read the recent speech of the Minister for Overseas Development calling for a radical reform of food aid policy in the Common Market? If so, does he agree with the principles involved and will he seek to extend them to the disposal of commercial surpluses, which are a major part of the costs of the CAP which he has just mentioned?

Mr. Jopling: As usual, my right hon. Friend made a fine speech and the implications of what he said will be taken into account in dealing with the disposal of surplus products from the Community. However, I am sure the hon. Gentleman recognises that at this time the Community is extremely short of cash.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that Her Majesty's Government will not countenance force against South Africa, recalling the Leader of the Opposition's advocacy of mandatory United Nations sanctions, the logic of which, according to the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), is that we must be prepared for a naval action against South Africa — and that was the ex-Minister who wanted to arm the South African navy?

The Prime Minister: I am glad to respond to my hon. Friend. The Government are not talking about the use of force in connection with apartheid in South Africa. Rather are we calling for the suspension of violence on all sides and seeking a peaceful solution. I hope that everyone on both sides of the House will wish my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary well in his great endeavours.

Q3. Mr. Hanley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hanley: The House is rightly concerned with the issue of sanctions, and, indeed, with the effect that that debate is having around the world, but perhaps the House is losing sight of the positive steps that the Government are taking to help the blacks in South Africa and in the front-line states. Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to remind us of what the Government are doing to help those whom all hon. Members wish to help?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, at the recent European Community Heads of Government meeting we agreed to take positive measures to help the blacks in South Africa and we have allocated a further £15 million over the next five years for that purpose in addition to the £22 million that we are already spending. Last year we gave £70 million in aid to Zimbabwe, Zambia, Mozambique, Botswana, Lesotho and Swaziland.

Mr. Kinnock: Has the Prime Minister seen the report from the Select Committee on Social Services, which has a seven to three Conservative majority, which says:

"Taking into account efficiency savings, on the most favourable interpretation of the Government's own data for the last five years, the Government has done no more than half what, by its own admission, should have been done . . . total underfunding of the hospital and community health services was £1,325 billion".

When will the Prime Minister provide enough resources to come up to even the minimum standards set by her Government?

The Prime Minister: I have not seen the detail of that report, as it came out only this morning. I am aware of some of the figures. May I point out that spending on the National Health Service has increased from £7·5 billion in 1978-79 to £18·75 billion in 1986-87. That means that the average expenditure per family to finance the Health Service out of taxation has gone up from less than £11 per family per week to £27 per family per week. That is what families have to find in tax to finance the Health Service, which is the best Health Service that we have ever had.

Mr. Kinnock: Has it occurred to the Prime Minister that families not only pay taxes but need dependable health services, and that they have a real grievance now over the deficiencies in that Service? Does she not accept that, on her Ministers' own admissions, the figure that she used earlier should be at least a third higher in order to meet the realities of increasing numbers of frail elderly people, of changes in medical technology and of changes in provision of community services? The Prime Minister has asked that the facts should talk. Do not these facts of underfunding talk very clearly and say that the Health Service is not and never will be safe in the Prime Minister's hands?

The Prime Minister: No. We have the best Health Service ever. It is safe in our hands, and it far exceeds what the last Labour Government did. I note that the Merrison committee set up by the Labour Government said:

"We had no difficulty in believing the proposition put to us by one medical witness, that we can easily spend the whole of the gross national product on the health service."

Every Government have to work within constraints, but what the right hon. Gentleman said about an extra third would mean that every family would immediately have to increase its spending from £27 per week on the National Health Service to £36 per week.

Mr. Hicks: Will my right hon. Friend examine the Commission's proposals for New Zealand butter imports for the next two years, which, if implemented, could have adverse effects not only for our dairy farmers but for our taxpayers? Will she recall that these arrangements were meant to be transitional, yet New Zealand today has a greater share of our butter market than it did in 1973 at an annual cost in excess of £100 million?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend — and, I believe, the House—is aware, we have always fought for New Zealand in the Community, knowing full well the importance of both lamb and butter to that economy. The amount that the Commission is proposing should be permitted to be imported for the next two years is, of course, considerably less—indeed, almost half—what it was when we went in at the beginning, and the figures being proposed represent a reduction on current levels, but are in line with what was proposed when the question was last discussed in 1984. I believe that we should continue to fight for New Zealand in the Community, but I believe that the figures should be realistic and that those have been proposed by the Commission are realistic.

Mr. Steel: If I may revert to South Africa and look back at the whirlwind of interviews that the Prime Minister has given over the last 48 hours, of which result is she most proud? Is it the paean of praise showered on her by Pretoria state radio, the humiliation of the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary in Zambia and Zimbabwe, or the damage to the Commonwealth games in Edinburgh?

The Prime Minister: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman does not know it, but I think that the argument against general economic sanctions and punitive economic sanctions has been won. I notice that The Guardian says today:

"Economic sanctions will not bring South Africa to its knees: they will mean that black children starve: the desolation of the Pretoria economy would be a tragedy for all Africa."

That is true. Is that what the right hon. Gentleman wants?

Mr. Norris: Would my right hon. Friend care to comment on her view this morning of the new Rover 800 series car, and will she join me in congratulating my constituents at Cowley on a magnificent product and wish it well for the future?

The Prime Minister: I saw the car and it is excellent and of superb design. I hope that it will sell well, and I can certainly recommend the blue one that I drove this morning.

Q5. Mr. Yeo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Yeo: In applauding my right hon. Friend's determination to reduce the burden of tax on the lower paid, may I urge her to consider further increases in tax thresholds, further reductions in employee national insurance contributions for low-paid workers and the re-introduction of a lower rate of taxation, in preference to cutting the basic rate of income tax, as all those three measures are far more cost-effective ways of using available resources?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, our objective remains to reduce the burden of income tax, particularly on those on average earnings or lower pay. Some 18 million taxpayers are on below-average male earnings, but they pay 42 per cent. of the yield of income tax. We must have special regard to the amount that they pay. It remains our aim to reduce it. My hon. Friend has a particular scheme, which I shall draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mrs. Renée Short: I am sure that the Prime Minister is delighted with the vindication of Mrs. Wendy Savage by the committee set up to investigate her clinical competence. Will the Prime Minister now ensure that those consultants who accused Mrs. Savage, and who deprived her patients of her skill and care for all these months, are investigated by the committee of the teaching district?

The Prime Minister: I shall draw what the hon. Lady has said to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Lyell: Will my right hon. Friend warn the public, and particularly employees and trades unionists, against the reported Labour party proposal to remove from the courts and hand over to some trades union-based quango the power, such as it might be, to enforce their rights to secret ballots before strikes, and to elect union officials? How can this be described as either freedom or fairness?

The Prime Minister: I gladly agree with my hon. and learned Friend. It has been our purpose to give ordinary members of trades unions legally enforceable rights to have a proper ballot and we shall continue to pursue that objective.

Q6. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Kirkwood: Is the Prime Minister aware that the proposed social security regulations designed to restrict single payments available to claimants on supplementary benefit were expected to be laid on the Table of the House this week, but have now been deliberately suppressed by the DHSS until after the Newcastle-under-Lyme by-election? Was she consulted about the decision on timing, and will she give the House a guarantee that the regulations will be debated before the recess and not implemented by stealth during the recess?

The Prime Minister: It is my understanding that the regulations will be debated before the recess.

Q9. Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Prime Minister aware that those of us who are very much opposed to her policy on South Africa hope, nevertheless, that the Commonwealth leaders, when they meet, will bear in mind that the Prime Minister does not represent the majority of British opinion, and moreover that the days of her wretched Administration are coming to an end?

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is guilty of wishful thinking on the latter point. I believe that the overwhelming majority of the British people reject the use of force to try to solve the South African problem, wish to have a suspension of violence and a peaceful solution, and support my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary in his mission.

Mrs. McCurley: Now that the European Court has delivered its judgment on compensation for nationalisation, will my right hon. Friend suggest how Parliament can protect the property rights of the citizens of this country, particularly if, God help us, there are predations from the Labour side of the House, if the Opposition are ever returned to government?

The Prime Minister: The people can protect the property rights of citizens by never returning a Labour Government.

Q10. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Powell: The Prime Minister can get into a fit about sanctions against South Africa, but has she considered that the bloodstained coal of South Africa has caused the redundancy of many people in this country, particularly in my constituency, where her Government have closed five collieries and put 5,000 miners out of work? Is she aware that since the miners' strike hundreds of miners have been pushed out of work because coal is being imported from South Africa? What are the Prime Minister and her Government going to do to stop that?

The Prime Minister: Judging from the drift of the hon. Gentleman's question, he is against causing further unemployment by imposing sanctions on South Africa. To impose sanctions on South Africa would cause further unemployment there and would cause further unemployment here. I understand that the hon. Gentleman does not wish that to happen. Nor do I.

Q12. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Prime Minister of she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Shepherd: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the whole nation will be watching carefully the progress that she makes with her new Rover Sterling car? As for the future of this car, does my right hon. Friend agree that it will outsell Mercedes and Audi only if its quality and reliability are of the absolute topmost maximum possible effectiveness?

The Prime Minister: I believe that that car is of the topmost design, that it has a super engine and that every attention has been given to every detail. Special extra provision will also be made for its export to the United States. We wish it well. I have great faith in the car.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 14 JULY Until seven o'clock, private Members' motions.

Remaining stages of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Bill.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

TUESDAY 15 JULY Opposition Day (18th Allotted Day, 1st Part). There will be a debate entitled "Defending British High Technology Industries". The debate will arise on a motion in the names of the leaders of the Liberal and Social Democratic parties.

Motions on orders and regulations relating to drivers' hours. Details will be given in the Official Report.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

WEDNESDAY 16 JULY Opposition Day (19th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion, the subject for debate to be announced.

Motion on the Control of Pesticides Regulations.

Motion on secretarial allowances.

Remaining stages of the British Council and Commonwealth Institute Superannuation Bill.

THURSDAY 17 JULY Completion of remaining stages of the Finance Bill.

Motion relating to the Channel Tunnel Bill.

At ten o'clock the question will be put on all outstanding Estimates.

FRIDAY 18 JULY Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Dockyard Services Bill.

Proceedings on the Insolvency Bill [Lords] and the Company Directors Disqualification Bill [Lords] which are both consolidation measures.

Motion on the New Towns (Extinguishment of Liabilities) Order.

MONDAY 21 JULY Opposition Day (15th Allotted Day, 2nd part). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion, the subject for debate to be announced.

Consideration of any Lords Amendments which may be received to the Gas Bill.

The House will wish to know that, subject to the progress of business, it will be proposed that the House should rise for the summer Adjournment on Friday 25 July.

[Regulations and Orders to be debated on Tuesday 15 July: Drivers' Hours (Harmonisation with Community Rules) Regulations; Drivers' Hours (Goods Vehicles) (Modifications) Order; Community Drivers' Hours and Recording Equipment (Exemptions and Supplementary Provisions) Regulations; Community Drivers' Hours and Recording Equipment Regulations.]

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the Leader of the House. The mess in which the Government have placed themselves is obvious in next week's business. That is why we have a continual late, late show with so much important business being taken after 10 o'clock, and the Dockyard Services Bill and the new towns order coming in on Friday. Does he really think that the Dockyard Services Bill, which vitally affects Plymouth and Rosyth, and the new towns order, which vitally affects many other places, is fitting business for Friday?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that major decisions are likely to be taken on the future of Leyland Bus and Truck in the next few days? Can he assure us that there will be a statement on the matter either tomorrow or on Monday? That is the time scale in which the Government should be operating. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to guarantee that there will be statements on the rate support grant for the different parts of Britain before the summer recess.

We are awaiting the Government's decision on how they will react to changes that have been made to the Social Security Bill in another place. A few hours for debate, especially if they are made available to the House on the day of the royal wedding, will not do justice to legislation affecting millions of elderly and poor people in Britain. Will the right hon. Gentleman reaffirm that, in response to my request, he will arrange for the Foreign Secretary to report to the House when he returns from his visit to southern Africa next week?

Finally, will the right hon. Gentleman tell us when we are to hear the long-awaited statement on the Prime Minister's great anti-litter campaign? Will he take it from me that, on the basis of current calculations, the initiative seems as if it is to be as great a malfunction as Mr. Branson's earlier transatlantic odyssey.

Mr. Biffen: I shall take the Leader of the Opposition's questions in the sequence in which he presented them. It is a travesty to describe the business that I have announced as some sort of mess. He knows perfectly well that the House has to consider a good deal of business in the final two weeks before going into the summer recess. He knows that a well-judged programme of work has been presented for next week that will not detain the House unduly, unless there are those who are anxious to create mischief.

If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to make representations through the usual channels on the treatment of the Dockyard Services Bill, I shall take note of that. I hope, however, that he will recognise that, under successive Governments, Fridays have been properly treated as days for significant Government business as well as for other measures.

I shall refer to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry the right hon. Gentleman's remarks about Leyland Bus and Truck and the possibility of a statement. I reassure the right hon. Gentleman by repeating what I told him last week. It is our plan to have the rate support grant announcement for the component parts of Great Britain laid before the House before it goes into recess.

We shall be making clear the Government's position and recommendations on the Lords amendments to the Social Security Bill. I must tell the right hon. Gentleman that for many people throughout the country, royal wedding or not, Wednesday 23 July will be an ordinary working day. I would not like to think that the right hon. Gentleman thought that for the House of Commons there was somehow to be a "second division" of work on that occasion. [Interruption.] I am sorry that those homespun observations have caused such anxiety and embarrassment on Opposition Benches.

Finally, I take account of what the right hon. Gentleman says about the desirability of the House learning from my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary direct after he has concluded his present African journey, and I shall make that point known. Also, I hope that there will be a statement on United Kingdom 2000 next week.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the fact that early-day motion 991 on the death penalty for terrorists now has the support of 130 right hon. and hon. Members?

[That this House congratulates and thanks all those whose efforts played a part in securing the conviction of the Brighton bomber on charges of murdering five people and of those who so recently pleaded guilty in Belfast to murdering 17 people; extends its heartfelt sympathy to all who suffered loss or injury from their acts; asks itself whether there is available in such cases any penalty such as will in any sense meet the crime and whether in permitting the law as to penalties to remain as it is, it is doing sufficient to protect those who may be the next victims of such appalling evil; is of the opinion that it should give fresh consideration to extending the death penalty, now limited to treason and piracy, to criminal acts such as those done to terrorise; and asks the Leader of the House to arrange for it to have time to debate these matters.]

While I appreciate that my right hon. Friend cannot assist us before the recess, may I suggest that the horrific nature of the act referred to in the motion, and the fact that several people who have consistently voted against the death penalty support the motion show that this is not a closed subject? May I ask my right hon. Friend to give kindly consideration to allocating time to this subject, which is of great interest to the public, in the autumn programme?

Mr. Biffen: I take the point that my right hon. and learned Friend makes and I appreciate the terms in which he has put it to me. I shall consider it in the context of the overspill, but he will know that that is a fairly congested period of parliamentary existence. With the next session of Parliament, all sorts of additional opportunities may arise.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Given the reply that the Prime Minister gave earlier this afternoon to my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) about laying the social security supplementary benefit regulations before the House, can the Leader of the House say when they will be laid? Will he also tell us the time scale for the review of secretarial allowances and whether that four-year review will look at fundamental questions as well as percentage increases?

Mr. Biffen: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, the order will be laid in good time and he need have no fear of being disappointed. On his second point, the four-yearly review is a fundamental review of the operation of the secretarial allowances and goes far beyond a consideration of mere percentages. No time limits have been suggested for reporting back, but I imagine that they will be reported back some time early next year.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Will my right hon. Friend give consideration before the recess to finding time for a debate to draw attention to the significant increase in overseas aid which the British Government are giving to many Commonwealth, including African, countries? It would provide a welcome opportunity for many of us to say to those Commonwealth countries which are now threatening to boycott and impose sanctions on the United Kingdom that they should not be allowed with impunity to bite the hand that feeds them.

Mr. Biffen: I fully understand my hon. Friend's anxiety that there should be parliamentary time for a debate on this topic; his point will receive widespread recognition. He will understand that I can offer no Government time between now and Parliament going into recess, but certainly the topic will still have considerable currency when we return in the autumn.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Is the Leader of the House aware of the major problems that face us in some inner cities of the deteriorating housing stock, particularly of houses built in the 1950s and 1960s? Is he further aware that, in the city of Leeds, the problem has come to a head with the balconies of high-rise blocks being in danger of falling off, and that the people living in them are genuinely worried that little can be done because there is no money? Can we expect a statement on that next week? It is all very well going into recess and I am glad that we are, but meantime, unless the Department of the Environment comes up with some money, some people are in a far worse position than they would be in the old slum dwellings.

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful for the right hon. Gentleman's word of appreciation about the proposal that we should rise for the summer Adjournment on Friday 25 July. I was beginning to wonder whether I had a single friend on this topic in the House. I am perfectly prepared to revise the date, if the House would so wish. I will refer the point about housing in Leeds and more generally to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): In addition to the statement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on his South African visit, will there be an opportunity, perhaps, to debate South Africa before we rise? If we did, it would provide an opportunity, first, for those who believe that economic sanctions are nonsense nevertheless to express the view that the National Government are being particularly pigheaded about the release of Nelson Mandela; and, secondly, for the Opposition to explain why, at a time when the pass laws were in full brutal effect, a Labour President of the Board of Trade was encouraging trade with South Africa and was saying in the House that if we stopped trading with countries with which we disagreed, we would soon be bankrupt. Perhaps the Opposition would wish to use a Supply day to refute the charge of humbug.

Mr. Biffen: I will try to give my hon. Friend as straight a reply as I can to a subtle question. I have to tell him that as things stand, if we are to go into recess on the date I have suggested, there will be no opportunity for a debate in Government time. Of course, there will be a recess Adjournment motion and the debates that arise from that. That may well give my hon. Friend the opportunity that he seeks.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): Will the Leader of the House ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to make a statement next week answering points I raised in the Defence Estimates debate on Tuesday 1 July, on a Standing Order No. 10 application on Thursday 3 July and in questions to the Prime Minister on Tuesday 8 July about why the Harland and Wolff design drawings for the AOR1 were said to have been comprehensively costed in April and are still being reviewed at the Ministry of Defence now?

Mr. Biffen: As I have previously acknowledged, the hon. Gentleman is a persuasive advocate on that matter. I shall refer the points that he has raised to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Has my right hon. Friend seen early-day motion 1094 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) about cement imports from Greece, on which Conservative Members saw the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction this morning?

[That this House is gravely concerned about the damage that will be caused to both the United Kingdom cement industry and to employment by state subsidised cement imports from Greece; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to make urgent and strenuous representations to the EEC Commissioners to amend the transitional arrangements to prevent this dumping taking place.]

Is he aware that it is an extremely urgent and important matter on which we expect a statement from the Minister for Trade next week?

Mr. Biffen: I was aware of the motion to which my hon. Friend refers and of the exchanges that took place on the topic involving my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. As my hon. Friend will appreciate, it is a matter in which we are beholden, to some extent, to European Community commitments and institutions. However, I shall certainly pass on to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry the anxiety that there should be a statement.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Did the Leader of the House tell us that we were to deal with Lords amendments to the Gas Bill late at night a week on Monday? Is that not an example of gracelessness, since I understand that the House of Lords has not yet finished consideration of that Bill? Might it not be taken amiss by their Lordships and would it not be entirely reasonable if they did feel that anger?

Mr. Biffen: The advice, which I am sure was most thoughtfully considered, may be based on a misapprehension. I would judge that we are likely to get on to that business at about 7 o'clock in the evening.

Mr. Cecil Franks (Barrow and Furness): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is well aware of the grave disquiet, not only in the House but throughout the country, concerning allegations against the deputy chief constable of Manchester and his subsequent removal from the inquiry into Northern Ireland. Will my right hon. Friend accept that hon. Members understand the difficulties of the Home Secretary, the Attorney-General and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in making any comment on the matter since they are the ultimate appellate authorities for matters within their responsibility? Will he convey to his right hon. Friend that, if the Police Complaints Authority ultimately decides that there is no substance or validity to the allegations made against Mr. Stalker, it would be most convenient for those who have been culpable in making those allegations, if such an announcement of innocence were to be delayed until after 25 July when hon. Members will not have the opportunity to raise the matter in the House?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has put those points to me previously. I am sure that he will appreciate that I cannot, very helpfully, go beyond what I said last week. I shall certainly put the point that he has raised to my right hon. Friends for whom it is relevant.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is the Leader of the House aware that if he is looking for someone to disagree with the 25 July recess date I will be the one? Apart from 4 million people on unintentional permanent holiday who are unemployed, most workers in this country get no more than four or five weeks holiday a year. If the arcane procedures of this place were brought into the latter half of the 20th century there would be a case for Members of Parliament having a similar length of holiday to workers in the rest of the country. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is not a holiday."] It is for Tory Members.

We should have that length of holiday if for no other reason than that, in this case, it would enable us to question the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary following the Commonwealth conference in August about why she is not prepared to implement economic sanctions against the apartheid regime in South Africa. We could then monitor the progress of those trade union organisations gearing themselves up in the next few weeks to implement such sanctions.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman puts a lively point of view. I must most profoundly disagree with the proposition that the recess is analogous to a holiday. When I fought Coventry, East in the 1950s, that was a good apprenticeship. I lost nobly, I might say; Richard Crossman increased his majority. Let me tell the hon. Gentleman that I learnt many things. One was the hard work done by Maurice Edelman, Richard Crossman and Elaine Burton in that city during the recess. They would not have thought of that as a holiday. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not cast aspersions to the effect that he is surrounded in the House by a mob that is about to decamp to the south of France.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): As we are moving into the marching season in Northern Ireland, when the House of Commons will not be in session, may I ask my right hon. Friend whether he has seen the call by one hon. Member of the House that the Royal Ulster Constabulary should do less than its duty in policing the march at Portadown next weekend, and the call of another hon. Member that a statutory body, the Police Federation for Northern Ireland, should actively fight against the Anglo-Irish agreement? Will my right hon. Friend make sure that, before the House rises, the Secretary of State has an opportunity to make it clear that it is a criminal offence for a Member of the House or any other citizen to seek to procure the disaffection of a police officer, that it is the duty of every police officer to uphold the law without malice or affection and with fear or favour to none, and that no hon. Member can get outside of those obligations?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a particularly effective point at this time in the affairs of the Province.

I believe that there is a widespread if not universal desire in the House to applaud the bravery of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in carrying out one of the most invidious tasks that could befall any civilian police force. I understand that initially the points that my hon. Friend raised are matters for consideration by the police, but I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to them, so that he may consider them.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): When can the House have the chance to debate the competence of the British Rail midland region management, where services and maintenance have disastrously declined over the past few years and which, on the motto "We're getting there," managed to produce the timetable for the Birmingham-Paddington services, due on 12 May, on 10 July?

Mr. Biffen: Last week it was the hon. Gentleman's gastronomy that was adversely affected—

Mr. Faulds: Only briefly.

Mr. Biffen: It has to be briefly; I rather treasure these exchanges. This week it is the hon. Gentleman's travel arrangements. I suggest that it could very well be a matter for consideration in the recess Adjournment debate, but in any case I shall refer the hon. Gentleman's point to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): Can my right hon. Friend tell us whether it would be wise of us to expect a debate on the Peacock report before the recess?

Mr. Biffen: It would be foolish virginity of the most remarkable condition.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside):) I support the point raised by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) about the import of cement from Greece. I refer the Leader of the House to my early-day motion 1081.

[That this House, concerned at the increasing import of cement from Greece, the German Democratic Republic and Poland, which poses a threat to the United Kingdom cement industry and the stability of the home cement market, fears that over capacity, particularly in Greece, and further cheap imports will have a detrimental effect on jobs and investments; supports the Transport and General Workers' Union's special delegate conference on 21st July; and also calls upon Her Majesty's Government to take the necessary steps to protect the British cement industry and British working jobs.]

The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that there is a special delegate meeting of the Transport and General Workers Union, which is concerned about the effects that those imports may have on the cement industry in Britain and British worker's jobs.

Mr. Biffen: I understand that the concern is not confined to just one side of the House. It goes across a wide spectrum. I cannot add to the reply that I have already given, but I shall see that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry knows of the interest.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): The Leader of the House will be aware of the prolonged opposition that my constituents and I have levelled against a proposal to put low-level nuclear waste at Fulbeck airfield. I think that he will be aware that Fulbeck airfield was run by the Ministry of Defence, and that the original purpose for that has now ceased. Is the Leader of the House aware that many of my constituents believe that to use a former defence airfield for such a purpose is a breach of the principles enunciated by Sir Thomas Dugdale in the Crichel Down case at the time of his resignation? Will the Leader of the House take the opportunity to ensure that a senior Minister of the Crown tells the House whether the Crichel Down principle, as enunciated by Sir Thomas, still operates, or whether it has been abandoned?

Mr. Biffen: I shall pass on the request. I realise that my hon. Friend's constituency has a lively interest in the matter. I shall see what I can do to secure an answer for him.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): As the school holidays are approaching even faster than our own, and as schoolchildren will have even less to do than most hon. Members, will the right hon. Gentleman allow time for a debate on road safety in the absolute knowledge that a considerable number of children will be tragically killed on our roads during their holiday? Will he bear in mind the carnage on the roads in constituencies, such as mine, that are being cut through the great estates, dividing the people who live on them, and causing a tremendous new danger to the children who play on them?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. and learned Gentleman will appreciate my difficulties about suggesting the availability of Government time. The hon. and learned Gentleman may have a chance to make the point on Monday of next week during transport questions.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): My constituents who speculated in a vote for the alliance in the county council elections last year got their fingers badly burned when the rates were hoisted by 40 per cent. They are now horrified to learn that, apparently, the alliance stands for the dismantling of the multi-fibre arrangement, and that would cost thousands of jobs in my constituency. Can we have an early debate, before the arrangement is renegotiated, so that those contemplating voting in the local government by-elections in my constituency in September know exactly what it will cost them to vote alliance this time?

Mr. Biffen: I shall gladly consider the question. A debate on the multi-fibre arrangement would demonstrate that not only was the alliance in favour of its dismantling, but that it carries its own seeds of discontent, because the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) strongly agrees with the alliance policy.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I ask the Leader of the House whether he has had an opportunity to read early-day motion 1078.

[That this House calls upon Her Majesty's Government to provide time in Energy Efficiency Year for a debate in the House on energy efficiency; notes the Energy Committee's recommendation that such a debate would appropriately complement the extra-parliamentary activities being held during the year; and believes that the House is the appropriate forum for the Secretary of State for Energy to be held accountable for the level of success of the expensive 1986 campaign to promote energy efficiency by which he has set so much store.]

The early-day motion requests the Government to provide time for a debate on energy efficiency. Is the Leader of the

[Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse]

House aware that the Select Committee on Energy recommended that such a debate would be complementary to the extra-parliamentary activities taking place? Does he think that the Secretary of State for Energy should be accountable to the House for activities during Energy Efficiency Year?

Mr. Biffen: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman has made, especially in the context of it being Energy Efficiency Year. There is no prospect of a debate in Government time before we go into recess. Obviously, it could be considered in the overspill.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Can my right hon. Friend tell us more about the latest spot of bother on the Channel tunnel, and why it necessitates a surprise late-night debate during the coming week? Will he ensure that the motion that we debate on that occasion will be broad, so that we can discuss the latest disclosures in today's press reports that the Eurotunnel consortium has had to call an emergency board meeting, following advice it received from its financial advisers in the City of London that it is unable to raise even the first £200 million of equity for this amazingly successful £4 billion project?

Mr. Biffen: I am in no position to comment on the financial problems that my hon. Friend believes might exist. However, the motion will be tabled later today. It will invite the House to instruct the Select Committee on the Channel Tunnel Bill to consider suggestions by petitioners for alternative means of access and egress to the Folkestone terminal.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House revise his opinion about having a debate on South Africa, following his answer to the hon. Member for Cambridge, South-West (Sir A. Grant)? Such a debate could prove interesting. It would give us the opportunity to read out the names of all those 30-odd Tory Members of Parliament who are making money out of South Africa. It would enable the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) — a spokesman for the Social Democratic party—to explain that he is making money out of apartheid supported by Barclays bank. It would enable the Liberals and the Social Democrats to explain why they took £2,500 from General Accident, which is making money out of the alleyways in South Africa. Such a debate might lead those hon. Members, if they are concerned about the morality of apartheid, to say that they will give the money back. If the right hon. Gentleman has any problems in setting aside such a day, may I say that some of us are prepared to come here on the day of the wedding.

Mr. Biffen: Thank you very much. When the hon. Gentleman has stopped bending my ear, and as I have so little time available between now and the recess, may I discreetly and respectfully suggest that he bend the ears of his own Front Bench because there is a day and a half of Opposition time. I know the hon. Gentleman's difficulties——

Mr. Skinner: I am working on it.

Mr. Biffen: Good—keep working.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Following the suspicious circumstances surrounding the election of Mr. John Macreadie as general secretary of the Civil and Public Services Association and the allegation of vote rigging and intimidation, will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on employment and election for union office, as it is highly likely that a new election will be called by the Right wing, the moderates and the sensible members of the Civil Service? Is there not a need for a postal election, and therefore no intimidation, rather than a workplace election? Will my right hon. Friend provide time for such a debate?

Mr. Biffen: I think that my hon. Friend and the House generally will agree that the union is carrying out an inquiry. I should have thought that it would not necessarily be a bad thing to wait until the consequences are known.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is still a member of the Government? Having confirmed that, will the right hon. Gentleman have a word with his colleague, if he sees him in Cabinet, and ask him whether he will make a statement to the House on the fundamental issue of the effect of radiation on sheepmeat in my constituency and in other parts of north and mid-Wales, as he is the only Minister with responsibility for agriculture who has not made a statement to the House on that subject?

Mr. Biffen: I am a little concerned that the hon. Gentleman is perhaps so caught up in the glorious countryside of Meirionnydd that he has not come to the House to realise that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is a most effective Minister in Westminster and Whitehall and is fully in charge of affairs. I shall tell my right hon. Friend of the sad circumstances which seem to have overtaken the hon. Gentleman and ascertain whether there is any way in which he can remedy them.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): I notice that we are to have a debate on secretarial allowances. Perhaps alliance Members of Parliament need particular help in this respect in light of the remarkable amnesia recorded on the part of 2·5 million people. An opinion poll published this week shows that, although 26 per cent. of the population voted for the alliance last time, only 18·5 per cent. remember doing so.

Mr. Biffen: I would say with all my heart that we have enough on the agenda next week without introducing that topic.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): As one who has an abiding interest in safety at sea and related matters, I deplore the fact that there is not to be a debate on next week's boat race. After all, there is the important issue of the safety of participants in that race. I should like to declare a personal interest. With no consultation whatsoever, I have been placed in the same boat as the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens). With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I would suggest, on a fair amount of experience, that he constitutes a safety hazard on any vessel of less than 100 tonnes gross registered tonnage. I sincerely hope that an urgent constituency issue will take me away from the House next Wednesday.

Mr. Biffen: I understand the personal dilemma that confronts the hon. Gentleman. I can say only that he should use the usual channels with he utmost expedition to secure a clear undertaking on pairing. As to the wider issue——

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): This is the silly season.

Mr. Biffen: I have no responsibility for what happens next Wednesday. The point raised by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) is precisely one that could feature in the recess Adjournment debate.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is a great problem in Winchester whereby central Government are calling for the building of 65,000 new homes in an area where there is insufficient local infrastructure to cope? The proposed buildings are far in excess of the number wished for by the local authorities. Does my right hon. Friend accept that this is a national problem in two respects? First, the decision grossly overrides locally expressed democracy. Secondly, it will divert valuable and much-needed resources from the north and midlands to an area where an excess number of these homes are being built. May we have a proper debate on that subject?

Mr. Biffen: I am afraid that I cannot offer a debate within the time scale that we are considering. I shall refer my hon. Friend's point to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, because it is the Department of the Environment which is capable of dealing with that problem.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of early-day motions 1043, 1049 and 1066 on the position in Chile?

[That this House, condemning the continuing oppression in Chile, expresses its full support for the working people of that unhappy country in their national strike on 2nd and 3rd July; and congratulates them on their courageous struggle for freedom and democracy.]

[That this House supports the objectives of the National Civic Assembly of Chile, which is calling for a return to democracy and an end to military dictatorship in that country; and deplores the repression of political opposition and dissent being carried out by the military rulers of Chile.]

[That this House is alarmed at the reports from Chile of police brutality, arrests and charges against the organisers of a national day's protest; and further calls on Her Majesty's Government to cease all military contact with Chile and to recall Her Majesty's Ambassador.]

Does not the right hon. Gentleman feel that it is essential that, before the end of this session, there is time for a full debate on Britain's relationships with Chile, on the use by the British military of Chilean bases as part of the Falklands enterprise and on the sale by British companies of arms to the Chilean Government, which are used to kill people on the streets of Santiago who are protesting against the military dictatorship which has overtaken that country?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman thoughtfully sought a debate before the conclusion of this Session. Clearly, that subject could be considered when we come to the overspill, but it cannot feature in the business between now and the recess.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I know how the Leader of the House felt when he lost in Coventry. In 1970, I lost by the odd 26,000 votes in East Grinstead. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the concern expressed by both sides of the House that, when next week we debate secretarial and clerical allowances, the House will be asked to break with the agreed formula? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that these additional resources are desperately needed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, especially those who represent inner-city constituencies where the problems can be weighed, there are so many of them? Is he aware also of the scurrilous allegations which have been made? Ian Aitken made one in the Guardian. If some hon. Members are not using their allowances as they should, why should not all the allowances be paid through the Fees Office? We desperately need that money. We need the resources to represent our constituents. When will we have the vote? On what shall we vote?

Mr. Biffen: Most of the hon. Gentleman's points relate to the general review of the secretarial allowance — [Interruption.] May I just answer this point? It must be well into July. The debate on the order will concern the uprating for the current year. The formula linkage has broken down because of restructuring.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for the Secretary of State for Defence to make a statement so that we can ascertain the progress of the Vickers bid for the royal ordnance factory in Leeds? Will the right hon. Gentleman ask his colleague to square any potential sale with previous statements which show the Government's commitment to privatise the ROF as a whole and not in part? In the same statement, will the Secretary of State for Defence guarantee that the sale will be in line with the Government's competition policy? That sale will result in there being only one tank producer in this country under private ownership, over which the Government would have no control. Is it not about time that the Government played the game squarely by the ROF employees in Leeds, not as they have done over the past month?

Mr. Biffen: I reject the remarks which surrounded the hon. Gentleman's central question. He asked me to request my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to make a further statement on that matter. As the hon. Gentleman will appreciate, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence answered a private notice question on this matter only a short while ago. Of course, I will refer the hon. Gentleman's remarks to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Can we have a debate on the regional reorganisation of the BBC? Is the Leader of the House aware that the BBC board has taken a most unpopular, unpalatable and unacceptable decision in the view of the northern region by moving Cumbria from the north of England into the north-west? Is he aware that that decision has antagonised the whole of my electorate and the electorates of the hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and of my hon. Friends the Members for Carlisle (Mr. Lewis), for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and others in the northern region? Even at this late stage, may we have a debate on this matter?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot comment upon the substance of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. However, if he is correct, it shows a remarkable lack of sensitivity on the part of the management of the BBC and that has been a matter of concern to many on the Conservative Benches for some time. I will examine the hon. Gentleman's points and see what time might be available later in the year.

Commonwealth Games (Boycott)

4.11 pm

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"The threat to the Commonwealth games in Edinburgh caused by the boycott by African countries as a result of the British Government's policy towards South Africa."

The importance of this matter can hardly be over-emphasised because many people now believe that the withdrawal of Nigeria and Ghana is likely to be followed by other African Commonwealth states and that might be the beginning of the total break-up of the Commonwealth. It is also important to provide an opportunity to make these African nations understand that the people of this country in general, and of Scotland in particular, are whole-heartedly behind them in their present struggle.

It would be a great tragedy if the African nations were to confuse the Government's policy with the sympathy of the people. The sympathy and support of the British people are wholeheartedly with the people of these African nations. Therefore, it is important that we have time to discuss this urgent matter. In order to demonstrate support for the African nations, many towns and cities throughout Great Britain over the past few weeks have been flying the African National Congress flag.

The matter is specific because it relates to the Commonwealth games. It is urgent because the games are due to open two weeks from today. There is now a real fear that the games will not take place if there are any more withdrawals. You, Mr. Speaker, heard the Leader of the House openly say that there will be no opportunity for a debate on South Africa before the House rises for the summer recess. I respectfully suggest that you, Mr. Speaker, should create that opportunity by granting this application under Standing Order No. 10.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"The threat to the Commonwealth games in Edinburgh caused by the boycott by African countries as a result of the British Government's policy towards South Africa."

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the decision which I must take in this matter is whether to give his application precedence over the business set down for today or for Monday. I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I therefore cannot submit his application to the House.

ESTIMATES DAY

[1ST ALLOTTED DAY] [SECOND PART]

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1986-87

Class III, Vote 1

European Communities (Budget)

[Relevant documents: Fifth report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee on Budgetary Discipline in the European Community, HC 203 (1985-86); the Government's response to the fifth report in their second special report, HC 508 (1985-86).]

4.13 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to raise a point of order which relates to the business about to be called in relation to the Supplementary Estimate in connection with the European Community budget.

The House is placed in an appalling difficulty. Our proceedings are a mixture of farce and scandal. We are being asked to approve an Estimate of no less than £930 million in relation to a budget that has not yet been formally agreed. We all recall that the last European budget of this year was declared to be unlawful and was struck out by the European Court. The present budget has not yet completed its final stages, although I understand that the budget committee of the Council of Ministers agreed it this morning.

The second element of scandal is that no information is available to the House about the composition of the budget or the categories of expenditure which have been approved. I can think of no occasion when the House has been asked to approve the payment of sums of this magnitude in relation to objectives about which the House has no information.

I suggest through you, Mr. Speaker, to the business managers that the debate which is to follow should properly be postponed and that no proceedings should be concluded tonight in advance of full information. Also, the Ministers concerned should come to the House tomorrow morning and make an oral statement at the first opportunity.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that there was an application under Standing Order No. 10 earlier this week from the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) which related to a matter on today's Order Paper. As I understand it, the position is even more serious than my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) has stressed. This afternoon the Assembly Parliament in Strasbourg is being invited to pass a budget which, if agreed, will increase taxation transfer in this country from British taxpayers to the European Economic Community by amounts which at present are unknown, because the Government have not made a statement on that point.

I submit that the amount of taxation should be known before we debate the business before us, and should certainly be known before we debate the business that is due to start at 7 pm. As the Government have not yet made a statement, they should make a statement now, otherwise the business that we are involved in cannot be properly entered into and the powers of this House will be removed without our knowledge.

Mr. Speaker: None of these matters concerns me, as I am not responsible — as the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said — for the business brought before the House. However, I can announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the debate that follows in the name of the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) which would, if passed, reduce the vote by £667 million.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am ready to acknowledge, as every hon. Member should, that you, Mr. Speaker, do not have charge of the business brought before the House. Equally, I am sure that you would be the first to acknowledge that you have primary responsibility for the good order of this House and for assisting in ensuring — although this cannot be your responsibility alone — that the Government do not become irresponsible in their relations with the legislature.

Today we have a conjunction of circumstances in which the body that will, in great part, determine the budget has not made its decision, and which, in its preceding discussions, has given every impression that it is unlikely to make a firm decision. However, we are required today to debate a motion and an amendment to a motion that anticipates the outcome of the budget decisions. We are discussing something that does not exist — [Interruption.] It is all very well for the Economic Secretary to the Treasury to make comments from a sedentary position. I would have thought that any responsible Government Minister would have done his best to ensure that the timing of the debate was such as to make it a debate of substance instead of a debate of speculation.

I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to use your good offices to make the Government business managers consider whether it is appropriate in terms of the orders of this House for us to debate the matter this afternoon.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should make it clear that neither the Estimate nor the debate is designed to approve or disapprove of the 1986 European budget. The motion represents a proposal to validate transfers between the Consolidated Fund and the contingencies fund via a method that has long been recognised as satisfactory by the Treasury and Civil Service Committee. The Committee put forward the matter for debate. It does not depend on the size of the European budget because it relates to the collection of levies and duties.

This debate happens to coincide with the day on which budgetary procedures are taking place in Europe. No doubt my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who is taking part in them, will report to the House after the completion of that process — [Interruption.] But that does not affect the proposals on the Order Paper, which do not involve any increase in public expenditure or in payments from this country to the EC.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the Supplementary Estimates, it says that the provision of £930 million

[Dr. Oonagh McDonald]

"is sought to pay agricultural levies and customs duties which will have been collected under the common customs tariff to the European Community, approximately one month earlier than the dates on which they would normally be paid" at the request of the Commission.

We are talking about amounts that are being paid in as our contribution to the Community budget. The point is that we do not know how much the budget is, or what its constituent parts are. We do not even know whether it has been decided upon by the European Parliament. That is to be decided later this afternoon. We have no details before us, and rumour has it that we shall only be told them in a written answer tomorrow.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary was absolutely accurate in what he said to the House a moment ago. We are being asked to approve an enormous sum of money. The motion standing in the name of my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary refers to payments to the budget of the European Communities for the year ending 31 March 1987.

In my respectful submission, there is at present no such thing as a budget of the European Communities for the year ending 31 March 1987. We have been told that the European Assembly is today debating the budget for the year ending 31 March 1987, and will be able at least in part to decide upon it——

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): It may not decide.

Mr. Gow: That is true. It is possible that the Assembly could debate the matter all night. It is wrong that the House should be asked to approve a payment of £930 million to a budget that does not exist, and which is wrongly described in the motion as being a budget that does exist. In those circumstances, would it not be better if the debate, including the most excellent amendment standing in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), was held after the conclusion of the European Assembly's deliberations?

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have two points to make, Mr. Speaker. First, my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary said that the Treasury and Civil Service Committee approved of this procedure. But the procedures of the House are not decided by the Treasury and Civil Service Committee. We may have a view about the matter, but it would be plainly wrong for my hon. Friend to suggest that the Select Committee is some alternative to your authority, Mr. Speaker.

Secondly, when my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) was on the Front Bench, he gave a binding undertaking on behalf of the Government that there would be no further recourse to the House for extra funds. He gave that undertaking on behalf of the Government. There is plainly a grave imbalance, if not a constitutional crisis, which the Government must face. It is wrong that they should come before the House with this proposition when they do not know the extent of the change in position, and when the House does not know the extent to which they have gone back on the solemn undertaking given by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The House is being asked to agree to either the motion or the amendment. It is being asked to give the European Communities either a lot of money in advance, or very little. The motion is based on the premise that there is a cash flow shortage. But at the moment we do not know whether there will be a cash flow shortage after the European Assembly has made its decision. We understand that the budget has left the Common Market without enough money to pay its bills. But it will be impossible for any hon. Member to make a reasonable decision about the motion if he does not know whether that cash flow crisis still exists.

We read in the newspapers that the Common Market budget will give authority for up to 1·4 per cent. to be raised from VAT, which will involve a huge additional sum. But we do not have the slightest idea whether that is the real figure. Hon. Members will find it impossible to decide whether to vote for the motion or the amendment. We know that there was a cash flow crisis last week, but we do not know whether there is a crisis now. We just do not know how much extra money the European Assembly and the Council of Ministers have agreed to take.

Is there any way in which hon. Members can postpone the debate? No hon. Member can know whether there is still a cash flow crisis in the Common Market, although it appears that the Council of Ministers may have solved it by agreeing to an extra £2 billion.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Do you agree, Mr. Speaker, that during the past few years, and particularly since the Common Market went bankrupt, this constitutional difficulty has raised its ugly head in the Chamber quite a few times? Points of order are being raised because hon. Members feel that they are being placed in great difficulty because the Common Market wants the power when it has not got the money. Hon. Members are always being urged to believe that there should be no taxation without representation, but the Common Market and the Government are cutting across that principle.

There is another problem, in that perhaps the debate is being held today because the Treasury and Civil Service Committee is going on a fact-finding tour next week. I have received assurances that if the debate is postponed, not until next week, when it would be inconvenient for the Committee's members to attend, but until the following week or even later, no inconvenience would be caused to those travelling to all the corners of the world in search of those very important facts. So if there is any question of postponing the debate, I can say that there is no problem, providing that it is held within the 10 days following Sunday.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): If anything, the position is even more complicated than my hon. Friends the Members for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) and for Wolverhampton South-West (Mr. Budgen) have pointed out. The date mentioned in the motion is 31 March 1987, and the amount being asked for is supposed to take us up to that period. But the EEC budget runs for a calendar year, from January to December. We are therefore being asked to debate the amount of money before us today, which would take us through until March 1987, when we do not know precisely what the EEC budget for 1986 is, or what it will be for 1987.

Thus I suggest that the position is even more difficult than has been suggested so far. I hope that the House will be given time to consider these issues before being rushed into voting this huge amount of money.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are faced with a difficult problem. The House is accustomed to being continually asked to rubber stamp increasingly large sums of money to the Common Market. We are presently in a state of flux because we are being asked to vote money to a budget which, as the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr Gow) has said, does not exist. Would it not be better to postpone this debate until we know what the budget is? Then we would know what we were voting money to.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Speaker: I do not think it will help. The hon. Gentleman has had his say and I now want to have mine.

I appreciate that the House is in difficulty but I think we should proceed by stages. The vote is for a supplementary sum not exceeding £930 million. I have already announced to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) who is the Chairman of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. If the House feels as strongly about this as it evidently does, it has a remedy of voting for that amendment.

Mr. Gow rose——

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Speaker: It is no good hon. Gentlemen bobbing up and down. I have no power to postpone this debate. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) may make his point.

Mr. Budgen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I attacked my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) and he is hoping to catch your eye on a point of order to explain that what I said was, perhaps, wrong. I hope that you will be able to see him more clearly in a moment or two.

Mr. Speaker: I am amazed that the hon. Gentleman believes that he may have been wrong, but if the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) thinks he was, perhaps he will tell us.

Mr. Gow: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have no wish to criticise the former Minister of State, Treasury who spoke in last year's debate on 22 October. However, on a point of order, my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) made some observations about what the former Minister said. It may be convenient for the House, and certainly for my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, if I remind you, Mr. Speaker, of what was said on that occasion by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), whose amendment you have selected for debate this afternoon.

Mr. Budgen: What did you say?

Mr. Gow: I am coming to that. I wish to remind you, Mr. Speaker, of the pertinent question which was put on 22 October by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing:

"can he"—

that was the then Minister of State—

"give us a categorical assurance that the Government will not in any way increase the sums available to the Common Market before those negotiations take place?"

The Minister replied:

"I repeat"——

[Interruption.] That is what he said—

"that I find it impossible to envisage circumstances"——

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Withdraw.

Mr. Gow: I am quoting from the Official Report and my hon. Friend should not rebuke me for doing so. The Minister said——

Mr. Taylor: What happened to him?

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend must not lead me astray. The Minister said

"I find it impossible to envisage circumstances in which the Government will come back to the House in the way that my right hon. Friend describes"—[Official Report, 22 October 1985; Vol. 84, c. 186.]

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West described those words as a

"categorical assurance given on behalf of the Government."

I submit that they did not amount to a categorical assurance but amounted to a certain incredulity expressed by the then Minister of State as to what would happen.

If I have the good fortune to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, I shall explain why I shall be voting in the Lobby for the amendment standing in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing.

Mr. Speaker: I think the wisest thing would be to see how the Minister gets out of that.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a supplementary sum, not exceeding £930,000,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1987 for expenditure by the Treasury in connection with payments to the Budget of the European Communities not covered by direct charges on the Consolidated Fund under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972, as set out in House of Commons Paper No. 439.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins).

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take it, but very briefly.

Mr. Spearing: I am much obliged, Mr. Speaker. A moment ago, Mr. Speaker, you said that there was no way in which you could adjourn the debate. May I put it to you that, in the Standing Orders of the House, there is a mechanism which has been inserted over the years when the House meets a difficulty and which could be available at this moment. If a Member rises on a point of order and wishes to adjourn the House on a particular matter, it is within the discretion of the Chair to accept the motion.

As I understand it, if the motion is accepted there is a debate—it may be short or long—on whether the House should proceed to the Question. Bearing in mind what you have heard, Mr. Speaker—that there is a non-existent budget to which the House is now being invited to vote money, the basis of our power—and the fact that we have heard nothing from the Treasury Bench on these points of order—that is unusual and should be marked —I therefore, beg to move, That the debate be now adjourned.

[Mr. Spearing]

A motion having been moved, That this House do now adjourn, MR. SPEAKER, pursuant to Standing Order No. 28 (Dilatory motions in abuse of rules of the House), declined to propose the Question thereon to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The Question is the motion on the Order Paper. For the third time, I announce that I have selected the amendment in the name of the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins).

4.36 pm

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): I beg to move,

That Class III, Vote 1, be reduced by £667,000,000.

The House is not in bad humour this afternoon, but I do not think that this should in any way diminish the profound importance of the points of order which have been raised. This is a matter of great moment. It provides a clear argument, which I had not anticipated making, in favour of the amendment which I propose.

Clearly if there is no budget at this moment — we have had no sign from the Economic Secretary that such a thing exists—there must be an overwhelming case for supporting this amendment to a motion which would seek to finance something which does not exist. It is sad that the House is not more crowded. If hon. Members had heard what has just gone on, many would have felt grave disquiet at the situation in which we find ourselves and would in due course have been prepared to support the amendment. I certainly hope that they will, assuming of course that the Government do not feel it right—I think they should — to accept the amendment that I have proposed.

If one studies the Order Paper, a slightly strange situation emerges because the amendment in the name of the Opposition is for a reduction of £10,000 whereas mine is for a reduction of £667 million—a slight disparity. None-the-less, I hope that that in no way—not least for the reasons which have just been adduced—deters the Opposition from supporting my amendment in the Lobby this evening. I am heartened by the fact that my amendment has received support from those with views as normally disparate as my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) and the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo). It commands wide support, and that should encourage hon. Members to vote in its favour this evening.

Before I deal with the substance of the amendment I wish to comment on the procedure under which we are having the debate. The substitution of Opposition days and Estimates days for the old Supply days is, on the whole, working satisfactorily. I am glad the Government have seen fit, on various occasions, to divide those days in half so that we may debate a variety of subjects. I also welcome the fact that the Government have put a motion on the Order Paper that we should have a vote at 7 o'clock. A situation wherein we had a debate ending at 7 o'clock and the vote at 10 o'clock would be reminiscent of the system introduced by the late Richard Crossman wherein we had debates in the morning and the vote at 10 o'clock. I think his memoirs have been of more lasting interest than his procedural reform. The motion that the Government have put down is a convenient one.

I think it is important that members of Select Committees which have an Estimates day should be given more notice than they are at present. Today, it is a wide-ranging debate in which many hon. Members are interested but, generally speaking, Estimates days are on a subject in which the specific Select Committee has the greatest interest and it may be very difficult for Members to attend at short notice. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will make a note of that point.

Having said that, let me spell out the purpose of the amendment. I do so from the position of one who believes that we are right to be members of the EEC, but, nonetheless, who on this occasion, particularly in the light of the earlier points of order, feels grave disquiet at the way in which it is going, particularly in its financial affairs.

The purpose of the amendment is not to prevent—unless we find that there is not a budget at any stage—the eventual payment of the sums involved. The House will have noticed that my amendment does not cover the full amount of the estimate. The reason for that is that the difference between the two sums has already been paid to the EC regardless of the fact that it does not have a budget.

My amendment seeks to stop the procedure, which would not be repeated, whereby the House is asked to pay to the Community amounts which would normally be paid under the own resources procedure in advance of the due date, but paid not only in advance of the due date, but in advance of the due date without payment of interest, even though, if the situation were reversed and money was owed in the other direction, we would have to pay interest, at a penal rate. So the purpose of the amendment is simply to prevent the payment being made in advance—not the eventual payment of the sum involved. That is something that the House should support.

The main reason, apart from those that I have already mentioned, why the House should support the amendment is that the whole basis on which we have been increasing resources to the Community has been that there will be effective budgetary discipline. But, as the report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee on budgetary discipline in the EC makes clear, the reality is that that has not been effective. If it were effective it would not be necessary to pay the sums in advance. Therefore, the amendment seeks to bring out the fact that the discipline is not working effectively and that we should not make such payments which, as I understand it, we have no legal obligation to make.

We were told last year when the own resources—the VAT payments—were increased from 1 to 1·4 per cent. that there would be no need for such temporary expedients. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who was at that time in the position of my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary this afternoon replying to the debate, made it clear that once we had increased the own resources there would be no need to have the rather sordid transactions of this kind; that the temporary expedients would no longer be necessary.

The report to which I have just referred makes it clear that budgetary discipline has not been enforced. The Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee has always expressed doubts about that and there is a long history of the matter. Our earlier report on budgetary discipline and the Fontainebleau agreement points to the argument put forward by the Prime Minister that more EC members are becoming net contributors and that that is the best discipline that we could possibly have.

The reality is that that has proved completely untrue. Indeed, the way in which, for example, the German Government have been operating makes it clear that the fact that people are net contributors has not imposed the kind of discipline that should be imposed. I regret to say that it has not been reflected in the attitude of Her Majesty's Government towards budgetary discipline, even though we have certainly been better than some others, not least in the matter of the illegal budget, and so on, with which I shall deal in a moment.

None the less, I hope that in the light of the earlier points of order the Government will come to the House at the earliest moment when any hard information is available to tell us what is happening in Europe with our taxpayers' money. I hope that if that information is available by 7 o'clock the Government will come to the House—they have an obligation to do so—and tell us the up-to-date position. Be that as it may, it is still right to vote for the amendment. However, at the moment we are relying on press reports on what is happening there. If one then tries to ascertain the position from the Treasury, we are told that no information is available. We do not know where the press reports are coming from, but there are strong signs that we are now very close to the 1·4 per cent. ceiling which was agreed only a short time ago.

That being so, we should raise the question of the communiqué of the then presidency of the European Council following the Fontainebleau agreement. That said:

"One year before the new ceiling is reached, the Commission will present a report setting out the state of play on:

—the result of the budgetary discipline

—the Community's financial needs

—the breakdown of the budgetary costs among Member States".

If indeed we are approaching that 1·4 per cent. figure, we should ask whether the Commission is proposing to make such a statement. I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will be able to tell us about that.

But the fact is that the Estimate we have before us this afternoon is much larger than any of the previous such Estimates. It goes on for a much longer period and is based on various criteria of acceptability which the Government have in no way stated, and that is clearly unsatisfactory.

In particular, the report on budgetary discipline to which I referred points out that that discipline is simply not working. I refer in particular to paragraphs 6 and 7 of our report. That brings out clearly the way in which the Council of Ministers has not been prepared to stick to the guidelines to which it agreed. Indeed, paragraphs 6, 7 and 8 of the report spell out in detail the way in which it has constantly increased the resources against the view that budgetary discipline should be imposed. On top of that we have had the clear conflict between the Council of Ministers on the one hand and the Parliament or the European Assembly on the other.

We had the case of the budget being taken to the European Court which, as the House will know, has now held that it is illegal. Therefore, at this moment, we have no legal budget for the Community. There are many worrying aspects of that. To start with, the court's judgment effectively said that nothing could be done about the money that had already been paid out. It is not the least bit clear why there cannot be a corresponding reduction in the future. However, as far as I know, no such recommendation is being put forward by the Government, still less by other members of the Community. The court effectively says that payments that have already been made under the illegal budget none the less remain valid.

Let me ask my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary a specific question. Does that mean that the funds that have been affected by the interim result which we got in the court will now go back to the EEC? If so, it would be the height of absurdity. The whole area is deeply and profoundly disturbing. The tendency on these occasions is almost to laugh because otherwise one would virtually burst into tears about the affair. It is getting more and more worrying. I am bound to say that it is unfortunate that the Government, and in particular the Prime Minister, who takes such a clear and forthright attitude on other issues, which I shall not enumerate, are failing to do so with regard to control of public expenditure in relation to the EEC. There is effective control in many other areas, not least health and social services, and so on, but not so with regard to Europe.

Mr. Gow: There may be some slight misunderstanding in my right hon. Friend's mind. It is not that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary when he had responsibility for these matters, or my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Treasury, or my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, let alone my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, have been anything other than resolute at every meeting of the European Council, of ECOFIN and of Ministers. The problem is that Her Majesty's Government are always in an actual minority.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: What about Monday?

Mr. Gow: However resolute my right hon. Friends are—and they have been totally resolute in championing our interests—they cannot bring about that discipline that my right hon. Friend and I want to see.

Mr. Higgins: I note what my hon. Friend says. I want to make two points about that. I hope that the Economic Secretary will tell us how close we are to the 1·4 per cent. limit. We were told previously in the communiqué following Fontainebleau that the maximum take may be increased to 1·6 per cent. on 1 January 1988 by unanimous decision of the Council and after agreement with national procedures and so on.

The clear import is that we have a right of veto. I hope that my hon. Friend will confirm what is implicit in the reply that the Treasury and Civil Service Committee has already had from the Government, that we shall use our veto to prevent any increase above the 1·4 per cent. limit.

The Treasury and Civil Service Committee, an all-party committee, has clearly said:

"We therefore recommend that the government should make clear its intention of using its veto against any proposal to raise the VAT ceiling, and of declining to support any further substitutes in the form of Inter Governmental Agreements."

I very much hope that the Government will give a clear undertaking on that because I think that it would meet the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne made in his intervention.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with my recollection that the veto has never yet been used in the Council of Finance Ministers and that, if we did use it, we would set a new precedent? Does he not further agree that, if that is the approach to majority decision making with which we start off, there is little hope of the internal market being achieved?

Mr. Higgins: Majority decision making is a matter that no doubt the House may well have occasion to debate later, as it has on occasions recently.

In all events, with regard to financial matters and increasing the 1·4 per cent., it seems clear to me that we should have the right of veto, otherwise the power of taxation is taken from the House, and I do not think that that is something to which hon. Members ought to agree.

None the less — and I stress the point — there is a fundamental problem in regard to the treaty on expenditure, on revenue and on borrowing. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is fond of saying—I might almost say ad nauseam — that revenue must determine expenditure, not the other way about. The problem that arises in the EEC at present is that the spending goes on and on because the budgetary discipline is not effective and one comes up against restraint on revenue only when one hits the VAT ceiling. There is clearly a conflict there, not least because, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has pointed out from time to time, it is contrary to the treaty for there to be borrowing by the Community to cover the difference between revenue and expenditure. We know that devices have been used to get round that —something that I believe is deplorable.

There is a fundamental problem here, and we have to get the matter under control. I believe that that control ought to be exercised on the expenditure side, but particularly in regard to giving cash to the Community. We must consider whether some amendment of the treaty is needed to bring that about. Failing that, whenever we hit the VAT ceiling, I believe that we are in a position to exercise authority, and that is very important. If it runs the Community into a problem, no doubt we will have an opportunity to reappraise the situation. The situation tonight is one in which, because the budget has been declared illegal, we ought to have a real opportunity to get a grip on the matter. There will be bitter disappointment and resentment if the Government miss that opportunity when they come to the House to give a statement on what has been going on in Europe this week and in the course of the conclusions of the budget.

Mr. Spearing: Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm the position as I understand it? He said that, if and when it is desired to raise the VAT ceiling, the House and the Government have to agree because it requires a unanimous decision of the EEC. Am I not right in thinking that if expenditure within or up to that limit is to be raised —and we understand informally that this has been done — it requires not unanimity but a majority, maybe against United Kingdom Ministers, in the Council of Ministers and in the Assembly, and it need not even be debated in this House or intimated to this House? If that is so, has not this House therefore already lost control of taxation up to those limits?

Mr. Higgins: No doubt my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will clarify the point that the hon. Gentleman has raised, which I believe is right, but of course we run into the situation in which, when we hit the limit, we can effectively exercise a veto. We were told anyway that there was no question of this until 1988, yet here we are in the middle of 1986 where, in respect of budgetary discipline and the recent increase to 1·4 per cent., the ink is scarcely dry on the agreement — that is, if it was indeed signed, and it is difficult with some of these documents to know whether that is so.

This is a profoundly important amendment. Given the uncertainties about the budget, I think that the case for supporting the amendment is even greater. As I have said, it is unfortunate that the House is not more crowded so that other hon. Members might appreciate the grave situation that is developing. Given the uncertainties of the situation, I hope that the Economic Secretary either will not wish to proceed with the motion or will accept the amendment. We must consider this against the background of public expenditure priorities generally. At a time when many of our constituents are being asked to suffer severely as a result of restraint on public expenditure, of which I approve, it is proposed that money should go off in this way and the Government make an interest-free loan of £667 million, but I can think of a great many other people who might better benefit and who better deserve an interest-free loan of £667 million than those to whom the money will go if the motion is approved.

4.57 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): We have had an incredible start to the debate. The Minister may have thought that it would be an uncontroversial, technical debate on what are fairly fundamental recommendations by the Select Committee, but it has turned out to be something very different. These incredible exchanges reflect the fact that, by coincidence, there is today the meeting of the European Parliament that will endorse or otherwise the decisions of Finance Ministers. As hon. Members on both sides of the House have said, the Government have an obligation to inform the House, and they should be doing so now, not waiting until later to tell us precisely what is going on in Europe.

The reply by the Government to the Select Committee report makes it clear that the court action that has just been concluded in the matter of the European Parliament was designed precisely to make sure that the European Council of Ministers was the arena in which decisions about the budget were to be made. The Treasury memorandum in reply to the observations of the Select Committee makes it clear that the Government would certainly think it necessary for the Council to examine the relevant treaty articles with a view to reinstating an acceptable balance of budgetary powers between the Council and the Parliament.

The European Parliament will today be in possession of the information about the new 1986 budget, and will have all the details about the excesses over and above the budget discipline levels. It will make a decision before the House of Commons knows what is the outline agreement decided upon by British Ministers and other Ministers. That is outrageous and unacceptable to the House.

The Economic Secretary no doubt hoped that he was well away from these debates. European budget debates must be one of those things that one hopes one is promoted out of, can resign out of or, if necessary and one can get away with it, can be sacked out of it. Unfortunately, the Economic Secretary is here having to defend a deplorable state of affairs.

This Estimate is nothing new. We have been here before. One has almost a sense of deja vu and loses track of which debate we are in because they are all so similar. We have the same speeches made by the same hon. Members on the same subjects, but nothing is done. We are told that things will improve and will be fundamentally changed. The Economic Secretary wrote an article last December for The Times, which appeared on the leader page, and for which no doubt he got a fee. In it, he said that everything would change permanently and things would never be the same again. We have budget discipline, and the Fontainebleau agreement will last until the end of time. That was it. Everything had been done and it was all due to the Prime Minister and the Economic Secretary. They took the credit for it. However, the debates continue, the same issues come up and the same sad commentary is made.

Supplementary budgets, intergovernmental agreements, non-reimbursable payments, reimbursable payments, reimbursable payments that are never repaid — they all happen, but this debate takes place in the context of an even more spectacular shot in the foot. Not only are we being asked to vote vast sums of money to the EEC in advance of the time of the due payment, but we are being asked to do so in the wake of the incredible judgment by the European Court of Justice.

The other part of the Treasury double act came to the House of Commons recently to tell us that we had to make extra supplementary payments to the European Community because of an illegal budget declared by the European Parliament. Although it was illegal and the Government would take the European Parliament to court, we were asked, and the huge 140 majority of the Government got it through, to authorise supplementary payments in lieu of the illegal amounts of money that the Government said that they would bring back to the country.

The final judgment was delivered a week ago, and the Government had won their case, but the result has been not to bring more money back but to pay more to the European Community, because that is what the Financial Secretary is busily engaged on today. He is not saving money for the country or getting a better deal for the taxpayer, or telling the European Parliament that it must hand all that money back so that the British taxpayer will be better off. Instead, he will tell the Parliament that he agrees with the illegal budget, but that he thinks that it is too modest. What was wrong with the illegal budget was that it did not ask for enough. We shall now give more for the 1986 budget, and goodness knows what we shall give for the 1987 budget.

In our last debate on this subject, we were told of the illegality of the European Parliament's action. We were told that it was iniquitous and impertinent of it to overrule the Council of Ministers and that it had no right to levy this outrageous amount on the British taxpayer. Like Liverpool and Lambeth councillors, European Members of Parliament would be pursued until they coughed up all the cash of which they were robbing us.

We were told that an illegal bill of 160 million ecu was being foisted on the British taxpayer. The lawyer for the British Government in the European Court of Justice said that that was the equivalent to the cost of four large hospitals and 150 new primary schools. That is not Opposition qualification, but a Government description of the amount of money of which the country had been robbed by the illegal, outrageous action of the European Parliament.

The hapless Minister was torn apart after he had told us that, but now we know that it was all sanctimonious humbug. The Government have won the court action that we are told is a great triumph. Some triumph. First, the judgment did not devastate the European Parliament. The Financial Times said:

"The judgment amounted to an implicit reprimand for both institutions."

The Advocate-General of the European Court of Justice, Mr. Frederico Mancini, said that the budget Ministers of the member states were also guilty of "unlawful conduct" when they failed to provide enough money in the budget for all the commitments.

Now, we have a lasting triumph before us, or we would do if the Government had the decency to tell us what figure was agreed in Brussels yesterday and was being put forward in Strasbourg today. The House of Commons Library — I do not know whether its sources are any better than those for the information given to hon. Members — says that the total size of the new budget is about 2 billion ecu more than the Council's second reading, with agriculture accounting for 1,100 million ecu and the increased structural funds for 750 million ecu. We are told that, because of technical reasons, the structural increase will be more than that.

This is the great triumph of the British Government over the impertinent European parliamentarians who dared to declare an illegal budget. More money will be paid than was challenged in the court action. The new budget is bigger than the first European budget, against which the British Government voted. The difference will be a donation from the Government and the House of Commons in place of four new hospitals and 150 primary schools. Not only is the new budget figure larger, rounder and more open-ended than the one that so outraged the Minister on the last occasion, but it blows a giant hole through the much-vaunted budget discipline which supposedly was the great achievement of the Fontainebleau summit.

The report of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service mentioned in the speech of the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) amply illustrates the way in which the budget discipline about which we heard so much is virtually worthless. In the first year of its operation, the budget is well over the top, and the first draft supplementary figures suggest that the budget discipline minutes will be exceeded by at least 740 million ecu. Once we hear the details of the deal done yesterday in Brussels, that will pale into insignificance.

Although the Treasury apparently does not have any details to give the House of Commons, on the 8 o'clock BBC radio news this morning, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury described the new budget as a "victory of common sense". It will be well worth putting those resounding words to the House to see whether Members of Parliament agree with that verdict.

The budget will provide yet more funds, but even they might not be sufficient for the social and regional funds that the European Parliament so outrageously added, which the court overruled, and which the Government tried to veto when the first budget was decided.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am surprised that, in referring to the increase in agricultural spending, the hon.

[Sir Russell Johnston]

Gentleman has made no reference — nor did the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) — to the change in the relationship between the dollar and the ecu, which it has been calculated has added 1·2 million ecu to the size of the budget. That is one of the central reasons why budget discipline has to be breached.

Mr. Robertson: Of course it is. That was always the way in which it was going to be breached and that was always the way in which we said that it would be breached. The trend that has broken budgetary discipline in the way described by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) is precisely this gigantic bill for agriculture, which will increase yet further as inflation continues to go down in the European Community and as the dollar continues to weaken against the ecu. The bill will inexorably be increased. It will squeeze the very funds which I am sure the hon. Gentleman regards as being infinitely more valuable in the context of the European Community than the piling up of yet more and more food mountains in EEC countries.

Mr. Budgen: The hon. Gentleman will recognise that the Liberal party adopts a very progressive attitude towards this question. It says that the take from VAT ought to be increased to 2 per cent. as quickly as possible. I should have thought that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber would be delighted at the prospect of our climbing quickly towards 2 per cent. by these various methods of agricultural support, which he thinks is such a good way of spending money. But what does the Social Democratic party say?

Mr. Robertson: I am sure that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) will be taking back all these commitments to those vast numbers of his colleagues who never attend these debates and who leave him here as their sole spokesman. No Social Democratic party Member has so far attended this debate. We shall look with eager interest to see whether any of them turn up for the vote at the end of it, or for the guillotined debate that is to take place after it. The Social Democratic party professes undying support for the European Community and a commitment to its objectives, but that does not run to turning up at debates when a matter of crucial importance — the future of the Community and the way in which it is organised — is being debated.

The new budget would be even worse were it not for the fact that we know, because we have already seen the preliminary draft budgets, that it involves an element of creative accounting, which will postpone spending from this year; it will be counted instead in next year's budget. As the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber told us, there will be much more bad news. As inflation goes down in the European Community, as the VAT take therefore decreases and as the dollar continues to weaken, the cost of the ruinous farm policy will explode upwards and upwards.

In the context of European budgets, I was intrigued to read recently what was said by the president of the European Court of Auditors, Mr. Marcel Mart, when he appeared before the Council of Finance Ministers. The court audits the accounts at least two years after these outrages. Of the 1984 EEC accounts he said that, were these the accounts of a private company, he would be unable to approve them. Even within the context of this great business-managing Government, the accounts do not square up.

We can see precisely in front of us today what the Court of Auditors really meant. We know now what the court action in Luxembourg meant. It was a time-wasting, hypocritical smokescreen that postponed and disguised the incompetence and even the deceit of the Finance Ministers, who deliberately left out of the 1986 budget items which they knew were necessary and which had been committed in advance. It is small wonder that the Advocate-General accused the Council of Ministers of a "violation of the rules" in placing the European Parliament in that position.

I underlined in our last debate—when the Economic Secretary's colleague came here with his begging bowl and bullet-proof string vest — that he was engaged in a confidence trick. He knew that the Ministers, not the European Parliament, had created the crisis. He knew that they had clipped the budget too tight for the accession of Spain and Portugal, for the burden of the past and for the inevitable, inexorable, inexcusable and insatiable demands of the common agricultural policy. He simply deflected the malicious incompetence of the Ministers on to the heads of the European parliamentarians. However, he is exposed now in the light of the judgment of the European Court, not just by the Advocate-General but also by this truly remarkable and bizarrely inflated budget, which was agreed last night by the Finance Ministers.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: No. I am already exceeding my time limit. It is a very brief debate and it would be unfair to other hon. Members if I gave way, however appreciative I might be of the point that the hon. Gentleman would make.

It was almost three years ago, in December 1984, that this House endorsed the Fontainebleau agreement. It did so because it was told by the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), who is now a member of the Cabinet, and by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who thought that he had escaped from all this, that we had a guarantee of budget discipline, especially on farm spending. We remember how the Economic Secretary argued so valiantly with his right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) about the vagueness of the assurances that had been given. He pointed out how sensible and straightforward they all were and said that there was no escape from them. We were told that the increase to a 1·4 per cent. VAT limit and that the 40 per cent. increase in European Community spending would be more than sufficient for at least two years, until 1988. And of course we were told by the Economic Secretary as well as by the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) that we need not expect any other supplementary budgets. However, each of these undertakings has been broken. Even the luckless, hapless Financial Secretary, who was not even around when these fine promises were made and who has had to carry the can for the Prime Minister, knows that each of these promises has been punctured.

Budget discipline is worthless. Six months into the first year of its operation it is at least 740 million ecu over the top; and it is only that because the figures have been fiddled and because the damage has merely been postponed. Effectively we are within a whisker of, and probably in real terms we are over, the 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling. The President of the Commission, Jacques Delors, said in February of this year:

"I would be failing in my duty if I did not point out to Parliament"— that is, the European Parliament—

"and our 12 governments that VAT own resources must break through the 1·4 per cent. barrier if the Community is to achieve the objectives solemnly adopted in Luxembourg last December."

That is what will face us in the future.

The assurances on the intergovernmental agreements and supplementary budgets were no more than, to quote the Paymaster-General, "piffle." The assurances that the hon. Member for Eastbourne gave us in the debate last October have been adequately dealt with by him. No doubt, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, there will be even more disclosures.

This budget, if we are allowed to know about it, will be like so many of the old ones. There will be more spending on agriculture. It will automatically eat up more and more money in order to produce less and less food for eating and more and more food for storing and destroying. The Foreign Secretary had the cheek to go to the European Parliament this week and tell it:

"We cannot expect our citizens to see the Community as a force for good in their own lives when they see and hear regular reports of thousands of tonnes of butter ageing in the stores or being disposed of at a fraction of its earlier value."

Sanctimonious criticism is there by the bucketful, but action is pitifully absent.

Whenever it may be that we find out about it, the budget will show yet again that even more is to be spent on agriculture and that the cash mountain is to become even larger. The amounts that will be spent by this job-starved European Community on the social fund and the regional fund will go up by tiny amounts, but by less than the rate of inflation, and down will go spending on research and on energy, and down also will go the trivial amounts that we spend on overseas aid — presumably only on the principle that we should leave all that to Bob Geldof.

Tonight — and it is only one of far too many occasions—is a humiliation for this Government and a punishment for this country. The Government see that their priorities have been devastated. They see their court action exposed as a charade and as a contrived pantomime for which the taxpayer has to pick up a substantial tab. Instead of the four new hospitals and 150 new primary schools which were tantalisingly offered to us as the price of this great legal victory, there are bigger butter mountains and more grain stores. The debates are becoming simply an exercise in futility, with Ministers of the Crown queuing up to unload their prepared scripts of excuses and then relying on a 140-strong majority to get the supplementary budgets through.

This debate is a vivid proof of those words. Fontainebleau, budget discipline, controlled agricultural budgets, sensible spending plans, a long-term financial future for the Community are all dead—as dead as the Minister's explanations and as dead as the Government's reputation. I hope that the entire House will vote for the amendment.

5.20 pm

Sir Edward du Cann (Taunton): As the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said, there were some remarkable exchanges at the outset of the debate. That puts the point most mildly. To anyone who loves our Parliament, and believes that a proper surveillance of the expenditure of taxpayers' funds is a primary duty of hon. Members, the people's representatives — to whom else can the people look? — to those of us who regard ourselves as trustees for the public good, and believe that we abdicate responsibility if we are careless in those respects, the arrangement of the debate, whereby we are invited to vote on expenditure before we know the shape and total of the budget of which it will be part, is not merely profoundly disturbing; it is a scandal. I want none of it. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) was entirely right to say how robust our Ministers are when their duties take them to Brussels and to the European Community. But it is high time for them to say to their colleagues there that we can no longer proceed in this careless way. It is time for us to back them and to refuse to put up with the procedures any longer.

I endorse most warmly the views of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee which were expressed so well by its Chairman, my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins). In a wholly admirable speech, he quoted a little from the Committee's fifth report. It should be compulsory reading in the House, if not outside it. I wish to underline some of the report's statements. The first paragraph makes it clear that the report is the third of its kind that the Committee has recently made available to the House. Paragraph 1 states:

"One underlying theme connects all these exchanges: the need for effective Budgetary Discipline in the EC."

Paragraph 2 mentions

"the seriousness of the threats under which Budgetary Discipline now lies."

Paragraph 5 mentions

"the lack of authority behind the Budgetary Discipline Agreement."

Paragraph 8 states:

"The Budgetary Discipline Agreement has not worked as intended."

The report makes the further suggestion that

"it will be for the UK as president in office of the Council to put together a viable political initiative to see that matters improve and do not deteriorate further."

Paragraph 10 implies that budget discipline is very much at risk.

Paragraph 14 states:

"We cannot avoid the conclusion that the Community will be fortunate to avoid a very serious crisis."

In paragraph 18, the report mentions the "upward drift in expenditure".

Paragraph 20 mentions,

"'a well-known fact' that certain states are in favour of larger budgets."

Paragraph 19 states:

"It is only prudent to recall how strongly the tide of events has begun to run in the direction of a 1·6 per cent. ceiling."

Paragraph 21 mentions

"pressure of expenditure. . . and the expansionist view of a significant portion of the Council."

The report then mentions the need to exercise the veto.

I endorse all those conclusions. The report is a most serious and important document. I repeat that it is not the first time that my right hon. Friend the Member for

[Sir Edward du Cann]

Worthing and his colleagues, on behalf of the House, have told us and told the Government plainly what the position is.

It is a devastating report. What sort of response did it elicit from the Government? I have the Government's response in my hand. It is a mere couple of pages of cyclostyled material. I regard the Government's response to that significant report as profoundly disappointing for two main reasons. With the exception of the use of the phrase "budgetary discipline" in its headline, it is silent about the matter. Right hon. and hon. Members may think it incomprehensible that a senior Select Committee of the House makes important observations and recommendations about budgetary discipline and that the considered response of the Government does not contain a word about budgetary discipline.

Mr. Spearing: I hesitate to make the position worse, but does the right hon. Gentleman recall that the Select Committee on European Legislation, which considered the proposals made after Stuttgart for alleged budgetary discipline, made it amply clear in its reports to the House that the budgetary discipline procedure had no treaty force whatsoever? Nevertheless, the House accepted the upward breaking of the 1 per cent. limit despite the fact that that Committee made it amply clear that budgetary discipline was not enforceable by treaty commitment.

Sir Edward du Cann: The hon. Gentleman does the House a service in reminding it of that point. His intention was, no doubt, to emphasise my point that it is astounding that the Government are silent on the subject.

The other reason why I believe the Government's response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing and his colleagues to be so disappointing can best be put by quoting from the third paragraph of the three Government observations. It states:

"The Government has stated that it sees no case for increasing the resources available to the Community."

That is what is said, but that is precisely what the House is now invited to do through the mechanism of payment in advance. I do not understand how on earth that squares with those observations. If the payment were conditional on better discipline, effective supervision and a tighter control of Community expenditure, one might acquiesce. As it is not, it is impossible to do so. Frankly, it is an insult to the House to be invited to do so.

I go further by saying that the entire matter is, in effect, an insult to every hon. Member who has tried to play a part in bringing about a better and more effective supervision of domestic expenditure by the Government, whether we speak of the work done by the Public Accounts Committee, the departmental Select Committees or other hon. Members who attend to these matters in what they believe to be the proper public interest.

As the hon. Member for Hamilton and my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing said, when the increase in own resources was agreed it was done on specific and clear conditions. The first was that there would be strict budgetary controls. The second was that the rate of increase in farm spending would be curbed. I would have thought that a reasonable proposition. The third was that the additional cash from increasing the VAT provision from the lower level to 1·4 per cent. would last for several years.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) so modestly reminded us, at the time Ministers were entirely clear on that point. It was honourable of him to make those points. He quoted the Minister who said that it was unthinkable that the Government would come back to the House for more cash. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing said, the unthinkable has become fact in less than a year. We are only six months into the first year of the strict budgetary control regime that we were promised. It is almost unbelievable that we have received no account whatsoever from the Government as to the reasons for the extra expenditure. Funds are already exhausted and various countries and, as we have noticed, the European Assembly clamour for further expenditure.

There is little effective scrutiny over expenditure. As the hon. Member for Hamilton said, agriculture is the most obvious example of that. Despite the public interest aroused in the matter, there is even a proposal to cut overseas aid to give the farmers on the continent more money. That is an incomprehensible proposal. The European Community is, in effect, in a crisis which is the equivalent in private industry of continuing to trade while insolvent.

Many hon. Members like myself were sceptical of the wisdom of Britain signing the treaty of Rome, but we have nevertheless worked and argued since then in an attempt to turn the European Community into a practical reality of the dreams of its founders. However, it is now time to voice a solemn warning. Those who connive at the present state of affairs risk massive public disenchantment with Britain's membership of the European Community. Our people will not tolerate higher taxes or, for example, the imposition of VAT on food, books and newsprint, as would come about with the ending of the zero rate, which is being challenged in the courts, to finance wasteful policies. Parliament should not tolerate such a state of affairs and the Government should not invite it to do so.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing said, it is essential that we retain the power of veto over taxation. I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, in whom many of us have great faith and whom we admire, can give the House a clear assurance on that issue this evening.

To be perfectly plain, there is a major risk that the European Community will not survive a worsening or even the continuance of the present careless financial situation. The most constructive action that the United Kingdom could take to support the European Community would be to demonstrate that we will no longer tolerate mismanagement on this grand scale. Sometimes one must be a little cruel in the short term to be kind in the long run. Sometimes it is right to protest. Action now could possibly prevent disaster later. The House should make no mistake about it. Disaster is inevitable if things continue as they are. It is for that reason that I shall vote for the amendments, and in particular that standing in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing and other members of the Treasury Select Committee. I hope that a majority of hon. Members on both sides of the House will do the same.

5.34 pm

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Before I comment on the amendment tabled by the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and before I consider the report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, which he chairs, I should like to make three preliminary points.

First, the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) was correct to say that alliance Members have long argued in favour of a larger budget for the European Community. In 1978, the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), then President of the European Commission, argued for a 2·5 per cent. ceiling on VAT. I remind the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), who has temporarily left the Chamber, that when his political colleague, Mr. Tugendhat, succeeded to the Commission early in this decade, he argued for a 2 per cent. ceiling.

The ceiling is now 1·4 per cent., although until now no country has paid more than 1·25 per cent. The United Kingdom pays 0·72 per cent. because of the budgetary agreement achieved by the Government. Although it is true that the budget will reach the 1·4 per cent. ceiling, the United Kingdom will not pay that. Even if the ceiling rises to 1·6 per cent., as forecast by the right hon. Member for Worthing, it is doubtful whether the United Kingdom will pay more than 0·82 per cent.

The hon. Member for Hamilton was correct to say that we have argued in this way as we wish to see an expansion in the structural funds—for example, the regional fund and the social fund. Without effective contributions to the regional fund, I do not see how economic development can be achieved in the poorer parts of the Community. I refer especially to Portugal. Hon. Members applauded loudly when the dictatorships of Salazar and Caetano ended, and Portugal joined the European Community. It is all very well to give political applause, but if economic encouragement cannot also be offered to them as a consequence of their joining the Community, similar political dangers might recur.

There is no doubt that the capacity of the social fund to assist the older industries in the north is important, as is research and development. Hon. Members have often commented that the European Community can, but does not, compete effectively with the United States and Japan. We shall be unable to do so unless we get our act together, and we cannot do that on the projected expenditure on research and development within the Community which I have seen, as I am sure has the Minister, in the forward projection of the budget to 1990.

Secondly, alliance Members have pressed strongly for the containment of the common agricultural policy. The failure to achieve this is as much due to our Government, although they have recently improved in this respect, as to the Governments of other member states.

My hon. Friend the Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) never tires of reminding the House that when the Secretary of State for Energy was Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, he told dairy farmers that they could improve their income by expanding. That was just three months before the introduction of milk quotas. Responsibility can always be shared, but we now have the introduction of milk quotas, and of the co-responsibility levy for wheat, although admittedly at a low level. A clear, if slow, beginning has been made, but anyone who thinks it is possible to change the CAP overnight is a fool, because it cannot be done.

Incidentally, I understand that the Commission is coming to the United Kingdom en bloc next week, mainly to attend one of Her Majesty's garden parties. However, I understand that the Commission's President, Jacques Delors, who is a workaholic, has decreed that the Commission will spend a whole day at Lancaster house contemplating the CAP. I hope that that will produce some action, because there is no doubt about the urgency of the problem. However, at the end of the day the decision will rest with the Council of Ministers. The Council of Agriculture Ministers is in many respects more important than that of the Finance Ministers.

Thirdly, the right hon. Member for Worthing defined what has happened or what is in the process of happening to the budgetary discipline agreement of Fontainebleau. He said this was not worth the paper that it was written on and his report also says that. He might also argue, and I would not be prepared to disagree with him, that the Fontainebleau agreement on budgetary discipline was very moderate. It was not what one might call draconian, but simply said that farm spending increases should not exceed growth in new resources.

I still hold to what I said when I intervened during the speech by the hon. Member for Hamilton, that it would have been proper for the right hon. Member for Worthing to speak about the change in the rate between the ecu and the dollar. When one considers that that change has cost 1·2 million ecus, which is equivalent to 3 per cent. of the total Community budget, one can see that it certainly falls under the definition of aberrant circumstances, to use the clumsy phrase that has been criticised before, and justifies some special action.

I shall now turn to the amendment and the report. Towards the end of his speech the right hon. Member for Worthing spoke about "reality," and about "getting a grip on the whole matter."

Reality necessitates embarking on a settled programme of adjustment of the CAP to reduce surpluses and cut expenditure. That is the reality. One of the things that I find unacceptable in the report is contained in paragraph 11. It is printed in black type in case we might skim over it, because sometimes hon. Members skim over reports. The paragraph says that the Government should come to "the House at the earliest possible opportunity for support in a proposal to amend the Treaty or take any other necessary steps to vest budgetary control securely and finally"—

I should like to repeat that—

"and finally in the Council."

That is an unreality because when the treaty of Rome was established in 1957 it gave the European Parliament a built-in part of the budgetary decision. It is not a very large part because it is equivalent to only about 12 per cent. of the budget and the budget itself—let us get this in proportion—is only 1 per cent. of the European Community's gross national product, or approximately 2 per cent. of the total public expenditure that goes on in the European Community. That is the budget that we are talking about in such apocalyptic terms. It is not possible to contemplate doing what paragraph 11 suggests.

If the right hon. Member for Worthing is interested in reality and in achieving a constructive approach to a difficult and serious problem—and I think the Minister would agree—he should not be involved in making the sort of statements that are contained in paragraph 15 of the report which says:

"These escape clauses," —presumably those are the aberrant circumstances that I mentioned earlier:

[Sir Russell Johnston]

"together with the fact that Budgetary Discipline is subject to political and not judical interpretation, render the Agreement vulnerable to the vagaries of the qualified-majority procedure."

After 7 o'clock we will debate the Single European Act, which is about improving and extending the qualified majority procedure. If we want out of the European Community, we must cut out the whole thing, but if we wish to continue as members of the EEC we must face the reality, which is that all the other members of the EEC are agreed that there should be a slow build-up of qualified majority voting in the Council of Ministers. Paragraph 18 says:

"Should an unacceptable proposal be made in the Council, one contrary vote would be enough to stop it in mid-career. A further weapon will be available to help defend the embattled veto."

If the business is to defend the embattled veto, and if that is the concept of the right hon. Member for Worthing of the way in which decision-making in the Community in future is to proceed, I have to say to him that it is not my concept.

Mr. Higgins: It would be helpful to the House and to people outside to be clear about the position of the Liberal party on majority voting on the provision of financial resources. Quite clearly, if we do not have a continuing right of veto in that area, then by a majority vote the other members of the Community could impose taxation on our constituents whether this Parliament wanted it or not. If that is the position of the Liberal party on financial issues, leaving on one side majority voting on other issues, the House and the electorate at the next general election will be interested to hear about it.

Sir Russell Johnston: With great respect, I say again to the right hon. Member for Worthing that he must distinguish between theory and reality. So far in the Council of Financial Ministers we have not seen the exercise of a veto. I think that is right and I said that in an intervention, but perhaps the Minister would confirm it. Throughout, decisions agreeable to everybody were reached through compromise. No veto has formally been cast. The right hon. Member for Worthing may say that there was a possibility that the veto could be cast, and that that was an influence on the subsequent debate or discussion. That may be so, but my next point is also a matter of reality. In the words of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), the former Prime Minister, or, as somebody said the other night, Old Bexley and Old Sidcup, if any member state of the European Community finds itself in an impossible situation, some solution will have to be found. That is reality, that is politics. The right hon. Gentleman seems to be asking me to make some sort of formalised statement, but things do not work that way. They work in a political fashion through negotiation, compromise, bargaining and by what unkind people would describe as haggling.

Mr. Higgins: I am interested in the hon. Member's response to my intervention. Does he think that the House should have a veto about the financial allocation of resources to the Community?

Sir Russell Johnston: The financial allocation of resources within the Community?

Mr. Higgins: To the Community.

Sir Russell Johnston: We do have that veto. We have already agreed to the 1·4 per cent. ceiling which cannot be increased unless the Government bring forward a request to the House and that request is passed. I accept that fact. We are the suppliers of the money, but that is not what we are talking about in this case.

I should like to say why I shall not recommend to my hon. Friends that we support the amendment. Instead, I shall recommend that we support the Government motion. In any event, there is an existing agreement under which it is possible for the Commission to ask for these payments a month in advance. I am subject to correction on that, but the right hon. Member for Worthing is in a corrective frame of mind and no doubt he will correct me if I am wrong. That existing agreement was part of the package settlement that included the British rebate. That is how I understand the position. As far as I know — and the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—we are already committed to doing it. The money is there already and it is not a matter of getting new money.

Mr. Budgen: 1·6 per cent.

Sir Russell Johnston: It has nothing to do with 1·6 per cent. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West is sitting like a pixie muttering 1·6 per cent. We are not discussing 1·6 per cent., nor are we discussing 1·4 per cent. We are discussing the fact that the Government have brought forward a request to fulfil an agreement they have already made with the European Community during the negotiations which produced the British rebate.

Secondly, the money is already available. We collect own resources — the agricultural levy and Customs duties—two months before we hand them over. It is a matter of handing over existing money that is lying in the vaults and not of finding new money.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that article 10(2) of the treaty of Rome is precise when it states that the Commission has the right to ask for additional payments in advance and that Governments can say no? Surely he will accept that that basic point is set out and cast clear in the treaty.

Sir Russell Johnston: Governments, like ladies, can always say no. I do not deny that. I am saying that this Government, and this lady, have already given a forward sign that they would say yes, and they cannot really change their minds in mid-course.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I intended to contain myself and to reply to all the issues raised at the end of the debate. As a factual dispute appears to be developing, perhaps I should explain that article 10(2), to which my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) has referred, is in the 1977 regulations. It empowers the Commission to invite member states to make contributions a few weeks earlier than they would otherwise do, but it does not oblige them to do so. Nothing in the Fontainebleau agreement referred to that power or changed it.

Sir Russell Johnston: I stand corrected. I apologise for not being entirely accurate. That, however, does not deflect me from my view of what we should do.

Those who have contributed to the debate — for example, the right hon. Members for Worthing and for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) and the hon. Member for Hamilton — have tended to use rather apocalyptic language. They have spoken of deep concern and have said that we are discussing a matter of profound importance. They have used words such as "astounding", "incredible", "unbelievable" and "insulting". One of the realities is that the green Benches in the Chamber are fairly empty. If the issue before us were really appalling, astounding and dreadful——

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): The hon. Gentleman should speak for himself. No SDP Members are present.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am not excluding SDP Members. It is evident that there are bare green Benches on both sides of the House. If the matter were of such apocalyptic importance as has been described, the House would be black with bustle.

5.53 pm

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I rise as a member of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service to support the amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins). He made an outstanding speech and his arguments were unanswerable.

I found the speech of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) most illuminating. Perhaps the absence of his colleagues is due to the fact that they do not agree with the views that he has advanced. The hon. Gentleman has criticised a number of paragraphs of the Select Committee's report, and the press and the public might be interested to know that it was a unanimous report which was supported by the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), who is a Liberal Member. What is even more interesting is that the hon. Member for Colne Valley has signed the amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing. It is clear that even on this rather technical issue there is disagreement not only between the Liberal party and the SDP but also between Liberal Members.

Despite the fact that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber was pressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, the hon. Gentleman implied that an alliance Government would not be prepared to use the veto to prevent an increase in VAT own resources. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman said that he supported increasing the own resources of the Community. The alliance should make it clear to the British people that it feels that the Community can spend their money rather better than the Government, which is controlled by the House. I find that unacceptable, and I am sure that the British people do. If we are to help the depressed areas, it is far better to do so under the control of the Government than by increasing finance to the EEC social fund.

To bring these proposals before the House must make this a sad day for the Government. The bringing forward of payments by one month does not seem a matter of great importance on the face of it, but I suggest that we are being presented with the tip of the iceberg. Indeed, the Supplementary Estimates warn that other requests for advance payments are expected to be made. This is not merely a cash flow problem; we are faced with a major financial problem. Despite repeated promises that there would be adequate budgetary discipline and control, the Community's finances are in a state of chaos and the Community faces a major financial crisis. The discipline agreement that was negotiated at Fontainebleau has turned out to be worthless. Many of us who voted against increasing own resources to 1·4 per cent. thought that this would be the result, and it gives me no pleasure to say that tonight.

The current financial crisis must be set against the background of an enormous increase in the resources of the Community, which was provided by a 40 per cent. increase in VAT contributions. My right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) has said that the agreement was reached subject to three assurances, which were that the cash would last for at least several years, that strict budgetary control would operate and that the rate of increase in farm spending would be curbed. We are only six months through the first year and we are running out of money already. Farm spending is clearly out of control and there has been no budgetary discipline. This must come as a great shock and disappointment to the Government.

It is clear from Hansard quotations made earlier in the debate that at the time when my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) was at the Treasury the Government expected that they would not have to return to the House in this way. Many of my right hon. and hon. Friends feel—I am sure that the Government do as well — that the EEC should follow a policy of resources determining expenditure rather than expenditure determining income. It must adopt that policy because there is a ceiling on VAT contributions. This has not happened despite all the negotiations and understanding on budgetary control which were explicit in the Fontainebleau agreement.

It is clear that time and time again the Community undertakes commitments for future years which it must appreciate it will not be able to meet because of lack of resources. It then resorts to financial manipulation, intergovernmental agreements and delays in payments, and now the bringing forward of contributions. If public companies ran their finances like the EEC has run its, they would be brought before the courts and the directors would end up in gaol. Even at this moment negotiations are taking place between the European Parliament, which wants to increase expenditure to the very limit of the 1·4 per cent. ceiling, and the Council of Ministers. I understand that the Council has already compromised and is suggesting that the budget could be increased. As spending on agriculture is open-ended, it is clear that the 1·4 per cent. threshold will be reached quickly.

There are good grounds for thinking that this is part of a sustained policy. It could be described as a plot by the bureaucrats and Euro-fanatics to put pressure on member Governments, especially the Government of the United Kingdom, to agree to a further increase in the VAT ceiling. That is unacceptable to many Conservative Members. We do not want to see European expenditure rising inexorably year after year when it is part of our policy to gain greater control of public spending, so that we can fulfil our commitment to reduce taxation, especially on the low paid.

The EEC now needs to cut its coat according to its cloth. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber talked about the change in the value of the dollar and the ecu, which is exactly the case where it should take effect. The United Kingdom has had to face an enormous fall in oil revenues, but, because of the ability and financial rectitude of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we have absorbed it. The

[Mr. John Townend]

EEC should have the same financial rectitude. I suggest that the Government accept the final paragraph of the Select Committee report, which states:

"We therefore recommend that the Government should make clear its intention of using its veto against any proposal to raise VAT ceiling, of declining to support any further substitutes in the form of Inter Governmental Agreements."

As a shot across the bows of the EEC, the Government should accept the amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing.

6.1 pm

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I apologise to the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and to my Front Bench for not having been present for the opening speeches. As I am an ardent advocate of certain views on the Common Market, the House will take it from me that I would have been present if it had been humanly possible. I shall be present for the rest of the evening and possibly until the small hours of the morning.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) that the Government's response to the Select Committee's report was unworthy of them. I echo the words of the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) that it is an insult to the House to give such a pathetic answer to a well worked out report on matters which affect the House and the country. It is not a party political matter and it would be wrong for us to treat it in that way. That is why I have found some of the comments in the debate a little disappointing.

We are the guardians of the public purse, regardless of what our views are about particular items of expenditure or about the policies behind that expenditure. When, some considerable time ago, we debated the agreement I thought that it was bad, although I did not say so in the House. I said, "Let us give events, member states and the Commission a chance to show those of us who are sceptical, if not cynical, about the procedure that we are wrong." My attitude could be summarised as, "Give them enough rope and they will hang themselves."

During the past year the EEC has had enough rope on the operation of the budgetary discipline procedure for all of us, other than the most dedicated, fanatical supporters of what the Common Market does, whether right or wrong —there are a few of them in the House—to realise that the budgetary discipline procedure has not worked and will not work. There is no conceivable way in which it could work. We made that point at the time of the budgetary discipline agreement.

It is not a legal agreement and, when challenged at the time, the Prime Minister said that she might well have liked to make it a legal agreement but that other member states did not want that. One can well understand that because member states were going through a charade to obtain, as part of a bargaining package, our agreement to the increase to the 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling, which the British Government would not have accepted had they not been able to assure the House that they had a workable agreement on budget discipline.

Sir Russell Johnston: The same theme is coming into the hon. Gentleman's speech as came into the speech of the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), which is that somehow only the British are capable of financial rectitude, and that the Germans and Dutch are wholly incapable of any such thing. That is nonsense.

Mr. Deakins: I am not denying that some other member states are capable of financial rectitude. My point is that the majority of member states, although capable of it, have no intention of achieving the degree of financial rectitude on which our history and Parliament have been based.

Mr. John Townend: Is it not the case that, although member states may have the ability or the desire for financial rectitude, in most cases financial rectitude is not in their interests because the major contributors are still the British and German Governments? Although the French Government are becoming a contributor, they are a relatively small one. The vast majority of member states have a vested interest in increasing the size of the budget because they will receive a larger amount.

Mr. Deakins: I am not sure that I would go along with all that the hon. Gentleman said, but I shall develop the point later.

One of the troubles with the guidelines on the budgetary discipline agreement is that they have set a rate of increase for agricultural expenditure. In a written answer the Economic Secretary said:

"The guideline for agricultural expenditure states that its rate of increase must be less than the rate of growth of the own resources base."—[Official Report, 20 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 327.]

That presupposes that there will always be an increase. Nothing was said about a decrease, and I invite the Minister to comment on that. Indeed, the whole trend in Community expenditure, especially on the common agricultural policy, has been upwards. We cannot rely on the guidelines, budgetary discipline and the financial reference framework to set an arrangement in which in any one year expenditure is reduced below the outturn or below that budgeted in the previous year. I challenge the Minister to tell me that I am wrong.

When I asked about the financial guidelines for agricultural expenditure and about how overspending in one year may somehow be got back the following year, the Minister said:

"Article 5 of the budgetary discipline agreement states that in clawing back additional agricultural expenditure the Council shall concentrate its activity primarily on the production sectors responsible for the failure to adhere to the guideline. Price reductions would be one means of securing the necessary savings."—[Official Report, 30 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 219.]

Is it conceivable that in any one year Agriculture and Finance Ministers, meeting either separately or, finally, jointly, would agree to reduce agriculture prices below what would otherwise have been agreed simply to cut the overspending in the previous year? One can conceive of that in our financial terms and we have done that in previous years, but one cannot conceive of it in European Community terms. Therefore, that answer does not provide a safeguard.

Hon. Members have pointed out that the VAT ceiling of 1·4 per cent. will be reached soon. That is because CAP costs are continuing to rise. Hon. Members on all sides of the House must accept—one day I hope to persuade my Front Bench of this—that no fundamental reform of the CAP is possible. There is no point in my right hon. and hon. Friends or right hon. and hon. Gentlemen either now or in future saying, "We shall reform radically the CAP to reduce the amount of expenditure." That has been tried by Governments of all parties in the past decade and without exception they have all signally failed.

CAP expenditure—I challenge the Minister to prove me wrong—has increased every year since Britain joined the EEC. It has increased and decreased as a percentage of the total budget, but expenditure has increased inexorably. It is partly because of the vested interests in it — the member Governments and the farming vote, which tends to get more powerful as its size is reduced. We have seen that in the United Kingdom, but I do not understand why it is. It is also getting more powerful with the increasing Mediterranean influence in the Community with more and more southern European states coming in who will depend much more on the guidance and guarantee fund for changes in agricultural structures. I am not objecting to them wanting those things but they all involve more expenditure than is the case at the present.

There is a certain amount of false optimism around. There is a feeling that if we could only get the common agricultural policy under control we would then have resolved, or at least gone a long way to resolving, the problem of total EEC spending. I hate to disagree with many right hon. and hon. Gentlemen from both sides of the House, but I must point out that they are making an assumption which is unwarranted. The assumption is that if we can reduce CAP expenditure we shall, since it is about three quarters of the Community budget, reduce total EEC expenditure. If ever we succeed in reducing CAP expenditure, the pressures to spend on the social fund and the regional fund the money that is saved will increase proportionately and total expenditure will go on rising even though the balance between the CAP and the other structural funds will be rather different from in the past.

There is also the constant pressure from the Assembly to increase spending. If anybody doubts my word let him read the debate, which I have available, of Assembly proceedings on 10 December 1985 when it was querying the Budget approved by the Council. The Assembly rejected that budget and passed its own illegal budget. Every speech made by Assembly Members from all over Europe of all different political parties, from extreme Left to extreme Right, was on the same theme. They said that the Community needed to spend more money than the Council was willing to allow in its own budget—which is why the budget was rejected—partly because of the increasing costs of the common agricultural policy and partly because of the wonderful phrase "the cost of the past". That phrase is simply a euphemism for the fact that up to now there has been no mechanism in the Community for bringing expenditure commitments into balance with anticipated income resources, such as we have in this country.

As we all know, the Community has to have a balanced budget each year. It cannot borrow money but in the past it has entered into more and more commitments, which have been agreed by national Governments as well as by members of the European Assembly. Those commitments have increased over the years and have had to be taken into account increasingly in the following year's budgets and there has not been the income to meet those commitments.

We are now being told by the Assembly that if we give a big slice of money in one year to the Community to resolve all the costs of the past we could get back on an even keel. I beg to differ. We shall not get back on to an even keel until we have in the EEC budgetary discipline and proper financial procedures such as we have in the House of Commons. I believe that as long as there is the device of intergovernmental agreements to let the Community off the hook when it spends more money than is available, and the device of raising the VAT ceiling every two or three years, we shall never get Community spending under control.

The Government and some civil servants believe that this is the sort of debate that can be ignored and swept to one side. They believe it involves just a few rebellious Conservative Members, a few people on the Labour Benches and the alliance backing the Government. I believe that this is the sort of debate and vote that we will increasingly have in the House, under any conceivable Government. Those who believe that the Community can get whatever it asks for from this country without proper financial procedures and discipline will be making a very big mistake. Eventually, when the British people wake up to what is not being done in their name—the House is not exercising proper financial control over what goes on in the EEC as regards Britain's contribution—they will turn to their politicians and say, "Enough is enough".

I believe that the House ought to give a message to the British people, even if we lose the vote tonight, to say that we are not prepared to go on being treated, basically as the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee has been by the Government, as children who do not really know what we are talking about. The Government feel that, in any case, it is not really important and that there are wider political implications. There are no wider political implications than financial considerations. The House was built up over the centuries on the basis of financial control. If we lose financial control, I believe that we are well on the way to losing democratic control as well.

Mr. Eric Cockeram (Ludlow): All those who have taken part in this debate, from whatever side of the House, fall into one of two groups. One group, for shorthand terms, is sometimes referred to as the anti-EEC brigade and the other group is in favour of the Common Market. It is interesting that there has been virtual unanimity from speakers on both sides of the House, to whichever of the groups they belong, that the EEC is failing to control its expenditure. That is the subject of this debate. It is not about whether we are for or against the Common Market but about whether we are for or against financial control.

When the House voted to join the Common Market in 1972, I was one of those who enthusiastically voted to join. I thought that I was voting in favour of European co-operation on defence, research and development — the European airbus is an obvious example—harmonisation of customs duties, increased Community trade and a sensible co-ordinated agricultural policy. I stand by all those things. However, I did not vote, have never voted and will never vote for the lack of financial control which is being shown by those in control of our taxpayers' money in Brussels and Strasbourg.

Nine hundred and thirty million pounds is one heck of a sum of money. It is only some 18 months since the House agreed a 40 per cent. increase in own resources for the Common Market when the VAT duties payable to the Common Market went up from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent. We were promised at that time that a new system of strict budgetary control would be instituted. That was to start in the current calendar year, six months ago. Here we are, six months into the new regime of strict budgetary control, and the House, despite assurances from the Treasury Bench in earlier times, is now faced wih a further demand for an extra £930 million. Commissioner Christophersen, Vice-President of the Commission, admitted in a recent article that the 1·4 per cent. of own resources is already inadequate.

About 70 per cent. of EEC expenditure is spent on the common agricultural policy and over half of that is spent on the storage and disposal of surplus food. In the grain sector, much of that is unfit for human consumption. However, we are being asked to pay for the storage and disposal of it. It would be cheaper to burn it in the fields, since some of it is not fit for human consumption, than store it and then sell it at knockdown prices—beef at 15p a pound and butter at 10p a pound—to people such as the Russians and the Libyans, which is what has been happening. We are spending £150 million a week on storage and disposal of the surpluses. That is the kind of sum that the House is being asked to approve. I cannot approve of that expenditure, nor can my constituents, when at the same time we have very strict cash controls of important expenditure in this country, such as in the National Health Service. Even my local authority is not being permitted to spend its own capital receipts, yet we are being asked to pass this sum for the EEC when, manifestly, there is a lack of financial control.

Anyone who wants the facts can refer to a recent Public Accounts Committee report. The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) and I are both members of that Committee. The Committee examined the cost of storing and disposing of the surplus. It is a revealing report. I do not intend to go through it. But no one could approve of that form of expenditure. No one could come to the House, representing his constituents and taxpayers generally, and approve of the continuous and increasing financing of such expenditure. It is one of the fundamental principles of this ancient House that Back Benchers come to represent not merely their own constituents but constituents at large, to exercise control over supply—that is, the expenditure of money by the Executive. I suggest to the House that we are not fulfilling that function if we pass this expenditure. I, for one, cannot do so.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Most of the points that I should like to make have been made in the superb speeches from Conservative Benches, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann). Therefore, I should like to make just two basic points.

I hope that in his reply the Economic Secretary will give us some explanation of why he and the other Ministers, in view of all the assurances that were given to the House and all the pledges, agreed to such massive extra expenditure at the meeting of the Council of Finance Ministers on Monday. I can recall hearing cheers on 11 March this year when, at Question Time, our Prime Minister said that she was going to fight very hard against the supplementary estimate put forward by the Commission of £1 billion, but, as we know, on Monday the Minister and his colleagues agreed within a few hours to a revised supplementary budget that was much more than that figure. We also received the assurance that agricultural spending would be contained, but we know from all the reports that most of the extra cash will be spent simply on dumping surplus agricultural produce on the world markets.

The Minister also gave the clearest of assurances that, if there were overspending, it would be clawed back. In fact, the present Secretary of State for Scotland said on 11 December 1984:

"Within the conclusions that have been adopted, although exceptional circumstances may result in increased expenditure, the provisions also require that that additional expenditure should be clawed back in the following years. Therefore, the overall requirement to control expenditure is safeguarded."

The Minister must tell us why the strict budgetary controls have been abandoned and have broken down. Why is agricultural spending totally out of control? Is it still the case, as said by Ministers in December last year, that the extra spending will be clawed back? I am sure that it will not. I am sure that it cannot be. I believe that either Britain was wholly misled in the meetings of the EEC, or else the House was wholly misled.

I hope that the Economic Secretary in particular will look back on the debate of 11 December 1984, when he responded angrily, which was out of character, when I suggested that the strict budgetary controls might be a worthless piece of paper. He said:

"I take the strongest possible issue with my hon. Friend over that view. We undertook to arrange that measures necessary to guarantee the effective application of budgetary discipline would be put in place. The component parts of those measures are an overall reference framework covering all expenditure, separate provisions for an agricultural guideline and a maximum rate of expenditure covering non-obligatory expenditure."—[Official Report, 11 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 951-999.]

We were told that that would be not just a recommendation, but binding on the Council. Of course, Ministers say things from time to time. Sometimes they can laugh them off and say that things have changed. But the Minister must remember that, if the House has any influence on controlling spending, that assurance was given to persuade all of us to give 40 per cent. more on VAT, which is the equivalent of a 25 per cent. rise in real terms in the total spending of the Common Market. Conservative Members, and I am sure Liberal and Social Democratic party Members, went round the country saying, "We know that we shall give a lot more money to the Common Market, but don't worry because it is under control. We have budgetary controls that are legally binding." Therefore, we must have an explanation from the Minister not only of what went wrong but of why on Monday he agreed to the huge additional sum, taking us right up to the control that we were told would last for several years, without the fight that the Prime Minister promised us.

Secondly, we know the excuses that will be trotted out. We always hear them in advance from the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston). Then we usually hear them about a month later from members of the Government. First, we are told that the reason is that the dollar has been falling, and if the dollar falls food prices are bound to go down, too. What absolute reckless economic nonsense. For example, if sterling goes down in value, we are told that it costs us more to buy things from abroad because they cost more. It is normal, natural economics. Somehow the Common Market is trying to get across a crazy economic fallacy that the only thing to which normal disciplines do not apply is agriculture: if the dollar goes down in value, the price of all foodstuffs will adjust themselves automatically and go down. If the Minister tries to trot out that excuse—I hope that he will not—and if the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber thinks of doing so again, let them look at what has been happening to other food prices that are not covered by the Common Market. Have they been going down with the dollar?

Let us look at the figures in the monthly commodity price bulletin issued by the United Nations Organisation. For example, when the dollar has been plunging in the past 12 months, the price of coffee has gone up from 1·44 cents to 2·44 cents a pound. Why has the price gone up? Simply because there is a shortage of coffee. The price of tea has gone down from 1·76p to 1·34p because, whereas there was a shortage last year, there is now a glut of tea. What has happened to bananas? We are going fast towards creating a banana republic in the Common Market. The price of bananas has gone up from 21p to 29p over the past year. What about our old friend pepper? The price has gone up from 846 cents to 1,203 cents per kilo.

I am only trying to show the Minister—I hope that he will accept it—that prices of food do not go up or down depending on the rate of the dollar. They go up or down depending on whether there is an excess of supply or demand. We all know why Common Market food prices have been going down. It is because there is a horrendous glut, which we are making worse. What is so criminal about it, and what no one seems to care about, apart from those who attend these debates, is what it is doing to the Third world. Misery, starvation and deprivation are being created through the dumping of all that food on the world markets, which are being depressed. That is causing devastation to the Third world and real poverty.

Is the currency level the reason? No, it is not. My hon. Friend the Minister knows that it is not. Everyone in the House, including, I am sure, the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, knows that it is a bogus piece of nonsense to say that if currency goes down, food prices go down by the same or a similar amount. The reason why they go down is that there is a surplus of supply.

The second excuse that is trotted out is that we did not make provision for Spain and Portugal joining the Common Market. The Minister must know that that is not so. On 14 November 1985 the then Minister of State, Treasury made it abundantly clear that full provision had been made not only for the admission of Spain and Portugal but for refunds of own resources under the transitional arrangements. That had been fully covered, according to the Government. We can assume only that the Government were telling us the truth.

We must pay the money because of the budget rebate. Britain will not get its money unless we pay the extra cash. The Government must answer why the present Minister of State, in answer to a parliamentary question on 3 July 1986, said that there was full provision and that the EEC was obliged to allow us to deduct the money. As has been said by many Conservative Members, sadly and tragically Common Market spending is wholly out of control. There is no justification for the interest-free loan of £900 million.

We heard today that two wards in a hospital in Southend will continue to be closed for a further six months. We need £800,000 to keep those wards open. This morning, I received a telephone call that the Sacred Heart primary school's heating is not working. It will cost a lot of money to repair it, and the money is not available. All hon. Members could tell similar stories and could draw attention to local problems. Ministers must ask themselves how they can go back to their constituencies and say that we cannot afford to spend modest sums of money when the Common Market spends £150 million every week on dumping, destroying and storing food. The Common Market is asking for an extra interest-free loan of £900 million from the Government without any pledge that things will get better.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): I joined the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee halfway through the inquiry. I approached the question with a mind unclouded by any excessive knowledge of the subject. I listened to the evidence presented to us with growing incredulity. Despite the honeyed words of the Treasury officials and the persuasive tones of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Treasury, I formed a clear impression that the emperor had no clothes. When I asked, in my perhaps naive way:

"on the basis of the evidence of actions, which Member States and which parties to these financial arrangements now appear to have commitment to budget discipline at all?",

I was told:

"the point to have in mind is that no Member State has repudiated the Budget Discipline conclusions. They all stand. They have not been superseded by anything else".

That was the strongest answer that could be given to me. I have no doubt about the commitment of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister or the Government to achieving effective budgetary discipline. However, as our report shows, the stark fact is that no other member state shares that commitment. For example, only five of the 12 member states would join us in taking action in the European Court of Justice against what has been shown to be an illegal budget. The verdict in that case was a great victory. Although the establishment of the principle is of intrinsic value and importance, the benefit will be dissipated if the House approves the motion.

I am no anti-Marketeer or Europhobe. It is precisely because I wish to see the European Community succeed, and because the health of the Community requires that budgetary discipline should be imposed, that I believe it is necessary for the House to signal that there is at least one sovereign Parliament among the member states that will not continue to supply limitless funds to an organisation suffering from financial incontinence. We should not be seduced by the argument that no more than advance payment is at stake.

If I found it difficult to manage my own financial affairs, would it be any solution for me to try to persuade the Fees Office that it should pay me my August salary on 31 July, my September salary on 5 August, and continue to advance the payments of salary to me to fund my cash deficiency? Where would it end? It would not be long before it would be necessary for our total contribution for the financial year to be paid to the Commission by the end of June, and for advance payments on account of the contributions for the following year to be paid from July onwards. So it continues.

[Mr. John Watts]

As the insatiable appetite for money grows, as more and more is provided in a never-ending attempt to satisfy that appetite, so the European Community's financial obesity will grow, until it collapses under the burden of its own weight.

Successive expedients to bail out the Community from the consequences of its lack of budgetary discipline provide no solution to the problems of a spendaholic. The time will come—I echo the words of the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins)—when we must say, loudly and clearly, "Enough is enough." In my view, that time has come. That is why I shall support the amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins).

6.35 pm

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): Hon. Members on both sides of the House have, quite rightly, condemned the lack of budgetary discipline exercised by the European Community. They have referred to the wasteful spending on agriculture, and especially intervention stocks. Hon. Members have referred to the Public Accounts Committee's report. I recommend the report to the House. It spells out what we have all long suspected and described as the case, that far too much is wasted and that food is kept in stores for too long. It is an utter disgrace, in a time of world food shortages, for that to happen.

I do not intend to detain the House for long, because it is vitally important that the Economic Secretary to the Treasury answers the debate. It seemed to me that he did not understand and appreciate the points of order that were made at the beginning of the debate—that advance payments to the European Commission were absurd when we have no notion of how much the budget will be, what its component elements are, and whether or not the 1·4 per cent. ceiling will be over-run this year, never mind in the next financial year.

It is quite wrong that such a debate should take place today before the European Parliament votes on the budget. That was true at the beginning of the debate. However, during the debate, at 5 o'clock, I looked at the Press Association tapes to see what had happened. I discovered that the European Parliament had voted for a budget which I presume is the same budget as was agreed by the Council of Ministers. The fact that the Minister did not interrupt the proceedings, and the fact that no statement was made—it appears that no statement will be made, certainly not today—about what is in the budget show an utter contempt for the House on the part of the Government.

According to the Press Association tapes, agricultural spending has been increased by a further £700 million. It still represents at least two thirds of the total budget. After all that has been said about efforts to control farm spending, we find that this year farm spending has been increased. The Minister should have ensured that we were told that before the debate took place. That such a debate takes place without anything being said formally by the Government about the contents of this year's European budget shows arrogance and a contempt for the proceedings of the House.

It appears that the amount spent on the regional and social funds has been increased by 6 per cent. and 7 per cent. respectively. We do not know what such an increase means. My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) referred to the euphemism of past commitments. That is, quite simply, unpaid bills—bills that have been incurred by national Governments and are to be reimbursed by the European Community for regional and social spending, the kind of spending of which Labour Members entirely approve. Although it appears from the tapes that there is an increase in this spending, we do not know what it is for. Is it intended to fund new projects, designed to reduce the horrendous unemployment levels, or is it just intended to pay off debts incurred in the past years? The president of the Court of Auditors tells us that, at the end of 1984, more than £9 billion of such debts were outstanding, covering, to a large extent, past payments for the regional and social funds.

We do not know whether this year's European budget allows an increase in the regional and social funds merely to settle some of the unpaid bills. We have no idea, because the Government have not seen fit to tell us what they must have known before the debate. After all, telephone and other communications with Brussels exist and a Finance Minister was there during the night coming to an agreement on the budget's contents. Why was no statement made?

It appears that the Minister of State is proud of the settlement. According to the tapes, he says that "chaos" in the Community has been "averted" and that Britain is getting the credit. I am sure that the Minister of State will be eating those words in a few months' time. Of course chaos in Community spending will not have been averted. Apparently, the budget is right up at the 1·4 per cent. limit.

We do not know what this year's cereal crop will be. There may be estimates but the harvest has not yet been gathered in. We do not know what the intervention prices will be, how much cereal will have to be stored and how expensive that will be. Fluctuations in the dollar have already been well described by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). This is one of the gaping holes in the so-called "budgetary discipline". Fluctuations in the dollar are used as excuses for increasing spending through the budget. Such fluctuations may well occur during the rest of this year.

Mr. Deakins: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. I know that she is pressed for time and that the Economic Secretary wishes to reply. Were the increases of 6 per cent. and 7 per cent., which were mentioned on the tapes, increases over the 1986 budget approved by the Council in December 1985 or increases over the 1985 budget as approved last year by the Council and the Assembly?

Dr. McDonald: My hon. Friend was right to make that point. As he well knows, that detail is not spelt out in the account we have been given. We have to rely on a statement from the Government for that, and it appears that no such statement is forthcoming. We believe, from rumour, that the Government would much prefer to hide behind a written statement made late on Friday afternoon and to hope that everyone has forgotten the whole thing by Monday morning. That will not happen. We shall press for a proper statement to be made tomorrow and we expect to hear tonight from the Economic Secretary more details of the budget.

I want the Economic Secretary to reply extensively to the debate, so I shall make only one more point. A further press report suggested that overseas aid had been cut by £40 million. In an effort to spend more on expensively produced and often wasted food in this Community, we are prepared to cut aid to the Third world. A British Minister was in Brussels engaged on that matter on the very day The Guardian reported that the Prime Minister opposed sanctions agains South Africa. It reported the right hon. Lady as saying:

"I find nothing moral about them, sitting in comfortable circumstances, with good salaries, inflation-proof pensions, good jobs, saying that we . . . will put x hundred thousand black people out of work, knowing that this could lead to starvation".

Frankly, such a description could well apply to those who decided on that very day to cut the overseas aid budget by another £40 million. That action showed the charade of the Prime Minister's words.

We want the Economic Secretary to tell us the truth about the budget, which has apparently been agreed. We should like a firm assurance that the 1·4 per cent. ceiling will not be exceeded this year and that neither he nor his right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench will have the cheek to ask us for more money to be squandered this year in Europe.

6.45 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I must confess that it would have been convenient for me, as well as for other hon. Members, if my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who has been attending these meetings, had been able to get back sooner. I might then not have had to deal with this debate.

I did not speak at the beginning of the debate because I felt that it was right that it should be introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) as Chairman of the Select Committee on Treasury and Civil Service. I pay tribute to him and the members of his Committee and to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Cockeram) and the other members of the Select Committee on Public Accounts for their vigilance and for the way in which they express, through their reports and debates on statements of this kind, their concerns about the financial matters for which Ministers are responsible, especially the European Community. The Community's financial affairs are always of keen interest to the House.

It is a year since I was responsible for these matters but I note without surprise that the concern has not diminished in any way. I should like to respond to the points made by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) and made in points of order before the debate about the relationship of the 1986 budget to the Estimates.

It would be impossible and impractical for me to respond to hon. Members on the details of a budget whose process is due to be completed today at a meeting at which my hon. Friend the Minister of State represents the United Kingdom. I shall certainly convey to him the wishes of right hon. and hon. Members to hear about these measures, especially their details. So far as I know, my hon. Friend has not yet returned to the United Kingdom.

The debate is about the earlier payment, not of VAT own resources, but of levies and duties which are collected by all member states each month and which are normally payable to the Commission after about seven weeks—on the 20th day of the second month following the month to which they relate. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) referred to a procedure which, as I pointed out in an intervention, is based on article 10(2) of the 1977 regulations—my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) correctly made that point — which imposes no obligation on member states to meet those requests for early payment. These early payments therefore cannot be paid—and it would not be proper for them to be paid—directly out of the Consolidated Fund. That is why today's procedure is adopted.

The Consolidated Fund is required to defray charges which may be made in the interim out of the contingencies fund. The sum of £930 million on the Order Paper and contained in the Estimates is not an aggregate sum. It is simply the amount of £130 million a month multiplied by the number of months for which it is brought forward. It is not, therefore, a loan. Several of my hon. Friends refer to this sum as a loan for the period. It is not; it is the equivalent of bringing forward the normal monthly figure of some £130 million of levies and duties for several months. That is why provision is taken to reimburse the contingencies fund for the payments already made and to enable provision to be made in the coming months if it is necessary to make payments out of the Consolidated Fund under the authority of the Estimates. If we did not have that, it would not be possible to do that when Parliament is not sitting.

There is no certainty that these sums will be required or that they will even be invited. I have been asked to comment on this point. When the Government receive a request for such funds they consider the request carefully. Such a request was received in March this year and after careful consideration we were not satisfied that the Community needed the funds. We reported that back to the Commission and as a result the request was withdrawn.

This is not an automatic procedure. In recent years this procedure has been followed frequently because of the cash flow problems of the Community. I do not wish to disguise that fact in any way. There have been 21 occasions in the past three years when that has happened.

I would like to repeat the point that I made before this debate began.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend explain these cash flow problems?

Mr. Stewart: Before the debate began, I said, within the context of the points of order about whether it was proper to debate this matter today, that the use of this procedure of earlier payment of own resources after three weeks instead of seven weeks does not involve any increase in public expenditure. Nor does it involve any extra payment to the European Community because every time the procedure is used or a payment is made, there is automatically a compensating reduction in the liability of the member state to the Community on what otherwise would have been the due date. There is no accumulation and no absolute increase in the amounts of public expenditure.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend is simply explaining the mechanisms. We want to know why this cash flow shortage occurred. What is being done to put it right for the future?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) is never too patient in debates on this subject. If I am given the chance to do so, I will cover the other matters as quickly as possible, including that raised by my hon. Friend.

The cash flow during the current year has been affected by the exchange market. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East claimed that the decline of the dollar does not increase the cost of the CAP. It certainly does not increase the cost of the CAP on a one-for-one basis, but a change in the major trading currency of the world does have an effect on food prices and therefore creates a difference between world food prices and the intervention prices of the EEC.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: How does it have an effect?

Mr. Stewart: It has an effect because food prices do not adjust immediately to reflect the change in any one currency. It takes time for the change to work through.

The original budget for this year was constructed on the basis of $1·2 to the ecu. That represented a considerable expected decline in the dollar exchange rate on the rate of $1·35 to the ecu which applied when the budget was first fixed. The dollar has now moved substantially lower and that has meant that there has been a need for further payments under the FEOGA guarantee scheme. That has been incorporated into the budget.

Several hon. Members asked me about budget discipline. Budget discipline is an important reinforcement to the restraints on Community expenditure. The increase due to the dollar change had to be agreed by all Finance Ministers as a special circumstance in this year's ECOFIN. No one has ever made a secret of the fact that such exceptional circumstances could arise. However, the fact that such exceptional circumstances may arise does not invalidate the agricultural guideline. The preliminary draft budget for 1987 has now been drawn up within the financial guideline. That undoubtedly has an effect on price fixing.

I do not claim that price fixing is sufficient to deal with all the problems of the CAP, which have been described so eloquently this evening. I believe, like my hon. Friends, that the CAP is in need of serious measures in terms of future price fixing and the structural arrangements for quotas and levies. Neither of these factors alone would be sufficient to deal with the seriousness of the problem of potential overspending in the CAP.

I was also asked about the implications of the budget for the United Kingdom. I remember occasions a year or so ago when I and some of my hon. Friends who are present today debated whether it would be right to agree to the Fontainebleau agreement. At that time some of my hon. Friends and others were sceptical when I assured them that, even if the 1 per cent. rate ceiling was raised to 1·4 per cent., the United Kingdom figure would still remain well below 1 per cent.—in fact, around 0·7 per cent. The 1986 budget—if it is concluded, as I imagine it will be, at or close to the 1·4 per cent. limit—would result in our contribution for this year being at a VAT rate of 0·68 per cent. That is lower than the figure that I quoted a year or so ago.

In answer to those who asked why my hon. Friend the Minister of State and I were prepared to contemplate a budget of this kind on Monday, I must stress that the illegal budget which the European Parliament passed last December would have involved this country in a VAT rate of 0·73 per cent. — substantially higher than the consequence of the budget before the Council this week. That justifies the Government's approach to the budgetary problems of 1986 and it bears out what we said to the House a year ago when we dealt with the Fontainebleau arrangements.

I believe that the 1·4 per cent. ceiling exerts an important control and restraint over Community expenditure.

Mr. Deakins: How does it do that?

Mr. Stewart: That has been the case this year. Even before I went to the Budget Council meeting this week, I saw no case for an increase in the 1·4 per cent. ceiling. Having attended the Council meeting, I am fortified in the belief that this represents a very important restraint on the Community's finances. We have no commitment to increase it, and there is no presumption that we would do so. My view, which is shared by many hon. Members, is that the CAP still poses a threat to the finances of the Community and needs to be controlled with all the measures available for that purpose.

I have been asked about the Community's budget for 1986. I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will feel it right to convey to the House——

It being Seven o'clock, MR. SPEAKER, put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Estimate, pursuant to the Order [4 July].

Main Question put and agreed to.
Resolved.

That a supplementary sum, not exceeding £930,000,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1987 for expenditure by the Treasury in connection with payments to the Budget of the European Communities not covered by direct charges on the Consolidated Fund under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972, as set out in House of Commons Paper No. 439.

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 27 June].

Clause 1

EXTENDED MEANING OF "THE TREATIES" AND "THE COMMUNITY TREATIES"

Amendment moved [27 June]: No. 7, in page 1, line 13, after 'Communities)', insert
'but not Article 17 thereof'.—[Sir E. du Cann.]

7.13 pm

Sir Edward du Cann (Taunton): I believe it was wholly wrong to truncate the debate on 27 June on the subject of tax harmonisation. It is also wrong that the time for the debate this evening is so limited.

For most of our fellow citizens there is no more significant subject than tax levels. The amount of tax that they have to pay, direct or indirect, is of crucial importance. Taxation is a subject of universal interest. I believe that it would be right to say that there will be universal fury if the future cost of living increased as a result of increases in taxation which are outside the control of this Parliament.

It may be convenient for the Committee if I rehearse the points that I was endeavouring to make in the earlier part of our debate. First, there is a strong impetus in the European Community to harmonise taxation — that is undoubted. It follows therefore that a vote against this amendment tonight is a vote for harmonisation. Secondly, if taxes are harmonised it will inevitably mean that the discretion of a British Chancellor of the Exchequer to decide the level of taxation in our country will disappear. It follows therefore that a vote againt this amendment tonight will be a vote for the impotence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Thirdly, if, at the option of the Council, future taxes are harmonised, the influence and command of this House will inevitably be reduced. The sovereignty of this Parliament will equally reduce. It follows therefore that a vote against this amendment tonight would be a breach, on the part of those who walk through these Lobbies, of the clear undertaking given at the time of the great debates in our nation about the appropriateness or otherwise of signing the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Is there not an apt quotation from the Bible for those who will oppose this amendment tonight:

"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

Sir Edward du Cann: I should not like to swap biblical quotations with my hon. Friend but I think there is a growing sense of impatience among the British electorate at the apparent indifference of some Members of Parliament to the consequences of the situation in which we now find ourselves.

The fourth point I was endeavouring to make in our earlier debate was to ask whether the House of Commons was content that, in future, a non-elected commission should decide British taxation levels rather than the elected representatives of Britain. If that is so, it therefore follows that a vote against the amendment is tantamount to deciding that, in taxation matters at any rate, we no longer wish to be masters in our own nation. [Interruption.]

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I should remind the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) that it is not in order to pass between the Chair and an hon. Member who is addressing the Committee.

Sir Edward du Cann: The fifth point I was endeavouring to make was that there are substantial pressures for more money to be spent by the Commission. Strong evidence of that was given in the fifth report of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service which we have been discussing. Such evidence can also be drawn from the decision of the European Court during the course of the week. Members of this British Parliament will need no reminding of the constant intention of Members of the European Assembly to make themselves responsible for the expenditure of greater and ever increasing amounts of taxpayers' money.

As there are such pressures for the Community to spend more, it inevitably follows that a greater amount of revenue will be needed. The figure of VAT participation is already—unduly early—up to 1·4 per cent., and it is openly discussed that it will not be long before the figure requires to be 1·6 per cent.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is it the case that it is the policy of the Liberal and Social Democratic parties—there is no representative of either party here, which is why I must direct the question to my right hon. Friend—that the 1·4 per cent. limit on VAT should be raised to 2 per cent.?

Sir Edward du Cann: My hon. Friend does the electorate a service in emphasising that point. Let it be clearly understood that if at any time through some unfortunate mischance the Liberal and Social Democratic parties had any hand in government or influence over it, taxation would substantially rise, as my hon. Friend has pointed out, with an inevitable vicious twist to the rise in prices.

It follows that, if there are strong measures to spend more, and if more revenue will be needed, it is essential that our nation retains the right of veto over what non-elected people might propose in the Council. I hope that we shall have a clear undertaking from my hon. Friend the Minister that that will remain the case. It also follows from what I am saying that a vote against the amendment would be a vote for higher taxes.

Sixthly, I was endeavouring to make the point that it is essential that during the debate my hon. Friend the Minister should give us an assurance that the zero rate will remain. The zero rate is under challenge in the European Court, as right hon. Members already know. It is inevitable that if the zero rate goes, henceforward there will be VAT on such items as gas, electricity, water, food, books, and, I dare say, rents. We always set our face against taxation on certain commodities and services as a matter of social principle.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Children's shoes.

Sir Edward du Cann: My hon. Friend reminds me of a subject that gave rise to great political controversey in Britain.

We need a clear and categoric assurance from my hon. Friend the Minister that the zero rate will remain. It is certain that a vote for harmonisation and against the amendment in my name and that of other right hon. and hon. Members must mean that the zero rate will disappear.

Finally, when the debate was terminated I was endeavouring to make the point that there is something immoral as well as foolish and away from the traditions of the House in voting money before we understand properly what the expenditures will be for and how they will be supervised and controlled.

It is a dereliction of duty on the part of the House if it is willing to vote money to be spent by the European Community irresponsibly and in ever-increasing amounts with no proper system of control. Therefore, for all those reasons, I urge right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House to support the amendment.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): At the beginning of my remarks I should reiterate the violent objection that so many of us in the Chamber this evening have to the way in which the debate has been artificially and ludicrously truncated. These are massively important issues for this Parliament and for Britain and to try to concertina them all into one-hour debates is to undermine Parliament's credibility in the eyes of the public.

It is interesting that it should be this debate that follows upon the previous one. The Government were able to drive their Estimates through the House of Commons—they have a majority to do practically anything that they want—but the two tellers for the amendment in the name of the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) were both Conservative Members. However, it is worth putting on the record that one of them—the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts)—was earlier this week appointed by the Prime Minister to be the chief finance officer of the Conservative and Unionist party. If in the same week of that gigantic elevation for a fairly young Member of the House he finds it impossible to support his Government, it tells us and the country something quite clearly about the trouble that the Government are in.

Why should we vote for the amendment this evening which on the face of it would eliminate from the Single European Act the new article 17? On the face of it, the new article 17 substitutes in the treaty of Rome a provision which would make voting on tax harmonisation unanimous and not subject to the majority rules that apply to the rest of the items which the Government make part of their drive towards the internal market. I say that that is what it says on the surface, but, as the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) has ably pointed out, that is a superficial analysis. Those hon. Members who listened to the previous debate, never mind the numerous other debates, simply do not believe the Government.

The previous debate this afternoon was on the European budget. Even the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who came to the House last October and assured us that the financial commitments of the Government would be obeyed, felt obliged to vote with the Opposition against the Government. All the promises and assurances that were given have been clearly shown to have little or no foundation, so why should the House believe the Minister and the Foreign Secretary when they tell us that article 17 is the ultimate guarantee for the United Kingdom that we shall not have foisted upon us the harmonisation of our VAT rates with the rest of the EC?

[Mr. George Robertson]

Last June the Financial Times wrote a remarkably glowing account of Lord Cockfield's role within the European Commission. He was a Minister and had attracted little or no attention from anybody, never mind the Financial Times. However, the internal market crusade on which he was hell-bent did attract attention. The Financial Times said:

"When it became clear that he was determined to press ahead with the idea of fiscal reform—bringing the indirect tax rates of member states roughly into line, so that frontier tax checks would prove superfluous — the idea caused consternation to the Treasury. Lord Cockfield was summoned back to Downing Street to explain himself".

We shall be told by the Minister that that is our great guarantee, because every time Lord Cockfield speaks out of turn the Prime Minister will drag him back to No. 10 and tell him that he is being naughty and that he is not allowed to do this part of what Lord Cockfield believes to be fundamental to the drive towards the internal market.

But Lord Cockfield is not alone. He is not the only one who believes that harmonisation of indirect tax is crucial to obtaining a proper and reasonable internal market in Europe. Sir Henry Plumb, the leader of the Conservative group in the European Parliament, and somebody who, I understand from the tapes—all that we have to rely on this evening — said that this afternoon's budget agreement in the European Parliament was a great triumph and something on which we should be congratulated. Sir Henry Plumb said on 11 December last year:

"It is hard to see how there could be an internal market without a measure of harmonisation in fiscal matters."

I think that it is scarcely being sceptical, pessimistic or disruptive for us on these Benches to say to the Government that we are not happy about the assurances that have been given that article 17 and the unanimity rule will protect the British taxpayer from harmonisation of VAT.

7.30 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Can my hon. Friend confirm—the Minister might like to touch on this in reply—that existing directive No. 6 on VAT, which already requires a good degree of harmonisation, still applies irrespective of what is contained in this article? In other words, the Chancellor can still receive letters and be brought before the court in infraction proceedings if the existing VAT directives are not complied with.

Mr. Robertson: Absolutely. My hon. Friend, who is a great expert on the minutiae of these matters, makes a valid point, which I am sure the Minister will want to answer. The fact is that there is a body of evidence that can be deployed against the Government's assurances, although they are freely given and sound emphatic to many ears. That body of evidence would tend to raise doubts in the mind of anyone making an objective judgment.

An objective outside expert who wished to come to his or her own conclusion could also look at what was said by the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities in a voluminous report entitled "Indirect Taxation and the Internal Market". The Committee spent a large amount of time on this because its terms of reference allow it to examine these matters in more detail than is possible in a Select Committee of this House. The Committee said at paragraph 111:

"On the evidence before them, particularly on the basis of the experience of the Irish Republic and the United States of America, the Committee are convinced that the abolition of frontiers without first approximating indirect taxes would have unacceptable consequences".

The Committee said that from the basis of another belief that it has. It then said at paragraph 110:

"The Committee believes that there is a good case for approximation of indirect taxes as an end in itself, in the interests of fair competition."

This great Select Committee, which includes a wide variety of knowledgeable peers, went on to say:

"if it proved necessary to impose a low positive rate of tax on these items, the Committee consider that the disadvantages in the terms of cost of living would be compensated by the advantage of a broader tax base and perhaps a lower standard rate."

Their Lordships, of course, do not suffer the problems that those of us in the House of Commons have of being elected. One cannot imagine even the strongest federalists who may exist in the House of Commons going round advocating to people that we start levying VAT in its own right on food, children's clothes, books, gas and electricity — all areas that British Governments of whatever complexion since the introduction of VAT have chosen to exempt from that tax.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Does the hon. Gentleman imagine that, if harmonisation did take place, it would automatically mean that we would have to drop our practices rather than other countries adopting some of ours?

Mr. Robertson: I can only imagine that the hon. Gentleman is being disingenuous. He knows what the reality is. After all, he is a member of a party that came to power in 1979 and said that it was not going to increase VAT, yet managed in its first Budget virtually to double it. Therefore, I do not think that he should expect anyone in the House, and certainly not the British people outside it, to accept that if harmonisation took place it would necessarily all be at the lowest rate and that we would not go on to Denmark's 22 per cent. VAT, France's 18·5 per cent., or Italy's 18 per cent. One can bet one's last ecu that, when harmonisation takes place, it will take place at the highest rate that can be got away with.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): I listened with some surprise to the hon. Gentleman holding up the House of Lords Select Committee to obloquy because their Lordships are not elected. As I recall, in previous debates he has quoted with enormous approval the conclusions of the House of Lords Select Committee that these measures involved some diminution of the national power of veto.

Mr. Robertson: On the contrary, I am holding up their Lordships' report to considerable approval because I think that it pricks the balloon of the nonsense already spoken on this subject. Their Lordships point out their view of the advantages and say that they believe that the internal market cannot be accomplished unless that harmonisation takes place.

Therefore, we should look with the greatest scepticism and distrust at the fresh assurances being given to us by the Government. I do not believe that there is anything to suggest that the Government mean any part of what they say; nor, indeed, even if they did, that they would be capable of controlling the great moving mountain once they started it on its trail. I therefore ask hon. Members on both sides of the House to vote for the amendment after this all too brief debate.

Mr. Butterfill: It is extraordinary that the speeches we have heard so far have assumed, first, that the unanimity provisions now proposed are not a substantial increase in the safeguards that the House and the British public have against any future action under the treaties; and, secondly, that in any future negotiations on harmonisation we shall be the ones who will change absolutely while nobody else will change at all.

I would be the first to acknowledge that it is eminently desirable that those goods that are presently zero-rated should remain zero-rated. I believe that, although indirect taxation in the form of VAT has many advantages, it is also necessary to protect the least well-off people in society from the effects of this somewhat restrictive tax. That is why successive Governments have chosen to exclude from the incidence of VAT essential commodities such as heating fuels, children's clothing, shoes and food. I do not see that we shall be unable to persuade our partners in the Economic Community that that remains a desirable objective for them as well.

It is not true to say that all other European countries have higher rates of VAT on many of these items than we have. Indeed, I have had many representations from the hotel and tourism trade in my constituency complaining that on many comparable commodities in the Community the rates are lower than in the United Kingdom and there is, thus, unfair competition.

Sir Edward du Cann: While I understand my hon. Friend's point about VAT and his idea that maybe we shall not be pressured to abandon the zero rate, if that is so, why is it that over many years there has been that pressure, and why has the United Kingdom been taken to the European Court by the Commission complaining about our zero rate and demanding that it be abolished?

Mr. Butterfill: It is certainly true that the Commission's objective is to achieve harmonisation, as it always has been. It is true that it has put pressure on all Governments who operate different rates from those of other member Governments in the Community. Their objective is undoubtedly to achieve standardisation, but I believe that it ought to be possible to deploy arguments with our partners to adjust many of the anomalies. There is no doubt that many of the anomalies and some of the high rates in other European countries are there as a hidden deterrent to some of our exports, and exist to the detriment of our own exporters.

France has been clever at arranging its rates of VAT to favour some of its products but to disadvantage some British products. There will undoubtedly be many ways in which harmonisation will be to the benefit of all of us. Therefore, we should not proceed with the pessimism that has been expressed in some parts of the House that automatically harmonisation will mean that all the things that we value, treasure and rightly seek to uphold will disappear, and we shall automatically go to everybody else's higher rate. That is not likely to be the case. It would not be necessary in terms of the revenue objectives of the member Governments, so we should look at this much more constructively.

Under this article, we have much more control because, for the first time, it is spelt out unequivocably that any change must be unanimous. That is a great protection for the House and for any future Government.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): It is monstrous that the debate on these important questions should be compressed, and the speech made by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) underlines the effect of that.

Because of the falling of the guillotine, I shall summarise the important arguments made by the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann), and ask that the Minister give a specific answer to certain questions. Is it the case that, with the passage of the Bill and the rejection of the amendment, the capacity of the British Government or the British Parliament to reject the imposition of VAT on books will be in any way weakened? I hope that the Minister will give a clear answer. If the answer is honest, it must be yes, and the House would not pass that proposition if it knew what it was doing.

Only a few months ago there was a huge outcry among the public when it was thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would impose VAT on books. Eventually, he rightly bowed to the protests and did not do so. Perhaps he had never intended to. However, I want to know from the Minister whether our power over such impositions is in any way diminished by the passage of the Bill.

The right hon. Member for Taunton mentioned other commodities and I want to know how the Bill will apply to them, and to the imposition of VAT on newspapers. Perhaps if the newspapers were to have VAT imposed on them without the British Parliament having a final say in the matter, they might start to awaken and understand what is happening in the House and what has been and will be done. It will not be much good British newpapers protesting in the future about the imposition of VAT on newspapers if they do not print the reports of the debates on these matters. I hope that the Minister will give us direct answers to those questions.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Great and unbounded though my respect for my hon. Friend the Minister is, I am disappointed that this evening we do not have with us a Treasury Minister to give the Treasury view on this most vital matter. It must be self-evident to the Committee that the ability of any one member state to manage its affairs could be greatly affected and impeded by the proposals in this part of the Bill. I would have thought that the Treasury would have wanted to be represented this evening to reassure us that it is behind what is being proposed. I can only draw my own conclusions from the fact that my hon. Friend has been left, no doubt admirably and robustly, to defend the position. I am in some doubt as to why the Treasury has not seen fit to send a representative this evening.

Two aspects of this part of the Bill concern me. The first is a more superficial political one, although it surprises me that advocates of the Community and its development are prepared to take the political risk in the short to medium-term that may go with the imposition of harmonised VAT rates on such sensitive articles as children's shoes, food, clothing or books. Those who wish the Community to develop rapidly would be disappointed, and would find their campaign set back considerably, were this to happen.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) spoke about the protection of the unanimity rule. We all know that the way in which the Community works is that any harmonisation will be done as part of a package. There will be a quid pro quo, or a trade-off, with other member Governments. They will say to our Government that if they all want to do this and the British Government particularly want to do that, part of the deal will be the imposition of VAT on food, children's shoes or whatever. That is why the apparent protection of the unanimity rule would not be as complete, total or reassuring as my hon. Friend asks us to believe.

7.45 pm

Mr. Butterfill: My hon. Friend knows very well, because he has been a Member of the European Parliament, that the negotiations may involve a trade-off, but the trade-off might be a higher rate for goods that are already subject to VAT, so that we might go to a French or Danish rate on certain high value goods, but that would mean that we would then keep zero rating on food and other essential commodities. We would not necessarily have to sacrifice our exemptions.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is right, but, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) said, the pressure has consistently been the other way. The evidence suggests that if there were to be a movement towards harmonisation it would be away from zero rating on items that we regard as sensitive.

There is a fundamental inconsistency between the stated demands of the Community for what is called in the jargon convergence, and the demands of tax harmonisation as an instrument of fiscal policy. Those who have a passionate belief in the Community believe that it is in its interests that we bring together the levels and rates of development and social and economic growth of all the member states. Instruments of policy have been devised in the Community to try to bring this about. One of the most notorious is the regional policy, which has misguidedly tried for several years to apply subsidies and taxpayers' funds to reduce what I believe are the natural differentials between the economies of the Community.

However, to bring about a convergence of economies as disparate and different as those of Denmark and Greece, or Luxembourg and Ireland in terms of gross national product per capita one must accept that for a long time to come the tax, fiscal and other domestic policies of these countries must be quite different, distinguished and differentiated. If one attempts to move towards tax harmonisation based on the argument of the internal market and the freedom of movement and the uniformity of policy one will endanger one of the other stated objectives of the Community—convergence.

Those who want the Community to progress and who adhere to and support convergence must come clean. They must tell us what they think it means, what they believe in and, more importantly, how they believe they will achieve that policy objective against a background of harmonisation of tax. It is not likely or possible to bring about the convergence of the economies of Luxembourg and Ireland if we impose on them from the centre identical rates of tax for harmonisation.

Therefore, one of the reasons why I am opposed to the Bill and wish to support the amendment is that I fear that there is a lack of clear thinking from those who have framed the legislation. As is so often the case in discussions on the European Community, those who support it have submitted themselves to the warm and comforting sound of the words. We like the words "harmonisation" and "convergence". People feel comfortable with them. They like the idea that, some time in the future, Greece will be as wealthy as Denmark, or Ireland as wealthy as Luxembourg.

However, the great danger is that in allowing ourselves to be massaged by these words and to be made to feel comfortable by them we are allowing at the same time a continuing deception to be perpetrated whereby the policy objectives are quite different and, indeed, quite incompatible. Until I am much more satisfied that these objectives can be squared and, if I may use the term, can themselves converge, I am quite unable to support this part of the Bill.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): When the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) said that a vote against this amendment was a vote in favour of harmonisation of taxes, he spoke nothing less than the literal truth. We are putting a new article into the treaty, and that article is mandatory. It says:

"The Council shall . . . adopt provisions for the harmonisation of legislation" concerning taxation.

Reference was made at an earlier stage in the proceedings to the word "shall", and I am grateful to the Minister of State for having written to me since then on the subject. She is quite plain about it. She says that the meaning of the word "shall" is mandatory, as one would naturally assume it to be. She said:

"The Council has a duty to act. That is the meaning of the word 'shall'."

So we are deliberately writing into our law and into a new treaty an obligation which we are imposing upon the Council as a matter fo duty: to act in such a way as to bring about the harmonisation of indirect taxation. That view is reinforced, if one compares the wording of the old article which is being displaced. The old article said:

"The Commission shall submit proposals to the Council."

It then went on to say:

"and the latter"—

that is, the Council—

"shall decide upon the matter."

So what we are doing is perfectly clear. We are substituting for an obligation to decide upon a proposal from the Commission an obligation to pass proposals which carry with them the harmonisation of taxes.

What is quite certain about the harmonisation of taxes, whether it is up or whether it is down, is that the resultant system of taxation will not be one which this country has chosen. It will be a system of taxation which has been proposed to this House or which has been legislated for by this House. It cannot be harmonious and it cannot converge, if that is the case. There is no respect more than this in which the will to political power, by membership of the EEC and the EEC structure, is evident.

The alleged purpose here is the completion of the internal market. If the internal market means freedom of exchange and freedom for the movement of goods, it is quite untrue to say that such freedom is dependent upon the approximation of the various tax systems in the different countries of the Community. All taxes have an economic effect. Therefore, if we want to harmonise the economies of two or more countries, we must enforce harmonised taxation in those countries, but there is no necessary connection between the harmonisation of taxation and the freedom of trade, other than that freedom of trade is a pretext and a cover for the will to power and the will to political unification.

This is a mandatory provision which will bring that scope nearer by enforcing upon the Council, and by committing this House to enforce upon the Council, that harmonisation of taxation which is necessary for the creation of political unity but which is not necessary for the completion of an internal common market or a market for the free exchange of goods.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): I echo the words of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). I am not at all sure that there is any economic basis for this measure, in terms of the benefits that it will bring to the Community. In fact, it will be contrary to the interests of the Community, as it is trying, obviously, to edge its way towards a federal state.

I take up the right hon. Gentleman's argument by contrasting the measures that are implicit in this Bill with the states of the United States where there is a federal economy which has never insisted upon the constituent states harmonising their taxation. The very vigour of a much more vigorous economy than any economy in Europe is such that the flow of economic values from area to area reflects the exigencies or needs of each state and its tax policy. One gets more vigour from a wide economy by allowing flexibility of tax rates than one gets from imposing any other system.

We shall probably end up by levelling down the economic vigour and interests of the Community instead of raising them. This is very much against Britain's interests. Each nation should determine what is the most appropriate level for its tax rates. If we were to insist upon local authorities levying the same rates bills, it would mean suicide for some authorities. That is what we are trying to do by means of this absurd proposal. In economic terms, it has not been thought through convincingly.

Many people feel very strongly about the primary financial role of this House. The long march of every man towards a democracy in which people are free was due to the determination of this House to set its own rates of taxation. That is fundamental and it touches on the spirit of our people.

This is an abnegation of a very important principle. It is extraordinary that the Government feel that they can edge us towards something which will contradict our history, interests and outlook. If they really wanted to build up the Community, they would stand up against these preposterous announcements. Many people are in favour of free and open trade but that does not require harmonisation. Harmonisation would lead to shackles being placed upon individual nation states that can work well together and trade well together without this particular part of the Bill.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Our objection to this part of the Bill is the loss of fiscal sovereignty. The right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) was quite right. In the 1971 White Paper we were told that we should keep control over our indirect taxation, but the completion of the so-called internal market means that that will go. We were conned then and we are being cheated now.

If the proposal in the Commission's document 7674 were implemented, alien institutions outside this country, not elected by us, would decide upon the taxation of the British people. This House would give up its competence to vote Supply, the historic source of its powers. In the past the House wrested these powers from the king in the name of parliamentary government. Are we to surrender them now to those who would be unaccountable to the voters?

We are told that the completed internal market is to comprise an area without frontiers. Fiscal barriers are to be dismantled. To achieve this, indirect taxes are to be approximated throughout the area of the internal market. The most important of these indirect taxes are value added tax and excise duties. VAT occupies a special position in the EEC. Member states are required to adopt it as their principal indirect tax and are required to pay a proportion of the VAT receipts to the EEC as part of its own resources. We now pay about 11·5 per cent. of our VAT yield to the EEC.

Excise duties are levied on the consumption of such goods as wine, beer, spirits, tobacco and hydrocarbon oils. At the moment, VAT and excise duties vary considerably between the member states. Italy, for example, has VAT rates that go up to 38 per cent. Italy relies more on VAT because it finds that it is difficult to collect income tax. The Commission's white paper makes it clear that these duties will have to be approximated.

What would this mean, in particular, for the United Kingdom? If we take cigarettes, with the exception of Denmark, we have the highest rates of duty. On beer, with the exception of Ireland, we have the highest duty. On wine, again with the exception of Ireland, we have by far the highest duty, while Italy and Germany have none at all, and France virtually none. The main effect of approximation on the United Kingdom would be to lower excise duties, to increase VAT and to end zero rating. It would revolutionise our system of indirect taxation, and in the opposite way to that which most of us would want. It would shift taxation from alchohol and tobacco and load it on to everything else, including, for the first time, food and children's clothing. To come into line with the weighted average of the other member states we would have to increase the burden of VAT as a fraction of gross domestic product by two fifths while reducing the duties on alcohol and tobacco by about a quarter. So £4 billion would be taken off excise duties and placed on VAT. The total of VAT plus excise duties as a fraction of GDP would have to be increased by 10 per cent. The total indirect taxation on the British people would be increased, and by methods we would deplore.

No other state in the EEC, apart from Ireland, currently applies such broad relief from VAT as a result of exemption and zero rating. Fuel, transport and most foodstuffs are currently zero-rated in Britain. All that would go. Is that what we want to have foisted on us by bodies not elected by us and not responsible to the British people? It is a monstrous proposition that we should even consider it. The Chancellor could throw away his Budget box, because he would not be allowed to use it any more.

[Mr. Ron Leighton]

What is supposed to be the purpose of this? It is allegedly to abolish border controls, the physical barriers between member states, to end the distortion of competition caused by zero rating and to save money on bureaucracy. But investigation shows that little of this is likely to happen. Would frontiers disappear? Would those delays and checks at, for example, Dover end? They would not, because border controls would still remain for immigration, drugs, counterfeit goods and public security. Also, the United Kingdom's only land frontier is with the Irish Republic and perhaps, in the future, with the Channel tunnel. So all travellers would have to be stopped once to establish whether they had come from the EEC. Let us be clear that the physical barriers will remain.

Will we save much money by approximation? Again, the answer is no. The Commission proposes that exports between member states should cease to be zero-rated and that importers, provided that they will sell the goods on, could reclaim from their Governments VAT levied on imports by the country of export. That would increase the tax revenue in the country of export and reduce it in the country of import. Here is the rub—to deal with this, a "clearing house" procedure would be established for transferring the revenue raised on exports in the country of export to the tax authorities in the country of import, exactly offsetting the repayment claimed from them by the importer. An entire new bureaucracy is to be set up. Traders would have to supply more information under that arrangement than they do at present, increasing the cost of record-keeping. The Dutch Government have already said that they would not trust a system which did not involve communication between tax authorities on each individual transaction. Such a clearing house would raise serious questions on the compatability of data processing systems of the member states.

Spain and Portugal have only just introduced VAT and Greece has not done so. Yet the clearing house would require much improved procedures for mutual administrative assistance between tax authorities to prevent abuse — indeed, for it to work at all. It will be a bureaucratic nightmare. As it will not remove frontiers or border controls, as it will not be cheaper to administer, as it will remove decisions on taxation of the British people from their elected representatives and increase indirect taxation in the United Kingdom, including placing VAT on food, fuel, books, newspapers, transport and children's clothes, why on earth should we even consider this gross interference in our domestic affairs? We should not. We should reject it with contempt by passing the amendments. All that the internal market has done so far is to lead to the export of British capital and employment. We should vote against it tonight.

Sir Anthony Meyer: We have had a far better debate tonight because of the timetable motion than any debate we have had up to now. Hon. Members who spoke stuck to the point. I shall vote against the amendment and I shall do so with far more conviction than when I voted against the amendment which was proposed in the previous debate by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), because I cannot rid myself of the sneaking suspicion that the Community must be put under some sort of pressure to limit the growth in its budget, if only because so much of the budget is spent on things on which the Community should not spend money, such as the inexorable growth in surpluses.

The amendment goes against what the Community should be doing because it is designed to make it more difficult for the Community to move towards the completion of the internal market. If the Community completes its internal market, it can do the things which it is especially well qualified to do. It can sustain a technologically advanced European industry and provide more jobs for the workers of Europe.

During the debate we have heard much from hon. Members on both sides of the House who oppose British membership of the European Community. I make it plain that my hon. Friend the Minister will come under every bit as much pressure from those Conservative Members who believe that we should go further as she will from those who do not wish to go as far as this. Those of us who wish to go further are much more representative of the Conservative party.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): Tonight we heard a slight horror story from the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton). If he were correct, it would be a horror story, but I am glad to say that he is not.

I shall concentrate on some of the facts because they should help to put hon. Members' minds at rest. First, the amendment seeks to delete from the scope of the Bill the new article 99 on the harmonisation of indirect taxation. Article 99 is not a commitment to tax harmonisation. Harmonisation is provided for only to the extent necessary for completing the internal market by 1992. It is more restrictive than the former article 99 because that provided for tax harmonisation,

"in the interest of the common market."

It follows, therefore, that there is no diminution of sovereignty involved in the amendments to the treaty.

I understand the anxieties of my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann), but they are much overplayed. Of course, there must be discussion on how far, if at all, the current differences in tax rates between member states must be reduced to complete the internal market, but no one can force the United Kingdom to increase its tax rates nor to reduce them because such decisions remain with our Chancellor of the Exchequer. Any change to the rules would require unanimity, and that is in no way changed by the Single European Act. Nor are hon. Members' powers to oppose the imposition of VAT on some items in any way diminished.

The rules that we already have—I am thinking here of the VAT directives — primarily establish, as far as possible, a common basis for the assessment of VAT from which most of the Community's resources derive. If everyone chose to operate the system under different rules, we should soon discover that some countries were paying more than was properly due and others were paying less.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Is it the Government's policy that the internal market can be completed within the timetable laid down, by 1992, without the removal of the zero rate of VAT?

Mrs. Chalker: I am sure that it is possible to complete the internal market by 1992 without the removal of zero rate VAT. My hon. Friend has, on previous occasions in the debates on the Bill, suggested that if the Council failed to agree on future harmonisation legislation and the Commission took the view that the United Kingdom was blocking progress it could take us to the European Court of Justice. I must put that misconception right. Article 99 lays down no obligation on individual member states. Under the article, it is for Council to adopt legislation to the extent necessary for the stated purposes. Once such legislation has been adopted by unanimity, a member state which, in the view of the Commission or that of other member states is not complying with that legislation, may then be taken to the court. No member state can be taken to court for refusing to agree on harmonising legislation. In that respect, too, the new article 99 is no different from the previous one.

Zero rating has been the substance of many hon. Members' contributions on 27 June and tonight. Zero rating in the United Kingdom is unaffected by the changes to article 99 which we are debating. Zero rates are expressly provided for under an existing directive which could be changed only with this country's agreement.

In his Budget speech in 1985, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Government did not intend to propose extensions to the VAT base during the lifetime of this Parliament. I think that will answer the point of my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton. We had further debate about zero rating because of the Commission's current challenge to the United Kingdom's interpretation of article 17 of the second VAT directive, which permits zero rating for,

"clearly defined social reasons and for the benefit of the final consumer".

The Commission is challenging our zero rates only to the extent that they do not fall clearly into that category. Most items which are zero-rated in the United Kingdom, for example, food, children's clothes and the supply of gas and electricity to the final consumer, are not affected. We are, in any case, fighting the case vigorously in the European Court. However, I must stress again that that challenge predates new article 99 and will not, in any way, be affected by it.

In earlier debates on the Bill, the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) asked about the Council's ad hoc group on the removal of fiscal barriers. The group made its final report to the Economic and Finance Council on 16 June. The Council has now asked the Commission to present, by 1 April 1987 and without prejudice to the Council's position or that of individual member states, detailed proposals on the rate structures, and on the accompanying systems which the Commission regards as necessary for the completion of the internal market. This will help member states to assess the Commission's approach regarding especially its wider budgetary, economic, social and industrial implications. It does not, however, imply that we shall necessarily do that. That matter must be discussed and will ultimately be resolved by unanimity.

It has also been suggested that we shall come under pressure from other member states to harmonise duties or VAT rates——

Mr. Spearing: We have.

Mrs. Chalker: It has been suggested specifically in the context of article 99. However, there is no suggestion that there should be complete harmonisation of either VAT or duty rates. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) said that it is hardly likely that other member states will want the harmonisation which was suggested by some hon. Members because it could require France to increase wine duty by more than 200 per cent., Germany beer duty by more than 200 per cent. and Greece its duty on spirits by more than 2,000 per cent. Those threats are wholly unlikely and unrealistic.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) referred to the letter which I wrote to him on 7 July in response to earlier debates on this matter in Committee. He referred to the word "shall" and the meaning of that word. He was right in everything that he said, but he did not go on to say that the Council has a duty to act, but only within the terms and discretion provided by the article. He should have added——

It being one hour after the House resolved itself into a Committee on the Bill, THE CHAIRMAN put the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to the Order [1 July].

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Tim Sainsbury and
Mr. Michael Neubert.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea West): On a point of order, Mr. Walker. I understand that within the last few minutes the Government have been defeated by 18 votes in the House of Lords on the Dockyard Services Bill. You will recollect, Mr. Walker, that in today's business statement that Bill was listed for consideration by the House on Friday 18 July. I ask you to use your good offices on behalf of the Opposition to ask the Leader of the House if he will come here tomorrow at 11 o'clock to make another business statement to the effect that the Dockyard Services Bill, in view of its now prime importance, will be accorded prime time on a normal day.

The Chairman: The right hon. Gentleman knows that we are in Committee and that the point he has raised is not a matter for the Committee or for me. No doubt what he has said will be communicated to the Leader of the House.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Further to that point of order. The Committee is aware of the importance of the Dockyard Services Bill and the effect that the resultant Act would have on our strategic ability to defend ourselves in time of war. May I ask you to prevail upon Mr. Speaker to consider today's business statement and to ask Mr. Speaker why a vital Bill like this that affects our strategic capabilities——

The Chairman: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are on a tight timetable and that a large number of hon. Members wish to speak on the business before the Committee. I cannot usefully add to what I have already said.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I beg to move, in page 1, line 13, after 'Communities)', insert
'but not Article 20 thereof'.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to consider amendments Nos. 23, 24 and 25.

Mr. Taylor: Article 20 refers to economic and monetary union. The purpose of the amendment is essentially to find out what article 20 is about and precisely to what it committed the Government. More important, we wanted to get the advice of the Minister clearly on the record. Our experience of getting European matters on the record is not a good one. Earlier today we had a discussion about the European Budget and we said that only a few months ago we had the clearest of assurances that budgetary control was now applied and that expenditure on agriculture would be contained and that the 1·4 per cent. VAT rate would last for several years. Those assurances have been proved to be utterly worthless, and budgetary control has not been practised. This issue is rather less emotive than expenditure and I ask my hon. Friend the Minister of State to say exactly what Great Britain is committing itself to under article 20. It could be argued that we are confronted with nonsensical verbiage which means nothing, or that we are committing ourselves to the convergence of monitary policies within the EEC. If we are committing ourselves to such policies, we are taking a big step. It is something that we should discuss and think about extremely clearly. As these matters have been set out in a treaty and are being set out in law, it is possible for the European Court, on an approach to the Commission, to interpret policies that are applied by the Council or member states.

8.30 pm

Is it a good thing for Britain to have harmonised our convergent economic policies with other members of the Common Market? We have a number of international relationships with OECD countries and we have commitments through the GATT to reduce tariffs. Is it good for Britain to enter an economic union that would be part of a political union? Is it in our interests to do so? I can well remember those who said when we joined the EEC that our entry would prove to be a recipe for more jobs, more prosperity and better trade with EEC countries. We have found, to the disappointment of many and the surprise of some, that far from achieving those goals we have entered a period of economic decline and mass unemployment. We have a horrific deficit with the EEC in our manufacturing trade of no less than £10,000 million. Is it in Britain's interests economically to join up more with a part of the world which is clearly in structural decline? Our trade figures show that we have a horrific deficit in manufacturing trade with the Common Market and a substantial surplus in manufacturing trade with the rest of the world, and the gap is growing. Unemployment figures throughout the world show that the areas of growth and job creation are far away from the EEC.

The second factor which should make us wonder whether it is a good thing to tie ourselves up in economic terms with the EEC and to harmonise economic policies is the structural decline of the area. Do we wish to become a peripheral part of it? I am probably more aware of these issues than most because I have spent most of my life as a politician in Scotland. For years the English have put vast sums into Scotland and Northern Ireland to try to equalise the ability to create jobs, welfare and prosperity. Despite all the endeavours of the English, Scotland has not enjoyed the same prosperity as that which has been present south of the border. That is not the result of a nasty plot on behalf of the English. The answer is that there is a natural economic movement and tendency for jobs, decision making and investment to move towards the centre of the market.

I find myself now in a prosperous part of the United Kingdom, but Southend does not have the grants, allowances and bonuses in terms of public expenditure that are received in the north. If we harmonise economic policies and make ourselves a greater part of economic and monitary union, I fear that Britain will become a peripheral part of an area of the world which is clearly in structural decline. It is an area that is suffering from mass unemployment, and it faces serious problems in competing with the growth areas of the world.

To what are we committing ourselves in the convergence of economic policies? We must bear in mind that the United Kingdom, especially under my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, has a particular attitude to economic affairs. Will we not be removing our freedom and the liberty of the House to determine Britain's economic policies if we agree to the harmonisation of economic policies within the EEC? We know that most of the countries of Europe have Governments that are far to the left of that of the United Kingdom. Other European countries are more interventionist in their ideas. We know that most European countries believe in the expansion of public expenditure. I ask the House seriously to consider whether the clause commits us, however gradually, to the cohesion, harmonisation or convergence of economic policies. Does it not remove a huge amount of the ability and freedom of the British Government to determine their own economic policies?

Another factor is the commitment to harmonise monetary policies. It might be helpful if the Government were to say at this stage exactly what their attitude is to the European monetary system and why they think that it is a good thing. I have been heartened by many of the things which the Prime Minister has said from time to time on the Common Market. I was delighted on 11 March to hear her say that we would fight against the supplementary budget of £1 billion that had been put forward by the Commission. I was disheartened today to learn that, instead of fighting hard, we had caved in within six hours and had agreed to another supplementary budget, and one which is larger by £1 billion than its predecessor. I was heartened, however, by what the Prime Minister said on the EMS on 10 June. She said:

[Mr. Taylor]

"At present there is no intention of joining the European monetary system. To do so would deny us an option that we have at present . . . We would be denied the option of taking the strain on the exchange rate. I do not think it right to deny us that option at present."—[Official Report, 10 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 171.]

In other words, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister thought that joining the EMS would remove the option of taking the strain of economic pressure on the exchange rate instead of on interest rates, fiscal policy or other forms of restriction. My right hon. Friend has always taken the view that we believe in a free exchange rate. On the other hand, other Ministers have said, especially Foreign Office Ministers, who appear not to have the same convergence as the Prime Minister and as the Government are hoping that we shall have with other Common Market countries, that Britain wants to join the EMS when the time is right. It would be helpful if we could have some indication from the Foreign Office, whose policies seem to be partially at variance with those of the Prime Minister, of the circumstances that it would deem to be appropriate for joining the EMS. Secondly, is it the Government's clear intention and desire to join the EMS when they think that the circumstances are right? If this is the position, perhaps the Foreign Office will explain the advantage to Britain of joining the EMS when the time is right.

If we were to join the EMS, the Government would be restricted severely in protecting the pound at times when it came under attack. If there were pressure on the pound, we would have to use the nasty devices that we employed when Britain had a fixed exchange rate. The choice of joining the EMS or not is rather similar to the choice of opting for a fixed or varied exchange rate. Like everything else, money has its market price. It helps our economy if we let the exchange rate take the strain instead of declaring an artificial rate for our currency. If we opt for an artificial rate, nasty things have to be done, such as taking unpleasant decisions on fiscal policy and interest rates. Freedom for our exchange rates, in so far as it is reasonably possible, assists in securing the freedom of our economy. I believe that most Conservatives believe that it is helpful.

There are a number of people—especially our friends in the CBI—who seem to regard the Common Market with a great deal of delight. The CBI has said that it would be good for Britain if we were to join the EMS as our entry would assist trade, but in a way that I cannot understand. It says that a fixed exchange rate with the rest of Europe would help us to export goods to Europe in a way that would not help other Europeans to export their goods into Britain. I cannot understand the logic of that argument. If we were to join the EMS, we would restrict severely the freedom of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The freedom that we have had since opting for a free exchange rate would be denied to us, which would present problems for a country which depends considerably on income from oil and oil resources.

I hope that the Government will explain exactly what we commit ourselves to in article 20. Is it nothing, just a general sentiment? Or is it the Government's clear intention to harmonise our economic and military policies with the EEC, as opposed to maintaining our alliance with the rest of the world?

I hope that the Government will bear in mind the possible danger to us in a harmonised economic and monetary policy of further problems with our relationship with the United States of America. I have been extremely worried at the way in which the crazy CAP is driving a wedge between Europe and the United States. Contact between Britain, Europe and the United States is absolutely vital and helps us towards an internationalist position, instead of being part of a narrow protectionist group surrounded by a high tariff wall.

All the signs are that the EEC is becoming more protectionist, not merely through tariffs, but through some of its non-tariff measures, voluntary restraint agreements and so on. A move towards economic and military union would be a step towards removing a great deal of freedom and liberty which we enjoy in economic policy, and towards protectionism in Europe which is, I believe, where we are going and what the intention is. I hope that the Government will say what is involved and that they will clarify their view on economic and military union.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): One of the most discomfiting things about these debates is that we in the Labour party often find ourselves agreeing with the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). Having disagreed with him on many occasions in the past, I am glad to have found one statement in his speech to disagree with. He talked about the huge sums being pumped into Scotland. That happened when he represented Glasgow, Cathcart because there was a Labour Government, but since he was, rightly, removed by the electorate the opposite has been happening and money is not being invested in areas such as Glasgow as it was under the Labour Government.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I am sorry that things are not so good in Scotland now as when I left it. Will the hon. Gentleman at least accept that, whereas England has tried to invest money in Scotland, Britain is committed to pouring large sums into the continent of Europe?

Mr. Foulkes: Again I partly agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is not since he left Scotland but since the Labour Government left office that Scotland has been disadvantaged.

It is clear to the House that the whole tenor of the Single European Act from the preamble, with its talk of moves towards European union and economic integration, to the extra powers and the competencies of the Community institutions, is towards a united states of Europe or a federal Europe. It is clear that that is happening because the parents of the Single European Act, the people who were behind its genesis, such as Spinelli and Dooge, are passionate enthusiasts for European integration. I do not doubt their sincerity, but we in the Labour party disagree with what they are trying to do and with the way in which they are trying to move the United Kingdom within Europe.

Only a few years ago I was told by hon. Members on both sides of the House that Spinelli was a fanatic and a wild dreamer, and that old men were entitled to their dreams and not to worry. I am sure that those comments sound better in Italian. In reality, a great deal of what Spinelli has been pressing for is now becoming a reality. When one considers the Spinelli treaty passed by the European Parliament on 14 February 1984, of the four main parts, three are now incorporated in the Single European Act and will soon become law.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does the hon. Gentleman recall that Spinelli is a Communist and always has been? What influence does he attach to that?

Mr. Foulkes: I would attach no importance whatever. Spinelli was an integrationist and was in favour——

Sir Anthony Meyer: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deakins: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it be in order to remind hon. Members that they have no need to give way to hon. Members who sought to truncate the debate by voting for the guillotine?

8.45 pm

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

The three Spinelli proposals incorporated in the Bill are important. They are for an institutional status for the European Council, greater majority voting and a central role for the European Parliament in the legislative process. Only the new system for appointing the Commission is not yet included, but no doubt we shall have pressure also to include that.

The Labour party argues that with the accession of Spain and Portugal there is in the EC a much wider disparity in wealth, income, interests and so on. Therefore, talk of tax convergence and economic integration is less relevant now than it has been at any time in the history of the Community. The original aims of the Community—to prevent a further war in western Europe, to integrate Germany after the destruction of the war, and to enable western Europe to deal on an equal basis with the superpowers—were laudable, but they have been lost in the detail of the specific, unnecessary harmonisation, whether it be of the size of eggs or the noise of lawnmowers, as it was so eloquently described earlier. As one of my hon. Friend's said, the move is no doubt so that lawnmowers can pass freely across borders in the EC. I am sure that many lawns cross borders, but when the noise levels of lawnmowers is harmonised it will undoubtedly be much easier for them to cross borders.

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Foulkes: The great ideals have been lost in detail and in the scandal of the cost of storage and of destruction of foodstuffs. Above all, with today's wider, looser Europe, joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system is also less relevant now than at any time previously. I certainly endorse the questions which the hon. Member for Southend, East asked the Minister, and I hope that we shall receive clear answers.

We in the Labour party support European co-operation, but European co-operation between independent nations and parliaments, not between parts of a united states of Europe. We support the use of a range of different mechanisms for co-operation. One forgets the good job being done, for example, by the Council of Europe and its Committees. We are aware that technical co-operation can take place beyond the framework of the Community—for example, the European airbus, which had nothing to do with Community institutions. Political co-operation takes place within the Community on issues which include other countries, and in some cases some Community countries reserve their position.

We support the amendment and reject the move towards closer economic integration and convergence in Europe. We unequivocally oppose the move towards a European super state or a united states of Europe.

Mr. Budgen: I so often and usually completely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that I want to make only one point and to explain where I disagree with what he said. In his opening remarks he asked whether Europe was good for Britain, and talked about Europe being an area in structural decline. He made what seemed to be an essentially materialistic argument.

I dislike the idea of economic convergence, because I believe that a nation is perfectly entitled to choose policies and laws which may exhort objectives which are not materialistic. For the sake of argument, a nation is perfectly entitled, if it wishes, to say that a quarter of its population may be Roman Catholic priests. Perhaps that was the position at one stage in Spain. A nation is perfectly entitled, if it wishes, to educate a large number of people in the classics. That may well not have an immediate effect upon its GNP. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) was arguing as if there were some obviously agreed priorities in every nation state that they would subvert all other objectives to the improvement of their wealth and riches.

I object to the idea of economic convergence because of the second argument that my hon. Friend put forward. The British people are perfectly entitled to have the sort of economy that suits their character. In my opinion, they should be able to have that sort of economy without the disadvantage of being constantly barracked and harassed by their politicians telling them to work harder or being exhorted by the Europeans to become more European minded. Of course, it is for the politicians to explain to them that if they happen to like striking, for example, or if they happen to like sleeping in hay fields during the summer they are unlikely, at the same time, to be producing consumer goods. We do not want to suggest at any time that the sole purpose of a modern state is to increase wealth, more especially to increase taxable wealth. The people of any state always have a diversity of objectives and they show it in a variety of inconsistent but none the less important ways. One of the great vulgarities of modern thought and the distorted idealism of the European concept is the belief that we are all exclusively materialistic beings.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: In this debate we are arguing and eventually voting for or against the principle of monetary union. If I am asked how I know that, my answer is because it says so. By article 20 we are writing into the law and the treaty

> "Chapter I,
> Co-operation in Economic and Monetary policy (Economic and Monetary Union)"

Note the brackets. It begins:

> "In order to ensure the convergence of economic and monetary policies which is necessary".

There is nothing which comes nearer to sovereignty, self-government or what politics is about than control of money. From the beginning of time it has been the attribute of sovereigns that they made or declared money. Their image and superscription was found upon it. That is what made it money. In our day, supremely the subject in politics about which we dispute, debate and vote between elections is about how the control of money shall be exercised and how the state to which we belong shall use the power of the modern state to make, or sometimes to unmake, money.

There are signs that a general election has been discerned on the horizon by the parties in the House. One of the principal issues, if not the principal issue, between the parties which will be put to the electorate is alternative ways in which the British state ought to use the money-making power. If there is to be monetary union, that decision is to be taken away from the British people. It is no longer to be a subject of politics in this country. It is a subject which will be decided by the general and common authorities of a monetary union. Consequently, there is nothing more directly and clearly inimical to the political process in this country than the professed intention to enter into a monetary union. We are professing that intention by what we do in this article and by an extraordinary procedure. It was your decision, Mr. Walker, that amendment Nos. 23 and 25 should be debated with amendment 9 by the extraordinary procedure of writing a preamble into the law of this country. The preamble uses important words. It states:

"Moved by the will . . . to transform relations . . . into a European Union."

It goes on:

"Whereas at their Conference . . . the heads of State . . . approved the objective of a progressive realisation of Economic and Monetary Union."

It is all very well, and it will no doubt happen, for the Minister to tell us from the Dispatch Box to take no notice. She will say that it is not binding, that it is the preamble and that it is just words and has no effect. However, that is not what we will be told when it becomes an Act. That is not what we shall be told when steps are taken and enforced upon us, possibly by a guillotine in due course, towards economic and monetary union. We shall be told "In 1986 the House of Commons said so. The House of Commons embodied those words in an Act of Parliament." That is not nothing. After all, this Government make agreements with foreign powers about the government of the United Kingdom under which they undertake to make determined efforts to come to agreement with those foreign Governments on the internal affairs of the United Kingdom. Are we to be told that those words will never be quoted against us in future and that we shall never be told that we approved those objectives solemnly and put them on the statute book of this country by writing the words of a preamble into an Act of Parliament?

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Powell: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, because he voted against the guillotine.

Mr. Cash: Would the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is not simply a question of how that matter will be interpreted in our own court but, by virtue of the European Communities Act 1972, it is also a question of it being interpreted by the European Court of Justice and its methods of interpretation take us into a completely new dimension? The question that the right hon. Gentleman is putting to the House will be interpreted by the court further and toward the notion of European union which could invoke federalism in due course.

Mr. Powell: I am wholly in agreement with the hon. Gentleman. He has performed a service to the debate by emphasising that point. We are not doing nothing by this legislation. We are doing something which is significant. It is something which will be quoted against us in future and to which we will be held, if not by future Governments of this country, by authorities external to this country with which we are making a new compact. It is a renunciation of the rights, the sovereignty and the political entity of the people of this country, and we ought not to be engaged in it.

Mr. Spearing: I reiterate precisely what the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) has said. In respect of the authority of other courts I shall quote the memorandum from the Foreign Office in appendix A to the report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. It talks about the preamble to the treaty and says:

"It typically recites the purposes of the Treaty and the background against which agreement was reached. Its principal significance is as part of the context of the Treaty for the purposes of its interpretation."

That is what the European Court will rest on if the British Government and this Parliament is taken to court for not moving towards economic and monetary union which is clearly spelt out in the preamble to the treaty and in article 20, which we now wish to delete. I shall take it further than the right hon. Member for South Down. I am sure that he will agree that economic and monetary union requires an authority to exercise the policy in respect of money and economics throughout the area of the union. At the moment, that is exercised, alternately perhaps, by the Bank of England, the Treasury and the House—a sort of internal triangle of economic and monetary policy. What would it be if that policy and the authority were transferred to European institutions? Article 20 spells it out clearly in paragraph 2, which states:

"Insofar as further development in the field of economic and monetary policy necessitates institutional changes, the provisions of Article 236 shall be applicable."

9 pm

That means that any member Government can propose amendments to the treaty. The paragraph goes on:

"The Monetary Committee and the Committee of Governors of the Central Banks shall also be consulted regarding institutional changes in the monetary area."

I repeat:

"the Committee of Governors of the Central Banks".

Whether this country joins the European monetary system, which is connected to, but separate from, European monetary union, the latter implies not only a central monetary authority, but one that decides or influences such matters as the interest rate and exchange rate policy. In respect of exchange rates, article 20, or another article, changes article 70 of the treaty of Rome, paragraph 1 of which states:

"The Commission shall propose to the Council measures for the progressive co-ordination of the exchange policies of Member States in respect of the movement of capital between those States and third countries. For this purpose the Council shall issue directives, acting unanimously. It shall endeavour to obtain the highest possible degree of liberalisation."

That is how article 70 stands, but the Single European Act changes the unanimous provision to one of qualified majority. In other words, it means that the control of our own exchange policies — I know that the present Government do not have a policy in that direction, but future Governments might — will no longer be in the hands of the British Government and of Her Majesty's Treasury should the House so wish and should the majority of the electorate so wish. It will be in the hands of authorities elsewhere. I leave hon. Members to suspect or guess who will be the most influential member of the Committee of Governors of the Central Banks. Of course, it will be the most influential currency at the time when decisions have to be made. I do not have to tell hon. Members that the most stable and strongest international currency inside the EEC is the deutschmark. I think that is generally agreed.

The proposals implicit in the so-called European common Act will impel this country into an economic and monetary union where central authority is basic to its thesis, and where a new economic imperialism will depend upon this country in just as sure a way as a new economic imperialism made itself felt across the border, as evinced in the exchanges between my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) and the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). I believe that Conservative Members who are not in the Chamber do not know what the amendment is about. If they did, they would not vote against it.

Mrs. Chalker: Several hon. Members have suggested during the debate that the Single European Act embodies new commitments to economic and monetary union, and to European union. The first thing that I must say is that it does not. The term "economic and monetary union" is not a new concept, yet tonight anybody would have thought that it was. Let me remind the Committee that it has been accepted by every British Government since we joined the Community. For instance, it was a Labour Government who subscribed to the European Council's statement in November 1976 that "the achievement of economic and monetary union is basic to the consolidation of Community solidarity and the establishment of European Union."

Those may not have been words that a Conservative Government would have used, but they were used by a Labour Government, with the support of many Opposition Members, some of whom may not be here tonight.

Some of my hon. Friends said that monetary co-operation between member states was a new concept, a new idea. Member states already have an obligation to co-ordinate their economic policies under article 105 of the treaty of Rome. That has been with us since 1972. The references to monetary co-operation in the Single European Act are defined as being "in accordance with the objectives of Article 104."

No new obligations are involved.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Then why have it?

Mrs. Chalker: It is there for a good reason. It brings together all the parts that, in the past, we wanted to be brought together. It is nothing new. The way in which it is drafted carries no new implication—for instance, that all member states, including the United Kingdom, should participate fully in the exchange rate mechanism. That is not contained in the article. The point is that the new articles merely formalise the existing position.

Mr. Spearing: What about the preamble?

Mrs. Chalker: I shall turn to the preamble in a moment. The other thing that the article does not do is to open the door to any new proposals that we would be forced to accept against our better judgment. I know that many of my hon. Friends have been concerned about that. However, they seem to have forgotten that the Commission already has the right, under article 235, to make proposals in the monetary sphere. For instance, the regulations setting up the ecu were adopted under article 235. In such cases, a unanimous Council decision has been required and will continue to be required.

Moreover, the Single European Act stipulates that any further institutional developments in the field of economic and monetary policy will be governed by article 236. That means that they must be agreed by all member states and approved by their national Parliaments. In other words, they must be brought forward in a treaty form and have the approval of the Parliament concerned as well as the other 11 national Parliaments.

Mr. Spearing: The Europeans as well?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman, who spoke at considerable length in our earlier debates, tempts me to go over old ground. For the sake of those who asked questions tonight, and because only a short time is available, I shall not do so.

I turn to the broader question of European union that a couple of my hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) raised. As is customary, the preamble recalls existing commitments, such as the treaty of Rome, which lays the foundations of an ever closer union among the peoples of Europe. The Stuttgart solemn declaration identifies union as being achieved by "deepening and broadening the scope of European activities so that they coherently cover, albeit on a variety of legal bases, a growing proportion of member states' mutual relations and of their external relations."

That means practical steps, not vague constitutional concepts. That is why article 1 of the Single European Act, which has been debated previously, refers to "making concrete progress towards European unity."

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mrs. Chalker: If my hon. Friend is quick——

Mr. Marlow: I shall not even thank my hon. Friend for giving way. Can my hon. Friend tell us what significance the preamble will have in the eyes and the judgments of the European Court of Justice?

Mrs. Chalker: We are to have a debate on that subject later tonight. My hon. Friend already knows that the preamble to the treaty is an integral part of it. It does not confer rights or obligations.

Mr. Spearing: Oh yes, it does.

Mrs. Chalker: It does not. The legal status of the preamble is as I have already defined it. No doubt I shall do so again. The Single European Act does not represent what the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) suggested — a step towards a united states of Europe. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary told the House quite clearly on 23 April that we are not talking about the declaration or proclamation of a united states of Europe, or about vague political or legal goals. We are talking about practical steps towards the unity that is essential if Europe is to maintain and enhance its economic and political position in a harshly competitive world. I should have thought that some hon. Members would be pleased that, instead of the ill-defined notion of European union which had been discussed in the past, we now have a clear statement of what we are talking about. It is practical co-operation of the kind that we and our predecessors have always advocated. As far back as 1961, the then Prime Minister, now Lord Stockton, told the House:

[Mrs. Chalker]

"In this modern world the tendency towards larger groups of nations acting together in the common interest leads to greater unity and thus adds to our strength in the struggle for freedom.

I believe that it is both our duty and our interest to contribute towards that strength by securing the closest possible unity within Europe."—[Official Report, 31 July 1961; Vol. 645, c. 928.]

Those words were fully accepted by the House. They were backed up in 1966 by the then Prime Minister, now Lord Wilson, when he said:

"We are talking about Britain's joining the Community and joining in the great drive towards European unity which I am now convinced more than ever is possible and within our grasp."—[Official Report, 8 May 1967; Vol. 746, c. 1093.]

Mr. Deakins: He did not tell the British people that.

Mrs. Chalker: That is what he said in the House, which is well reported. If that is not telling the British people——

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): It does not follow that, because someone has a certain job, his words are accepted.

Mrs. Chalker: It may not be accepted by my hon. Friend—I fully accept that—but it has been by hon. Members in debate after debate under Governments of both complexions.

A number of hon. Members have suggested that the new treaty text would oblige sterling to join the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS. That, too, is a misconception. Although the exchange rate mechanism has played a valuable role in helping participating countries with anti-inflationary policies, the United Kingdom has substantially reduced inflation while remaining outside the system. The Government have repeatedly made it clear that the question of membership is kept under review but the balance of economic arguments is not a simple one. No doubt, the decision will be taken by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But that is not a matter for the moment. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said, at present there is no intention of joining. She did not rule it out. It may, at some stage in the future, be right that we should join that system.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) was concerned about article 20 and what it meant. The article brings together the existing position in a formalised way. Any institutional change would require treaty amendment and the approval of this and every other national Parliament. My hon. Friend went on to ask about the proposed treaty amendments. They merely refer to existing arrangements and previous statements. They do no more than that. I genuinely do not believe that my hon. Friend's concerns are well founded. He wants to change provisions that the House of Commons decided many years gone by, in 1972 and in our debates since. My hon. Friend is simply seeking to turn back the clock on this decision made long ago.

We actively participate in the EMS and we have discussions on its future development. We deposit 20 per cent. of our gold and dollar reserves in the European monetary co-operation fund. That will not suddenly change. We support efforts to strengthen the EMS further, but we will not take the decisions about which my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East is concerned without a full and rigorous analysis of what is required for the best for this country. That is——

It being two hours after the House resolved itself into a Committee on the Bill, THE CHAIRMAN put the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Michael Neubert and
Mr. Francis Maude.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I beg to move amendment No. 11 in page 1, line 13, after 'Communities)', insert
'but not paragraph 2 of revised Article 130R in Article 25 thereof'.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. James Lamond): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 21 in page 1, line 13, after 'Communities)', insert
'but not Article 25 thereof'.

Mr. Taylor: The Minister, when replying to the last group of amendments, gave the impression, perhaps inadvertently, that she was replying to the speech that she thought I would make rather than the speech I actually made. For that reason I want to be absolutely precise about what I say on amendment No. 11.

This amendment relates to article 25 of the Single European Act which extends the competence of the Common Market to issues affecting the environment. Article 25 states what action would be taken and in which areas, and certain principles are established as being acceptable for all member states. It further states when the Community would take action which it considers would be better administered at Community level than by individual member states.

Paragraph 2 of the article states:

"Action by the Community relating to the environment shall be based on the principles that preventive action should be taken, that environmental damage should as a priority be rectified at source, and that the polluter should pay."

My first question to the Minister is whether it is now the policy of Her Majesty's Government that the polluter should pay. That is a simple and precise question. As the Government have agreed to this treaty, do they now take the view, as stated in the Act, that the polluter should pay?

I should like to know the answer because I am worried about my area of Essex and the enormous problems created for health and the environment by nitrate pollution of the public water supplies. We are all aware of the great concern that has been expressed both in the World Health Organisation and in the European Community about the possible dangers to health posed by nitrate pollution. The World Health Organisation has decided that a level of 50 ml per litre in the public water supplies is the maximum acceptable level. The Common Market has now made that a statutory level and states that all member states should insist on a 50 ml maximum in water supplies.

My understanding is that, until now, the Government have adopted the clear policy that the water consumer rather than the polluter should pay for the pollution. Various water authorities, including Anglian Water, have announced enormous capital programmes which are necessary to bring nitrate pollution down to the acceptable level. The Government have given exemptions on various grounds to some authorities for not bringing the nitrates down to the acceptable level. The fact is that water boards are spending a great deal of money simply to reduce the nitrate level in public water supplies.

We all know who causes the pollution. There is a great deal of natural pollution, but in the areas where there is a special problem the nitrate pollution comes directly from the activities of firms such as ICI which buy large expensive advertisements in the national press to tell us that nitrate fertilisers are good for the country. They are good in the sense that they greatly increase cereal production, but that is not particularly good when the Common Market is already having to spend £150 million every week for dumping surplus foods, largely cereals.

9.30 pm

Until now, my understanding has always been that while farmers create the pollution by putting nitrates into the public water supplies, it is the water consumer who pays to take them out. That has always seemed to be rather unjust but it is interesting that that was the Government's clear policy and, naturally, as a Conservative Member of Parliament I feel a general obligation at least to give some support to the views of my party. On the other hand, the Government now seem to be changing their policy because they have accepted the Single European Act which clearly states that the polluter should pay. I simply want to know whether the Government have changed their policy, and, if so, shall we now insist that the polluters should pay for the pollution that they create?

Secondly, as this is now legislation which can be interpreted by the European Court of Justice, once the public water supplies have been privatised, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment tells us will take place after the next election — presumably if there is a Conservative Government, although I am far from clear whether a Social Democrat controlled Government would support the privatisation of public water supplies—could a privatised water board now go to the European Court to demand that the cost of reducing nitrate pollution should be borne by the polluters?

So long as that is simply a policy, there is not much that one can do in relation to the European Court, but as this is now part of a treaty which can be interpreted by the European Court, would it be open to the privatised water boards, or, indeed, to aggrieved water ratepayers, to go to the European Court to insist that that policy as set out in paragraph 2 should be applied?

Finally, will my hon. Friend the Minister give us some idea of the latest estimate of the cost in capital and revenue to the water boards of reducing nitrate levels in accordance with the EEC directive? That is not one of those silly questions which people bring up because they want to make a fuss. We all know that nitrate pollution is serious. It has been identified by the World Health Organisation as a serious potential health hazard. We know that even in Britain our medical officers of health have to be advised if pollution goes above 50 ml per litre. We know that in Britain if nitrate pollution goes above 100 ml medical officers of health have to supply bottled water to babies to avoid their possible death. Therefore, it is a serious matter. Under this article there could be a complete change and I want to know how it will come about.

Paragraph 4 states that the Community shall take action where the objectives can be better attained at Community level than by individual member states. The EEC has already passed a nitrate regulation which says that no member state can permit, unless there is a special exemption, more than 50 ml. Therefore, it seems that the decision has already been taken by the EEC that this matter is better dealt with at Community level than by individual member states.

But for other issues, who decides what is better dealt with at Community level? Is it done by majority vote or by unanimity? I hope that the Minister can give me answers to those questions. They are important and could be significant not only for the Treasury and for water boards, but also for the water ratepayers and all those concerned with public health in our nation.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): I will not go into the detail that the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) did, but I will talk about the general principle of whether new competences and powers should be given to the European Community and written into the powers of the Community. We believe that there should not be new competences and powers because in our view the existing competences and powers are not fully used by the Community. Because in some cases the powers are exercised de facto by the Community, it is suggested that they should be written in, but we do not understand why that is necessary. In certain areas, such as research and development and technology, co-operation does not need to be constrained by the institutional framework that the Community has. One notable example that I gave earlier, to which I am sure the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) will be referring, is the European airbus. We think that that kind of voluntary co-operation is better than forcing every country of the 12 to co-operate.

We are also concerned that, as de facto competences become legalised, there will be pressure for more competences, and this will lead to an escalation of the powers of the Community. In our view, further discussion is needed about the levels at which powers should be exercised, as the hon. Member for Southend, East said. One of the new levels at which certain powers will be exercised soon after the general election is the Scottish assembly.

Finally, we are concerned that one of the areas where it is proposed that these extra competences should be legalised is research and development, and here the British Government have been instrumental in making cuts in the budget. With regard to suggestions that there should be greater co-operation in research and development, for example, EUREKA and ESPRIT — I can never pronounce these acronyms properly because they do not really have a proper pronounciation, and I think that we should agree to have a free market in the pronounciation of acronyms—the Government have been instrumental in cutting the money available. Budget cuts have taken place to make way for the burgeoning expenditure in agriculture.

For all those reasons, we are against the extension of powers and competences and the legalisation of competences currently undertaken by the European Community.

Mr. Bill Walker: Article 25 is an important and serious one. As you will be aware, Mr. Lamond, the water authorities of Scotland are controlled by the regional councils. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) has properly asked the Minister how the polluter will be made to pay, and who will go to the trouble of finding out who the polluters are. When nitrates get into the public water supply, the source is usually farmers. As farmers, we are aware — I represent a very large agricultural constituency — that farmers using nitrates have been encouraged by the Government to introduce a voluntary code.

What happens when scares arise as a result of measurements laid down by Europeans was shown by what happened with the lambs. Problems, scaremongering, a lack of confidence and difficulties in agricultural communities were all created. Outside the areas affected directly, a lack of confidence was felt. When an area is judged to have problems, finding out who the polluters are presents enormous problems.

If we were leaving this even to some ghastly assembly that we shall never have in Edinburgh——

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The hon. Gentleman will not be there.

Mr. Walker: I have no wish ever to be there, and I doubt whether either the hon. Gentleman or I will see it in our lifetimes. However, if we want to dwell on these flights of fancy, it is important to examine them. The important thing is, as I understod it, that under article 25, the European Community will be given powers. As a result, the new assembly, if it ever comes to pass, will not be able to do anything anyway. This is just a diversion.

This is a fundamental change to the way in which we have handled such problems, certainly in Scotland. I have never known farmers being harassed or brought before any European court on this matter. There was a problem of pollution in the local water supplies, and this has duly been resolved by a voluntary agreement. I do not have to remind my hon. Friend the Minister that water is an important ingredient of our most famous export, and without the water we would not have the famous export.

Mr. Foulkes: Haggis.

Mr. Walker: Haggis may be a famous export for Ayrshire, but that is not the case in the highlands of Scotland. The hon. Gentleman knows that my constituency is in the highlands of Scotland; therefore, I am talking about whisky.

There is an interest in matters affecting pollution and what it may do, but the important thing is whether we are prepared to give these extra powers to the Community, which will be further away from the source of pollution, which it may fail to understand. There is a worry, based on the recent experience of what happened with lambs, that we may be agreeing to a measure that will give us enormous confidence problems, and which would be better dealt with locally.

Sir Anthony Meyer: The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) had a terrible nightmare. He dreamt that he was addressing the House as a Socialist, arguing that matters of international co-operation are things with which Governments should not concern themselves, but should be left entirely to private enterprise, and that pollution was something best dealt with by national Governments. He woke up in the middle and found that he was making that speech.

It is a pleasure for once to find myself in complete agreement with my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), and the powerful speech that he made arguing that article 25 of the treaty is essential if we are to have effective anti-pollution measures. It is legitimate to argue, as many hon. Members have, that there are a great many matters with which the European Community concerns itself that could be equally well dealt with by national Governments. However, one cannot possibly argue that about environmental pollution, which knows no frontiers.

Mr. Foulkes: Does that not equally apply to co-operation with countries in Scandinavia or eastern Europe, or with other non-member states of the Economic Community? I was talking about co-operation between countries on this issue and not necessarily restricting it to only 12 countries dealing with the problem. I am sure the hon. Gentleman agrees that environmental pollution does not stop at the boundaries of the European Community. The Norwegians and the Swedes are just as concerned as we are about acid rain and other pollutants.

Sir Anthony Meyer: I do not disagree for one minute with the hon. Gentleman, but if we say that we cannot co-operate effectively within the European Community, a fortiori we shall be unable to co-operate with countries outside it. The Community provides a basis for effective co-operation. If there is any field in which co-operation has to be made effective, it is precisely in the area of environmental pollution. Acid rain pollution of rivers and seas knows no national barriers and makes a mockery of our claim to absolute national sovereignty and of all the piffle about being able to control everything completely from this Chamber. If there is any argument that is unanswerable, it is that which is based on this article. I do not see how anybody can possibly accept this amendment.

9.45 pm

Mrs. Chalker: We have had an unusually speedy debate on this article and amendment No. 11, and I shall try to answer the concerns that rightly were expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). I understand his anxieties. On 14 May 1986 he asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold), a question about nitrates. She said:

> The polluter pays principle is not formally incorporated into United Kingdom law, although it is an aim of Government policy that the principle should be observed. This is reflected, for example, in parts of the Control of Pollution Act 1974. The Government also support the 1972 OECD and 1975 EC recommendations on the PPP,"— the polluter pays principle—

> "but these are not legally binding; nor do they require payment where discharges are within the level acceptable to the control authority."

My hon. Friend went on to say in her answer that

> "nitrate enters public water supplies from a variety of sources".—[Official Report, 14 May 1986; Vol. 97, c. 490.]

That is true. It is also true that nitrate builds up over a number of years. For that reason, we have not made the polluter pays principle an aim of Government policy and it is not formally included in United Kingdom law. The Bill will not change that policy.

Paragraph 2 of the proposed new article 130(R) refers to "action by the Community", not by individual member states.

My hon. Friend asked about the latest estimate of capital and revenue costs to the water boards of reducing nitrate levels in accordance with the EEC drinking water directive. We should want to do this, anyway, but this worthy item of public expenditure amounts to a capital cost of £50 million and a revenue cost of £5 million. However, the drinking water directive allows a derogation if there is no threat to public health. Such derogations would be issued only if they were based on medical advice.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Would it be convenient for the hon. Lady to deal at this point with a difficulty that exercises me and certain other right hon. and hon. Members? Effectively we are dealing with section 2(1) of the European Communities Act 1972. We are extending the treaties that are referred to in that section, which deals with the > "rights, powers, liabilities, obligations and restrictions from time to time created or arising by or under the Treaties".

What are the rights, etcetera, which will be added to those provisions by the inclusion of this provision which is the subject of the amendment? There must be some effect from the inclusion of this article in the new treaty which is being written into section 2 of the 1972 Act.

Mrs. Chalker: I have written down most carefully the point made by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), and I shall come to it in a moment. These general questions form the background to exactly the problems about which the right hon. Gentleman is anxious. There are principles enshrined in article 25, but they are no more than guidelines for the Council of Ministers and they are included in the environmental action programmes which have so far guided Community action on the environment.

[Mrs. Chalker]

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East sought to find out if there was anything more than the guidelines to which we already adhere. It is quite clear that Community action on the environment is well established. As my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) said, pollution knows no boundaries. We have adopted numerous instruments, especially on water quality and atmospheric pollution, and we have used article 235 of the treaty of Rome to do that.

The new treaty articles, about which the right hon. Member for South Down spoke, bring the treaty of Rome up to date with practice and give a firm basis for the new Community measures. The right hon. Gentleman asked what rights would be added to the existing provisions. The principles that have been laid down are those which we already have in our domestic legislation. Preventive action is better than retrospective action, and action by the Community has to take account of the differing environmental conditions in the various regions. We may not all be equally affected by the way in which pollution travels.

We go further on pollution measures because we say that the potential costs as well as the benefits must be weighed up before action is taken. The Community should act only to the extent to which environmental objectives can be better attained at Community level than at the level of individual member states. That is exactly the policy we seek to follow.

Mr. Marlow: Does that mean that at no stage will the Community have any impact as to the quality of drinking water that comes out of taps in the United Kingdom?

Mrs. Chalker: It cannot. We have never tried to force on another country the principles that I have outlined. Unanimity applies here, and in that connection my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East asked a question about paragraph 4 of article 130(R). Unanimity applies and if there were to be a proposition to set a certain figure with which Britain did not agree we would not have to accept it. I hope that answers the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow).

Mr. Marlow: In terms of article 130(R), would it be proper for the Commission to put such a proposal forward anyway?

Mrs. Chalker: Under the treaty, the Commission could put forward a proposal, but we are protected by the unanimity rule. The Commission is unlikely to do anything like that because we have worked in tandem with it as partners and it would not put forward something that other partners as well as ourselves were not prepared to have. If we were not prepared to have it, we would not accept it and our partners could do likewise and it would fall.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: The Minister is being helpful in giving us the answers to our questions. Is she saying that, apart from setting out some general principles, there is nothing in this at all? Does it mean that there is no way that a water board could use this if it thought that the Government were not applying the polluter pays policy? Is this just a set of general principles which do not really help anyone in particular?

Mrs. Chalker: I shall come to my hon. Friend's point about the water boards in a moment. We have sought to make sure that we have sound principles for Community environmental action, if that is what is needed, because pollution knows no boundaries. We are after the best possible means of tackling the environmental problems. The acceptance of amendment No. 11 would change things, and I hope that hon. Members will realise that that is not necessary in following through the policy that has been adopted by the Government. Having listened to the speeches of hon. Members, I have concluded that they support our policy. Community action will be taken only when it is more appropriate than action at state level. The cost-benefit analysis has to be taken into account as well as scientific evidence and regional differences.

I am well aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East is anxious about the future of water boards. His anxiety is shared by many hon. Members and by many outside the House. My hon. Friend is anxious to know whether a water board will be prevented from improving its quality of supply. There is nothing in the article to prevent a board doing that. If my hon. Friend is anxious also, as I believe him to be, that a water board will feel that it is being asked to do too much, I remind him of the answer which my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold), the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, gave him on 14 May. She spelt out clearly the principles that are applied. In general terms, the water board problem, if that is the appropriate term, relates to farmers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) has talked about farmers, and the principle that the polluter pays is being observed by farmers, who incur costs or lose revenue. They follow the requirements of the code of good agricultural practice so as to reduce the risk of nitrate pollution, which is one of the issues that is considered by the nitrate co-ordination group. That is something that will continue irrespective of article 130(R).

The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) asked about new competences. We are continuing with the principles that we have been following, but putting them together in a way which makes sense. The Community is involved only if a policy can be pursued more effectively at a Community level than by the individual state.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Minister confirm which body will decide whether a policy is better pursued by the Community than by the individual country?

Mrs. Chalker: The Council of Ministers will decide, and by unanimity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East asked about privatised water boards and wanted to know specifically whether an aggrieved privatised water board or an aggrieved water ratepayer could go to the European Court and demand that the cost of reducing the nitrate pollution be borne by the polluters. That is excluded by second paragraph of article 130(R) of the treaty of Rome, which states,

"Action by the Community relating to the environment shall"

be based on the principle

"that the polluter should pay."

Community action, therefore, should take account of this principle. If it does not, there will be the potential for a member state, or any of the institutions of the Community, to apply for judicial review by the European Court of Justice. The paragraph itself would not provide a basis for action by a national, meaning an individual, against the polluter. That was the essence of my hon. Friend's question.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: But I am disappointed.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand that my hon. Friend is disappointed, but perhaps we are talking about something that will apply in future. As an island, Britain is rather less affected than many of the mainland countries within Europe.

We would be ill advised to agree to the amendment. The polluter pays principle gives us a guideline. But because of time, as in the case of the filtration of nitrates through the soil, it may simply not be possible. Therefore, the principle is there, but the legal requirement is not in the Bill.

The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, strangely, got on to the subject of Community expenditure on research and development. I say "strangely", because it did not quite fit in with other comments that have been made. He would be the first to complain if we allowed Community expenditure to rise without constraint and due consideration.

10 pm

It is not a question of cutting Community expenditure on research and development. The European Council agreed to a gradual increase in expenditure on research and development which is what happens under the new framework programme, about which my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology spoke last week. That new framework programme is under discussion and it will apply to research and development which relates specifically to the implementation of ideas in a commercial manner. We want to ensure that we can get the best possible outcome in production and marketing terms from the resources put into research and development, even if they start off at a basic level.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Sir Paul. I expect I am wholly wrong, but is it not normal for the debate to conclude at 10 o'clock unless some other measures are taken?

The Second Deputy Chairman (Sir Paul Dean): I remind the Committee that in this case the 10 o'clock business motion does not apply because we are working on a guillotine motion which the House agreed some days ago.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall finish quickly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is obviously anxious that I should. I was seeking to answer questions raised during the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North seemed to think that there was a fundamental change in our approach. I hope that what I have said makes it clear that there is no fundamental change. I have already answered the questions about farmers being forced to pay.

It is important that we should work together to reduce pollution, as we are doing, and that we should take on at Community level only those matters which know no boundaries. We should certainly act, as indeed we are, to reduce pollution where it occurs within each member state. I ask the House to reject the amendment.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: As there is obviously nothing in this particular article and as it does not do any good to any-one but simply sets out a pile of general principles, if the House is agreeable, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Mr. Deakins: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in clause 1, page 1, line 13, after 'Communities)', insert 'but not Article 10 thereof'.

The amendment deals with the increased powers to be conferred on the Commission by the Council. It deals with article 10 of the Single European Act and relates to an amendment to article 145 of the treaty of Rome. The important point about article 10 is that it imposes a duty on the Council to confer extra powers on the Commission which are not at present mentioned in article 145 of the basic treaty.

The Commission's powers are at present laid down in articles 155 to 162 of the treaty of Rome. I draw the Committee's attention particularly to articles 155 and 162 which make it perfectly clear that the Commission is basically a bureaucratic body — I do not say that pejoratively — which is the servant of the Council but nevertheless has rights and can take initiatives to put proposals to the Council on any matters arising from the treaties.

If that were all I knew about the Commission, perhaps I would not be moving the amendment tonight. In 1985 the Commission started getting rather big for its boots. The House will recall that at the time of the agricultural price review the West German Government imposed a veto under the Luxembourg compromise on a fall in cereal prices. The outcome—I use the words of the Minister's predecessor—was as follows:

"The Commission has said that in the absence of an agreement on cereal prices it is taking certain administrative actions on the basis of a 1·8 per cent. reduction in cereal prices. Those proposals could be changed if a decision is reached by the Council of Ministers on a different level of reduction." — [Official Report, 20 June 1985; Vol. 81, c. 467.]

The important point is that the Commission, the servant of the Council, was arrogating to itself, for the first time since 1957, the power to overrule a national veto in the Council of Ministers. It did overrule that veto and there was not a peep out of any of the national Governments, including our own. In my opinion, it exercised that power illegally and, had the British Government had the guts to take the Commission to the European Court, I am fairly certain that the European Court would have ruled against the Commission overturning that Council decision because, if the Council fails to reach a decision the previous year's prices should have applied.

There are those in the European Community—I refer especially to the Dooge committee — who wish to increase the powers of the Commission. That was one of the recommendations in the Dooge committee report last year. Reservation was, of course, expressed on behalf of the British Government, but I wish to prove to the Committee that there are moves in Europe and in the Commission to give the Commission a much more executive power than at present. The new article 10 in the Single European Act will be doing that very thing.

I call in aid the House of Lords. In its important report on European union, HL 149, which was the 12th report of 1985-86 from its Committee on the European Communities, it states in paragraph 10 under the heading "Delegation to the Commission":

"There is an express provision (Article 10) for delegating to the Commission powers to implement policies settled by the Council".

It goes on to say in paragraph 16:

"The powers of the Commission in relation to the drafting of legislation are already significant and will become more so."

It went on to explain why they would become "more so". The additional power under article 145 of the treaty of Rome, as amended by article 10 of the Single European Act, will confer more powers on the Commission. Should we not be concerned about that because the role and constitution of the Commission are already laid down in the treaty and, as I have already said and I hope proved to the Committee, it is already trying to exceed those powers? Here is the Council, and possibly the House, seeking to give extra powers to the Commission.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Does the hon. Gentleman not think that the fact that the Commission is of mixed nationality and of mixed political opinion and is extremely transparent in the examination of any proposals means that it is not a body to fear in these times and it is certainly to be feared much less than some of the bureacracies in our nation states?

Mr. Deakins: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman would expect me to agree with that. We are in total opposition on these matters. His view of the progress in the European Community differs from mine. I am not sure what his views are on federalism and a single European Government, which is the alternative to federalism. Additional power for the Commission is one of the mechanisms which will be used by the federalists in the Community.

Even our own Government have some doubts about what is involved, although they have agreed the Single European Act and are bringing this provision before us tonight. In the explanatory memorandum published by the Foreign Office earlier this year under the heading "Policy Implications" it states in paragraph 8:

"If the Commission's proposal were adopted as drafted it would mean that, where the Council confers implementing powers on the Commission, the Commission would be operating within a range of implementing rules"—

I emphasise the next words

"which would give it potentially greater responsibility than at present."

It is very important for the Committee to note that.

The Commission is a federal type body. It is federalist in everything that it seeks to do along with the other institutions of the European Community other than the Council of Ministers. We are giving it more power in other parts of the Single European Act to work with the Assembly to overturn or influence much more than in the past legislative decisions by the Council of Ministers under the new co-operation procedure. Therefore, it is ill-advised for the Committee, the House and the Government to agree to give it extra powers as suggested in the article.

Mr. Marlow: I shall be incredibly brief.

Article 10 says that the Council of Ministers can

"confer on the Commission . . . powers for the implementation of the rules which the Council lays down."

If the Council wished to at a later stage, would it be able to withdraw those powers from the Commission?

Mrs. Chalker: In this short debate, the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) has made several interesting points, but he has misunderstood the management powers of the Commission, to which I shall refer. First, let me lay down the general principles.

In deciding Community legislation, the Council lays down a policy framework, and in most cases the manner in which the legislation is to be implemented by the Commission. What has always happened is that implementing powers are delegated to the Commission so that the Community functions under the guidance of the Council, but more efficiently. The Council could not possibly take every routine, day-to-day management decision or the very detailed decisions on technical matters. For that there must be technical advice.

Therefore, the Council has conferred implementing powers on the Commission in areas such as Customs administration, agriculture management, and the adaptation of standards to accommodate technical progress. In each case that is subject to the safeguard that the Commission has to consult a specialised committee of national experts on each of the measures that it wants to take, so that decisions of general importance and contentious issues are always referred back to the Council. That is where the hon. Member for Walthamstow became concerned about what he said had happened in 1985, regarding the Commission's management powers, in this case, in agriculture.

What happened was not that the Commission exercised an illegal power to overturn a Council decision. The Council was not able to agree on a price reduction for cereals. There was not a price reduction because it could not agree. The Commission made use of its management responsibilities—which it had already been given by the Council of Ministers — over its arrangements for intervention, so that the quantities of cereals being sold into intervention were controlled. Therefore, savings were achieved that I should have thought that the House would welcome. They counterbalanced the price reduction that had not been secured—or at least they did so in part.

The management powers that are conferred on the Commission by the Council of Ministers carry on as they were already under the treaty of Rome. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the Commission's powers in that area are not changed by the Single European Act. What has happened up to now, and what will no doubt have been clear to some hon. Members——

It being one hour after commencement of proceedings on the motion, THE SECOND DEPUTY CHAIRMAN proceeded, pursuant to the Order [1 July], to put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I beg to move amendment No. 47, in page 1, line 13, after 'Communities)', insert

'but not Article 130D in Article 23 thereof'

I appeal to the Minister to accept the amendment. I am sure that, on reflection, she would agree that it would improve the EEC. Article 130D calls on the Commission to produce comprehensive proposals to amend structurally the rules and operation of the agricultural funds, the social funds, the regional funds and the guarantee funds in such a way as to make them more conducive to helping the various disparities between regions and the backwardness of the least favoured regions.

10.15 pm

In short, under the article, we are telling the Commission to concentrate on changing all the rules of all the funds within one year and that the Council must agree. I hope that the Minister will accept that, instead of the Commission spending time doing that, it should concentrate on bringing forward reforms to the basic structure of the common agricultural policy. We all know that the common agricultural policy is undoubtedly the EEC's greatest failure. About 70 per cent. of total Common Market spending is devoted to agriculture. Over 50 per cent. of every penny spent by the Common Market is devoted to the storage and disposal of surpluses.

Last Thursday, I was told by the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, that over the past 12 months the Common Market has spent £7,300 million on the storage, dumping and destruction of food. That is a huge amount. There are clear signs that the figure will rise sharply as a result of the decisions made by the Council of Ministers and by the European Assembly today. It will rise because nothing has been done to reduce surpluses, except the milk quotas which simply gave cash to farmers to abandon milk so that they could produce other food already in surplus, such as beef.

Exports to the Soiet Union have soared by about 1,100 per cent. since the Conservative party came to office. Export prices have plunged, with beef at 15p a pound, butter at 10p a pound, and wine at 4·5p a litre. The surpluses have become so great that the Commission is bringing in crazy new plans such as its £200 million plan to subsidise the feeding of cows with butter.

That is the crisis and the problem of the Community. I do not think that even the EEC's greatest supporters would defend the CAP in its present form. I am in no doubt that the Commission and the Council will be deflected from their important task if we allow article 130D to remain.

Mr. George Robertson: This is an important amendment. However, that does not imply that the Opposition will vote for it. It will be interesting to hear the Minister's views on it. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) raised one element in the wide subject. The title of the article is "Economic and Social Cohesion". I do not know why the Economic Community must deal in such a strangulated vocabulary which is unintelligible to anybody who wishes to understand it. "Cohesion" means social and regional policy within the Community.

The Government have chosen to exclude certain parts of the Single European Act, most notably those relating to European foreign policy co-operation. However, they have chosen to introduce into the Bill that title and all that goes with it.

The amendment concerns article 130D. The objectives of article 130D are directed to article 130A, which states:

"In order to promote its overall harmonious development, the Community shall develop and pursue its actions leading to the strengthening of its economic and social cohesion."

Most importantly, the article continues:

"In particular the Community shall aim at reducing disparities between the various regions and the backwardness of the least-favoured regions"— presumably, in the Community.

Article 130D, which is the concern of the amendment, states:

"Once the Single European Act enters into force, the Commission shall submit a comprehensive proposal to the Council, the purpose of which will be to make such amendments to the structure and operational rules of the existing structural Funds . . . as are necessary to clarify and rationalize their tasks in order to contribute to the achievement of the objectives set out in Article 130A and Article 130C".

I am sorry if I am confusing hon. Members with this gobbledegook, but that is the way in which the Government have chosen to present this bizarre and Byzantine legislation. Article 130C states:

"The European Regional Development Fund is intended to help redress the principal regional imbalances in the Community through participating in the development and structural adjustment of regions whose development is lagging behind and in the conversion of declining industrial regions."

Those are the fine and grand objectives of title V of the Single European Act.

In stark contrast to those objectives, which presumably the Minister will defend with considerable vigour, is the fact that the Government do not believe in that aim. They do not want to. At every opportunity to vote in the European Council — at meetings of the Finance Ministers Council and of the Foreign Affairs Council— they voted against it. Earlier today, hon. Members debated the 1986 European Communities budget. Last November, when Finance Ministers fixed the budget for 1986, the United Kingdom Government voted against increases in the social and regional funds which would have made them slightly more effective than they are at present in the Community as a whole. At present, their effectiveness is tiny. That example showed how the Community and the Government could have lived up to the hopeful expectations of the rhetoric in title V of the Single European Act. Far from endorsing and supporting it, the British Government chose to vote against it.

I see no purpose in the Government endorsing these objectives if they are not willing to do anything about them. This country is being doubly penalised under the present regime. The Government's restructuring of regional policy means that fewer areas are even considered for help through the regional fund.

Sir Russell Johnston: I do not want to interrupt the flow of the hon. Gentleman's argument, but surely he will remember that, in the earlier debate the critics of the European Community said, "By gosh, we do all this regional stuff ourselves. We would do it far better under the present Conservative Government than any European organisation could."

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman should not believe that the critics of the Bill and of the European Communities' finances are ever at one in respect to most of the objectives. There is a clear-cut division between the critics on the two sides of the Chamber on the regional and social funds.

I want merely to point out the contradictions in the Government's thinking. They are amply illustrated by this part of the Single European Act. The Government have turned their backs on regional policy, at home and in the European Community. They have consistently voted against giving it proper and adequate funds to do the jobs that they say are necessary. But they now come forward and say to the House of Commons that it should endorse a section of the Single European Act that underlines the commitment towards social and economic cohesion. They now say that the Commission should come forward with new rules to make cohesion easier.

We know that today the Minister of State, Treasury will have been involved in decisions on the European budget which will cut to the very minimum possible the amounts of money available in the budget to do something about eliminating the disparities between the regions. At the same time, that same Minister will have ensured that the existing lunacies in the CAP, which eat up more and more of the funds and make less and less sense of regional policy, are increased, despite the fact that, on every other front, the Government say that they agree with the fight against this nonsense. I hope that the Minister will be able to persuade the House in her reply that there is some intelligence behind this proposal.

Perhaps, with the adoption of the Single European Act, we might see the Government starting to believe in those tiny elements within the Act which might make more sense for the Community and for this country. However, I have a feeling of despair borne of experience in other areas, that we are likely to see the rhetoric backed up by nothing more than cynical self-interest which the Government show for their own policies.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): I rise for the first time during these Committee proceedings to support briefly the amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). The amendment seeks to leave out article 130D and I support it because I would hate to see such a vacuous and feeble clause pass into English law. As it stands, the clause seeks to clarify and rationalise the structural funds and in particular the agricultural fund.

The word "rationalise" does not mean very much. That is perhaps appropriate, because the Treaty is littered with phrases which are vague and imprecise and aims which are unquantified. If reform of the CAP is to be mentioned in the treaty and in the Act, stronger language is required about a fund which is gobbling up more than 70 per cent. of the European budget and which is still increasing.

The Committee does not know the final figures and we hope that a statement will be forthcoming soon. Newspaper reports state that the new budget, as agreed between the Council and the Assembly, might increase farm spending by £700 million. That is an increase over the Assembly budget which was declared illegal because it was an increase over the Council budget which in turn the British Government voted against last December because it threatened budget discipline.

These serious matters were debated earlier this evening. The only remedy suggested in article 130D is to clarify and rationalise. Article 130D contains a rather coy reference to money and that is almost the only reference to money in the Single European Act. Article 130D refers to the need for the funds to,

"increase their efficiency and to co-ordinate their activities between themselves and with the operations of the existing financial instruments."

I do not know what that means. Perhaps something was lost in the translation.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I believe that the words "existing financial instruments" convey the impression—at least they do to me and I am sure that they do to others—that the structure should be left alone and untouched.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I do not doubt that my hon. Friend is correct. We are not told what the existing financial instruments are. However, I would suggest to the Committee that that might be an oblique reference to the 1984 Fontainebleau agreement. That agreement laid down specific procedures for financial discipline and for dealing with agricultural spending. If anything was to be included in the Bill, why are the specific procedures promised to the House at the time of the Fontainebleau agreement not included? The agreement states that it is,

"essential that the rigorous rules which at present govern budgetary policy in each Member State shall also apply to the budget of the Communities, and that the level of expenditure will be fixed on the basis of available revenue, and that budgetary discipline will apply to all budgetary expenditure."

Why were these words not included in the Bill? It was on the basis of these words and the agreement that the House agreed to raise our VAT contribution from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent.

Although budgetary discipline has turned out be a somewhat empty phrase as predicted, I believe that the agreement is still in force.

It is incredible that an Act which purports to suggest ways to reform the CAP should not refer to that pledge made two years ago not just to this House but to each member state.

10.30 pm

A list of declarations appears at the back of the Act. Made by member states and organisations in Europe, those declarations elaborate on various provisions in the Act. There appear declarations by Greece, Ireland, Portugal, Denmark and by the Commission. The Commission's declaration, the meaning of which I find it difficult to follow, says:

"the Commission consider that the provisions inserted in the EEC Treaty with reference to the Community's monetary capacity are without prejudice to the possibility of further developments within the framework of the existing powers."

I think that means that the political aims of the Commission should not be hampered by lack of money. If the Commission could insert its interpretation of the Single European Act, why were the British Government not able to include their declaration containing reservations about the provisions, at least drawing the attention of the European institutions to that solemn agreement into which we entered after the Fontainbleu summit?

Why did we allow the provisions to be drafted in such an opaque form, and why did we decide not to make a declaration? Had we done the latter, we should at least have kept alight the flame of budgetary and financial discipline that we took to be a fact when we agreed months ago to increase our VAT contribution.

Mr. Bill Walker: I, too, support the amendment, not only for the reasons that my hon. Friends have advanced but because I represent a constituency with a huge agricultural interest. If we approve the provision as drafted, we shall continue as at present, with all the uncertainties that exist in the system, including the horse trading that goes on every year on agricultural policies and farming support.

That produces a great deal of unnecessary aggravation, simply because we are unable properly to come to terms with the difficulties. My hon. Friends and I shall continue to get aggravation from NFU members and hear about their ever-increasing disenchantment with the system. [Interruption.] They are not disenchanted with me, because they know my position in these matters.

Sir Russell Johnston: Did the hon. Gentleman suffer no aggravation under the old annual price review system?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman is talking of a scheme under which support came from the United Kingdom Parliament. The aggravation then was considerably less than it has been in the last three years. Under the old scheme farmers were not faced with surpluses for which they were not compensated, with the cost of keeping surpluses in store and with anxieties about the ways in which those surpluses are disposed of. The farmers feel strongly about that; if the hon. Gentleman's farmers do not feel that way, they must differ from those in my constituency. My farmers feel strongly that they are blamed for what they did not create. They are the victims of what has been created by Europe. They were encouraged to do certain things. I would go further and say that they were bribed to do certain things, on a scale that brings them considerable odium today. That is my concern.

The farmers responded to requests to produce more and more and to get into cereals and produce them in vast quantities. They were encouraged to get into milk production and do what they could. They responded and they are being blamed for it now. The article will continue to bring blame upon the farmers for something that properly is the responsibility of the European Community.

Mr. Butterfill: I cannot really agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) that the article is opaque in any way. It seems clear in its objectives, and I am surprised that there should be muddle about that.

The article says that it will review the operation of all these farms so that they may contribute more effectively to the achievement of the objectives in articles 130A and 130C. To remind the House of those articles, they want to reduce the disparities between the regions and reduce the backwardness of the least favoured regions. The articles want to redress the regional imbalances in the Community and assist those areas that are lagging behind as well as assisting the industrial regions. I should have thought that hon. Members on all sides of the Committee would share those objectives.

Perhaps one of the great criticisms of the Community is that it has not achieved these objectives, and, indeed has signally failed to achieve them.

The different Community funds that are described in the article have been often pulling in opposing directions in their operation.

The article tells the Commission that it must come forward with proposals to rectify the problem and ensure that the funds will operate for the benefit of the Community in the way that is clearly spelled out in articles 130A and 130C. I cannot see any reason why all hon. Members should not support the inclusion of article 130D.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall say a few words about the 1986 budget at the beginning of my reply to this debate on amendment No. 37, as several hon. Members have mentioned that. The budget has been approved by the Budget Council and Committee, and by a final vote in the plenary session of the European Parliament this afternoon.

Let me say what this is, because it will help to explain to my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) why we did not write in a declaration about budgetary discipline or the Fontainebleau agreement. My hon. Friend was seeking to put that question, although he used slightly different words.

We have established the new 1986 budget within our resources ceiling. While the VAT rate for other member States will be 1·4 per cent. it will be lower for the United Kingdom at only 0·68 per cent. because of the increase in our abatement. The revisions to the budget will be of great financial benefit to the United Kingdom. There is extra provision for our abatement in addition to the £900 million that we are receiving in respect of 1985. That was the value of the Fontainebleau mechanism that I think my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) was referring to earlier today.

The United Kingdom is a beneficiary of the extra provision of payments from the social fund. If I may now turn to something that has been said by other hon. Members in respect of the amendment I will then come back to the questions that were asked.

This debate is about cohesion, and that includes that part of the common agricultural policy which is part of the structural funds and thereby part of the Single European Act. That is known as FEOGA guidance, and it is the fund for agricultural restructuring. That is a very small proportion of the total CAP budget—around 5 per cent. It is in that sphere that the debate tonight should be concentrated, not on the 95 per cent. which is not part of the structural funds and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) said, that is where large amounts of the money go.

If I may deal with what the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said in his remarks—and he was quite wrong in what he said — the benefits to this country from the funds are not being cut in this budget; in fact, we are doing well. The position is that in regard to the regional and social funds — and particularly the social fund, from which we are major beneficiaries — there is an increase in the budget that has just been adopted for the benefit of this country. In total, since 1981 I estimate that we have had about £2·7 billion from the funds. Therefore, the budget to which I referred at the beginning is a success for the country. We will benefit from it, we are getting an increase in our abatement and we shall continue at a lower rate of VAT than before.

That is why I say, with regard to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman about the structural fund with which we are concerned tonight, and the articles before us in consideration of amendment No. 47, that the budget from that point of view is a good budget. I turn now to the clarification sought by my hon. Friend.

Mr. George Robertson: Will all the fairness that she is renowned for, does the Minister not accept that it is outrageous that we are having this debate, as we had the last debate, with the House of Commons not even knowing what is in the budget that she is now parading before us? Perhaps tomorrow — because we understand that tomorrow there might be a statement—we shall be in possession of the information to confirm or deny what the Minister said about these funds in that budget. Is there not something fundamentally wrong about that? If the hon. Lady were on the Opposition side of the House, or even on the Tory Back Benches, she would surely create an outcry about that. She knows what budget was agreed in the early hours of this morning, but the House of Commons of this country does not know.

Mrs. Chalker: The budget has been a matter of debate in the House over several months. A decision has to be reached by the Council of Ministers, and I agree that this happened in the early hours, although it was on Tuesday morning, and it has, indeed, been reported in the press. I know the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. It is that it has not yet been reported to the House.

I did not feel that it was right to discuss that part of the common agricultural policy, in other words, the structural fund part of the CAP, without mentioning what some of my hon. Friends had been asking for. I do not seek to pre-empt my right hon. Friend's statement to the House, if he is to make one tomorrow. What I seek to do is to put in context the amendment that we are debating tonight.

Mr. Budgen: With reference to the rebate, I have just obtained a copy of tomorrow's Financial Times. There is a very interesting article on the back page which says that underlying all the discussions about the budget was the resentment that was felt by many other states against Britain's rebate. It is suggested that in the 1987 budget it might well be that some renegotiation disadvantageous to this country will occur concerning the rebate. I hope that my hon. Friend will not suggest that the rebate is there set in concrete.

Mrs. Chalker: As my hon. Friend has been able to leave the Chamber to obtain a copy of the Financial Times, he obviously has an advantage over me. Whatever is speculated about the future in the Financial Times — an excellent newspaper — does not affect what has been decided and agreed today in the 1986 budget. That is what we are concerned with this year, and we shall be facing considerable discussions about the 1987 budget. It still remains the case that the agreement that we made in Fontainebleau in 1984 stands, as does our abatement.

10.45 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Wells asked about the lack of a declaration about budgetary discipline at the back of the Single European Act. There is a short answer and a long answer. I shall give him the short answer because of lack of time. There was no need to do so. The Fontainebleau abatement mechanism is already enshrined in Community law, and the budget discipline is unaffected by the Single European Act. The declarations in the Act are about issues raised in the changes to the treaty. As these issues are not raised by changes to the treaty, there is no sense in writing them in.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Is my hon. Friend saying that budgetary discipline and the procedures laid down in the Fontainebleau agreement have been adhered to in the latest budget, which will be presented to the House

Mrs. Chalker: Yes, I am saying that they have already been adhered to, because the Fontainebleau mechanism is already enshrined in Community law. The budget discipline is unaffected by the Single European Act, and as been taken into account by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Treasury in deciding the 1986 budget.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wells asked a further question about amendment No. 47. Article 130D is in article 23 of the Single European Act to bring about a clarification and a rationalisation of the tasks of the structural funds. If we are to use this money, we want to use it in the most effective and efficient way. We want to have a co-ordination of activities where that will be of benefit.

The size of the structural funds will be determined under existing rules. The Bill will cut down duplication of effort, and ensure that the European taxpayer get better value for money out of the operation of the funds. Some of what has been said in the debate has ranged wider than article 130 and its various parts. That is why I said that the guidance section of the CAP on which we should be focusing is part of the structural funds and that it promotes objectives such as farm modernisation.

The well-known problems have their roots in the guarantee section, which pays for the market support mechanisms under various commodity regimes. All of that is completely outside the scope of amendment No. 47. It may be interesting, but it is not what we have before us.

The Government put very high priority on the reform of the CAP. The problems of agricultural oversupply are growing, not just in Europe but worldwide. The Community needs to pursue reforms and not only within itself. The enormous oversupply internationally needs to be pursued through GATT, OECD, bilaterally with major producers, and internally through the continuing reform of the CAP to ensure "that it is better adjusted to the market situation with the result that the share of public expenditure claimed by agriculture can be reduced."

Those are not my words. They are words taken from the European Council meeting at The Hague, upon which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister reported only 10 days or so ago. There is no simple solution. It is a global problem. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Hamilton laughs at this. The Community's cereals surplus of 17 million tonnes is very large, but it is dwarfed by the United States cereals surplus of 80 million tonnes. Equally, it is wrong to pretend that left to ourselves we could either avoid or solve the problem. It is a world problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East is worried about trade discussions between the United States and the Community. He believes that the world must solve the problem of food surpluses because the money that is wasted on storing surpluses could be better used. That is exactly what this Government are trying to do. That is why this year's price fixing is a positive step in the right direction.

We have included measures to curb cereal production and we have agreed to reduce dairy quotas. We hope that there will be an agreement on beef before the end of our presidency, and before the end of this year the reform packages will be seen to be working. The Commission estimates that measures that have been in place since 1984, including milk quotas, saved 1 billion ecu in 1984 and almost 3 billion ecu in 1985 and that they will save 4 billion ecu this year. That is not to be sneezed at. We shall build upon those savings.

In 1979 the common agricultural policy accounted for 75 per cent. of the budget. Today it accounts for 65 per cent. of the budget. We are determined that this downward trend shall continue. It will allow us to use the structural funds more efficiently. That is exactly what is covered by article 130D in title V of the Single European Act.

The amendment would not assist. It would lead us in the other direction. It would not clarify the use to which the structural funds can be put and it would not mean that the European taxpayer, which means the British taxpayer, would enjoy better value for money from the operation of the funds. I ask the Committee to reject the amendment.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I beg to move amendment No. 22, in page 1, line 15, leave out 'the preamble and '.

In the course of these proceedings, it is useful occasionally to remind ourselves why we have the Bill at all. We have the Bill at all because it is necessary to have legislation in order that the Government may become a party to the treaty that they have made. In order to make that possible, effect has to be given in United Kingdom law to the consequencies of the new treaty. Therefore, we are thrown back upon the basic document, the European Communities Act 1972, which gave direct effect in the law of the United Kingdom to rights, et cetera, arising out of the treaties as they existed at that time.

We are now writing, as it were, into the 1972 Act parts of the Single European Act, namely those parts which may give rise to new rights, powers, liabilities, et cetera, that will have a direct effect on the law of the United Kingdom.

The Government, presumably not accidentally, have included the preambles to the Single European Act among the treaty provisions which are to be written into the 1972 Act. Therefore, they must believe that, under the preambles as opposed to the other provisions of the Single European Act, there may be new rights, powers and liabilities which will directly take effect in the law of the United Kingdom if provision is made to that effect by the Bill.

The Minister and other hon. Members have treated lightly the significance of the preambles. Indeed, they are large and their content is nebulous, but that creates an even more difficult problem: how such large and nebulous expressions of aspiration — expressions which the Minister said are by no means new — can create new rights, powers and liabilities, taking effect directly.

The purpose of the amendment is to seek from the Government a clear statement of the way in which the preambles as opposed to the articles of the treaty will create the new powers which will take direct effect in the United Kingdom. If there were no such consequences of the preambles, they would not be included in the text of the Bill. The amendment seeks clarification from the Government of the consequence of the preambles. They cannot be purely inert. They cannot be purely declaratory. They cannot be purely a restatement of what already exists, or they would not be mentioned in the Bill.

Mr. Deakins: The Government cannot feel strongly about the amendment, since only last year the Prime Minister told us that no treaty amendments were necessary. Had no treaty amendments been necessary, except for those which allow British to move towards the completion of the internal market, there would have been no Bill before the House, no preamble and none of these commitments.

My speech will relate to the commitment to European union. In the 1967 White Paper published by the Labour Government the words "European union" do not appear. In the 1971 White Paper, the following statement appears:

"The Community is no federation of provinces or counties. It constitutes a Community of great and established nations, each with its own personality and traditions. The practical working of the Community accordingly reflects the reality that sovereign Governments are represented round the table . . . There is no question of any erosion of essential national sovereignty."

[Mr. Deakins]

There is no mention of European union in that White

There was then the series of summit meetings, starting with Paris in 1972 and moving on to Copenhagen and other places, which developed the concept of European union. The then Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), fudged the issue and was extremely evasive in a statement to the House on 23 October 1972, when he said:

"Our concept of a European union is the same that this country has always had"—

I query the words "always had"—

"which is that in developing institutions one develops them to meet the needs of the organisations concerned." — [Official Report, 23 October 1972; Vol 843, c. 796.]

The Minister used similar words in reply to a debate earlier this evening, so that will obviously be the theme of her reply to this debate.

Even the Foreign Office, federalists though most of its occupants are, has recognised the need to define the term "European union", which was supposed to have been defined in 1972 and 1973. In the middle of 1973, the then Foreign Secretary, now Lord Home, was asked about this by me and by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who then represented Wolverhampton, South-West. He said:

"Our objective of political union has been declared. For the foreseeable future it must be the nine countries working independently but achieving as great a consensus as they can." —[Official Report, 25 July 1973; Vol. 860, c. 1607.]

11 pm

That is almost harmless, one would have thought, but the Foreign Secretary, in a memorandum to the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Community: "European Union" HL 149, a report from which I quoted earlier, said in quoting from a 1972 communiqué:

"The Heads of State and Government decided to speed up the work required to define the European Union".

I stress to the Minister that that was from a 1972 communiqué and we still do not have an agreed definition by the member states of the EEC about European union. That Foreign Office memorandum went on to say:

"Part of the difficulty in considering European Union is that the term has never been satisfactorily defined."

We are entitled to query what the term means. The Minister told us what the Government think it means, but we need to know what the Community thinks it means. That is the important thing. It is not what Ministers tell us that counts; it is what is going on in the Community.

Mr. Spearing: Has my hon. Friend seen the agreement signed by Foreign Ministers at the time of the European Common Act? That Act is not before the Committee and is not in the Bill and it gives substance to the Stuttgart declaration. Is not that the nearest honest meaning of European union, something upon which the Government have been completely silent?

Mr. Deakins: We have not heard anything from the Minister about that, but of course the Stuttgart declaration is being embodied in our legislation. That is called the solemn declaration. One wonders at the stupidity of that. Perhaps the Ministers were drunk at the time and had had a good meal.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Withdraw.

Mr. Deakins: No. I am talking about Ministers generally over there. A former Minister here told us that the best agreements were reached over pheasant and port wine and things like that.

Even the Governments of the EEC could not satisfactorily define European union in the Stuttgart declaration. They called for a review after five years, preparatory to setting out a treaty of European political union.

It is sometimes difficult when one is proved right, and I am sorry that I was proved right in the forecast that I gave the House in a debate on 27 November 1973. I said that we were not worried about the fact that European union was not properly defined, but that we did not want to get to that destination however it was defined. I said it was not good enough to be told that we would be fairly slow in getting there, because we did not want to get there at all. We wanted to take an entirely different direction.

When the House debated European union in a minor way in 1982, the Minister's predecessor, who is now the Home Secretary, gave the House a number of assurances after fears were expressed about the Genscher-Colombo proposals, the German-Italian proposals, which were the precursors of statements about European union in the Stuttgart declaration. I have not time and I do not wish to bore the Committee by quoting all that he said. Suffice to say that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who was then a Minister of State, Foreign Office, said of European union:

"It is not the creation of any new institution or increases in the formal powers of existing institutions." — [Official Report, 17 June 1982; Vol. 27, c. 1103.]

He was wrong, because as we have shown conclusively during the course of our debates in Committee, the Bill gives some extra powers to some Community institutions in defiance of assurances previously given to the House.

My final point is that neither this nor any Government have a mandate for achieving European union, however it is defined. Assurances to the contrary were given to the British people in 1972 and in the referendum campaign in 1975. They were also given in The "Britain in Europe; Yes" campaign which I think the right hon. and learned Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) fully supported. I challenge the right hon. and learned Gentleman to deny that. Of course he cannot, because it is a fact. There was nothing in any general election manifesto by any of Britain's political parties about European union.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): This is a fairly late hour, but I have never heard so much rubbish during about 20 years in the House of Commons. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that there should be no unity in Europe? It is rubbish when we hear from the Opposition Benches, and even from the Opposition Front Bench, that there should not be unity in Europe. I have never heard such rubbish in my life.

Mr. Deakins: The hon. Gentleman has not been present for our debates and he may not have heard all the arguments. I am under great pressure of time—

Mr. Crouch: I am sick and tired of this rubbish.

Mr. Deakins: I do not have the time to take issue with the hon. Gentleman. If he does not like what I am saying, he can leave the Chamber.

Mr. Crouch: I shall not leave.

Mr. Deakins: Then the hon. Gentleman can stay and listen. He may find when he leaves the Chamber that he is rather better informed than he was when he entered it.

Mr. Crouch: It is rubbish.

Mr. Deakins: European union will not be achieved by stealth.

Mr. Crouch: Rubbish!

Mr. Deakins: That is the issue before us. There will be a gradual erosion of national sovereignty within the terms of the Bill and that will not be accompanied by any public debate. I am talking about debate outside the House. There is a deliberate confusion — I hope that the Minister of State will not take this approach when she replies — between political co-operation and political integration. Her predecessor tried to confuse the House by taking that approach before he moved on to become Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. We on the Opposition Benches support European co-operation and we are against European integration, and that is what political union is ultimately all about. It is no use the Minister of State Saying, "We see things differently." The issue does not rest with the Government alone. European union is for the 12 Governments of the Community and the federalist institutions, which are pushing more and more for closer co-operation and integration. We shall divide the Committee on this amendment.

Mr. Cash: I have refrained deliberately from speaking during the Committee's proceedings, save for a brief three minutes, but I intervene because I attach great significance to the amendment. I declare an interest because I take my position as a Member of this place as being British first and European second. I believe that it is part of my duty as a Member to protect the interests of my constituents on these occasions.

The provisions of the amendment are important. To incorporate the preamble into the Bill has significance in terms of the interpretation of the measure as a matter of Community law, let alone as a part of United Kingdom law, and there will be an effect upon the sovereignty of the United Kingdom. We must not exaggerate the issue either way, which comes down to a matter of gearing. The interpretation that will be placed on the preamble in the courts cannot be denied, and anyone who attempts to do so will be misleading the Members of this place.

The notion of sovereignty embraces effective control. As I tried to explain in an article which appeared in The Times recently, which dealt with the way in which effective control of European matters is being conducted at the moment and as it affects Britain, there is a need for careful review. There are serious dangers that stem from a lack of accountability and a lack of control over what is taking place in Europe, which I believe impugn our sovereignty. I tabled an amendment, which was not accepted, to the effect that nothing in this measure would derogate from the sovereignty of the United Kingdom Parliament. That was not a re-run of the 1972 battle. It was an attempt to include in the Bill a counterweight to the methods of interpretation that I believe will be imported into the use of the preamble, which reaffirms the will to transfer the whole complex of relations between states into a European union. I shall refer briefly as well to the statement made by the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs on the legal significance of the preamble to the Single European Act. It reads:

"Its principal significance is as part of the context of the Treaty for the purposes of its interpretation."

It quotes the Vienna convention on the law of treaties. It clearly states in the interpretation of treaties, article 31 on the general rule, that one must consider the whole treaty, including its preamble, in determining how to define it.

We must be careful to bear in mind the 12th report of the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Community which stated:

"The powers of the United Kingdom Parliament will be weakened by the Single European Act."

We must take careful note of what that important Select Committee stated.

I referred to the question of control and sovereignty. In a careful analysis by Professor Phillip Taylor a few years ago, it stated that the Eurocrats demonstrated a positive attitude about moving forward to European union. Eighty per cent. agreed that that was the direction in which they should go. Eurocrats have far too much control. I should like to see a much greater degree of retention of sovereignty in this Parliament through scrutiny by hon. Members in the Select Committee on European Legislation considering matters that come before the House. Sovereignty must reside in Parliament.

I am not against Europe, political involvement in Europe, or a degree of unity, but I am against federalism. As the Prime Minister stated unequivocally:

"I do not believe in the concept of a united states of Europe . . . I am constantly saying that I wish they would talk less about European and political union. The terms are not understood in this country."—[Official Report, 5 December 1985; Vol. 88 c. 432.]

The matter is of great importance and I await with interest what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say.

Mrs. Chalker: The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) asked me what rights and powers, in the sense of article 2 of the European Communities Act 1972, were contained in the preamble. The preamble is included in the present legislation to the extent that it relates to the Communities simply because it is part of the Single European Act.

Mr. Budgen: What does that mean?

Mrs. Chalker: If my hon. Friend would contain himself for just a couple of moments, he might learn.

It does not mean that the preamble must confer rights and contain obligations. It does not do so, anymore than the preambles to the original Community treaties which were given effect to by the 1972 Act.

Several hon. Members asked exactly what the status of the preamble is in relation to the substantive provisions of the Single European Act. Article 31(1) of the Vienna convention on the Law of Treaties provides that treaties "shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose."

Article 31(2) of the convention makes it clear that the preamble forms part of the context in which the treaty must be interpreted. In the case of the Single European Act and other treaties, the European court would generally be——

PROVISIONS RELATING TO EUROPEAN ASSEMBLY

The Second Deputy Chairman (Sir Paul Dean): We now come to amendment No. 46.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): In the light of pressure on time, and the fact that clause 3(4) goes to the root of the Bill and raises matters that can be debated on the question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, I do not propose to move amendment No. 46.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.
Clause 4 ordered to stand part of the Bill.
Schedule agreed to.
Bill reported, without amendment.
Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mrs. Chalker.]

11.27 pm

Mr. Spearing: As the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) said, the Bill arises from section 2(1) of the European Communities Act 1972 which states:

"All such rights, powers, liabilities, obligations and restrictions from time to time created or arising by or under the Treaties, and all such remedies and procedures from time to time provided for by or under the Treaties, as in accordance with the treaties are without further enactment to be given legal effect or used in the United Kingdom shall be recognised and available in law, and be enforced, allowed and followed accordingly; and the expression 'enforceable Community right' and similar expressions shall be read as referring to one to which this subsection applies."

No part of any Act of this Parliament has had such a draconian force in law. The Single European Act, which will be incorporated as a treaty under the section of the law that I have just quoted, will change the constitution of this country—I fear, irrevocably—until a future Government change the Act upon which its foundation is based.

The Single European Act is, in effect, a European Bill. If it is to be understood thoroughly, it must be taken as a Bill and read with the treaty of Rome of which it is part. Together, they form the written constitution of the new political constellation of which we are part and to which we are drawn closer to the centre. But, having been drawn closer to the centre, we find that our powers to decide for ourselves what we do in the United Kingdom are consequently diminished.

I believe, as do some Conservative Members — the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch)——

Mr. Crouch: Not all.

Mr. Spearing: One minute.

When a decision is made, by consent of the House or by Governments in an international forum getting together on matters related to a specific topic and agreeing of free will—not because it is linked with another issue —I would probably say, "Hear, hear. We must do that. We must go along with it." That it is the true path to international understanding. It is the true path to co-operation, without letting any of the powers of the House disappear or be prejudiced or undermined.

That is not what we have agreed to in respect of the Bill. In agreeing to the Single European Act, we have agreed to extend the scope and power of the European Community to legislate and to tax. Earlier we had a brief debate on the environment and technology. The debate on the environment centred on water and farmers. The Committee did not realise that the scope inherent in the vires of the European Economic Community will concern any aspect of the environment, especially that relating to the harmonised internal market. I forsee a spate of legislation before the House and the Scrutiny Committee.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Spearing: I should prefer not to give way, because many hon. Members wish to speak. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will catch Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye later.

It has been argued that the passage of the legislation will not change the balance of power in the institutions of the European Community. The Minister of State made that point. I was going to call her a right hon. Lady. She should be a right hon. Lady. She signed a treaty on this country's behalf without being a Privy Councillor. It was unfair to impose that act on the hon. Lady, because she was fresh in the job.

Parliament's ability to legislate on matters of law in the United Kingdom will be diminished, if only because the proportion of law that comes from Brussels rather than Westminster will increase, and the proportion of law that comes from Westminster will inevitably decrease. The legislation will not, therefore, be enacted by the Crown in Parliament. When people take law qualifications, they learn something of our constitution and are taught, so I am told, that the highest authority in the land is the Crown in Parliament. The three aspects of Parliament meet together on occasions—such as the happy occasion last week—Commons, Lords and monarch.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell indicated dissent.

Mr. Spearing: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman corrects me. As I understand it, the Crown in Parliament has three parts. Legislation that does not pass through those three parts of Parliament and does not "originate" —I use that word specifically—in the Crown in Privy Council is not law passed by the Parliament and does not receive the Royal Assent.

So far, the Bill has been passed by one of the three. Almost inevitably, the power of the Crown in Parliament cannot help but be diminished. There will be an increase in the number of Acts of Parliament which Her Majesty is invited to sign, which come ab initio from Westminster and the House. Already we are beginning to be faced with Bills that we have to pass because of the decisions of the European Court and our obligations under the European Communities Act 1972. There will be an increase in the number of statutory instruments and in the amount of legislation coming direct from the European institutions, bypassing the Crown and Royal Assent. To that extent, the sovereignty of this House, the sovereignty of Her Majesty the Queen and the sovereignty of the British people will be also diminished.

Mr. Marlow: Future generations, when they look back over the past few weeks, will be amazed at the prominence that has been given to events in South Africa as compared with the prominence given to the Single European Act and the Bill. That is not to say that events in South Africa are not complex, tragic and important. That is not to say that the Government — and indirectly this House — do not have some influence on the events in Southern Africa and that these events will not have some effect on the interests of our constituents. However, the Single European Act is a matter of high significance, of higher significance probably than any three major Bills passed through the House at any one time.

The Bill is about a movement of powers to European institutions. Many of us — despite what those who disagree with us would say—are keen to see European co-operation and to see Europe working together in various areas where it is appropriate for Europe to work together. We are even keen to see proper and effective European institutions. Those who take the opposite view to that ought to realise that harmonisation does not always bring about harmony.

Before we pass the Bill, perhaps we ought to consider the institutions that exist at present and consider how the powers are being used. The first institution that we ought to consider carefully is the Commission with its great powers for the initiation of policy and its increasing powers that we have discussed today. Everything starts from the Commission. Day in and day out, the Commission works on Community policy. The Commission, because of its position, because it is ever-present and because it has a sense of direction and favours European unity, has the ideas which will be fulfilled in the long run. However, the Commission is a bureaucracy. In this country, we wish to be ruled by democracy but increasingly, as we transfer these powers, we shall be ruled by a bureaucracy. I am a democrat and I wonder at times if we all are.

The next institution that bears close scrutiny is the European Court. As we discussed in the previous debate, the preamble and many other parts of the Bill will give greater powers to the European Court. The laws of this country and of our people will no longer, in these respects, be made by their elected representatives. The laws will be made by judges, not politicians, the people who would have to seek votes. But now the legal experts, judges in a foreign country, will make laws for British citizens. Of course, some people will say that a great part of the Bill is that it will enhance the status of the European Assembly and that that will give us more control over the European institutions. Do we really believe that? Do we really believe that when people voted in the last European Assembly elections, they voted according to how the people they elected would resolve the problems and serve the interests of the people of this country? If they did so, I believe that they were misled. They voted basically on the party label, Labour or Conservative.

The people who are elected to that institution are essentially federalists and they decide policy, not according to the interests of their constituents — may be they should — they decide policy on the basis of bringing together European unity and a federal Europe and above all, on the basis of increasing powers for the institution that they serve. We should be very wary of that in this Parliament.

We are giving powers to institutions that have had powers for some time. They have had powers over the CAP. Although my hon. Friend the Minister was frank if she had been more frank she would have told us that the institution, have not yet met with any degree of success over the CAP. She told us how much worse the problems would be if action had not been taken, but she did not tell us that this year's surpluses are worse than last year's, that last year's were worse than the year before that and that whatever brave proposals are to be put forward, next year's will be worse than they are this year.

What success is that, when each year the situation gets worse? These institutions have had power over the Community budget. We have debated budgetary discipline long and hard and have been given commitments on the subject, yet not one scintilla of budgetary discipline has been achieved. Even so, it is suggested that we hand over more powers.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): You tell them.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend may feel that the whole question of the powers of this House and whether we hand them to other institutions is a matter of levity. I wonder whether his constituents think that. Mine do not.

I have two questions for the Minister. First, we are to have an extension of majority voting. How can she justify a situation in which laws affecting the United Kingdom will be made in such a way that we and Germany will have 10 votes each, each of us having about 55 million citizens, yet seven small European countries—Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Luxembourg, Greece, Portugal and Ireland—with fewer citizens in total than either the United Kingdom or Germany, will have 28 votes?

They will be able to stop happening that which we may want, but we shall not be able to stop happening that which they may want. We and Germany together, with twice their population and six times their economic power, will not be able to prevent that. How can a British Government agree to majority voting in those circumstances?

Secondly, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister believes that our power with the veto is of paramount importance, may we be assured that the veto is still secure?

Mrs. Chalker: Yes.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that assurance. Will she enlarge on that answer and explain how it is secure?

In many respects, what is now happening represents the death knell for some of the powers of this House. It is a requiem on certain aspects of British sovereignty. The measure is nearly finished here, but the Leader of the House, when interviewed on radio last week and when asked about the future parliamentary programme, vouchsafed to the nation that if, in its discussion, a measure was truncated through the use of the guillotine in this place, it was vital that proper scrutiny occurred in the other place. We have before us a vital and underestimated by many people constitutional measure. The powers of the other place should be used to the utmost in this matter.

Mr. Foot: The Government will live to regret — I hope even to be ashamed of — having introduced this measure. That sense of regret may come a good deal more speedily than some may think, for the Bill must go to another place and they have a special obligation there to examine constitutional measures, especially when such measures are guillotined here.

I should have thought that the other place — particularly as we have heard tonight that their Lordships have decided to intervene on a major Bill affecting the royal dockyards—would be encouraged to intervene on this measure.

When I say that the Government should be ashamed about that way in which they have proceeded with the Bill in this House, that is not meant as a reflection on the Minister. All who have listened to these proceedings will pay tribute to the patience and skill that she has shown in defending the situation. She has done that without assistance from any hon. Members, including those who have spoken from the Government Benches.

The hon. Lady has done extremely well, but in the course of doing that she has damned the Bill even more. In an effort to defend what the Government are seeking to achieve by the measure, she has had to try to persuade us that it does not really involve any change in the situation that went before, and that has been her case. Of course it is not true.

I am not saying that she is seeking to mislead the House, but the hon. Lady has misled herself in the way that she has presented the matter. Greater powers can be used by the European Court and invoked by the European Assembly. The methods used and the balance between institutions within the European organisation are altered.

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Foot: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. Should the Bill be passed, those factors and developments will come into being. Then the people of this country will return to the House and ask why the House of Commons allowed such a measure to go through.

They will ask why the House of Commons allowed a European court to have such power in such circumstances, and allowed a European assembly to be transformed into a European parliament and given greater powers.

I do not believe that the hon. Lady has answered the charge why the House of Commons permitted greater powers over the imposition of taxation, which will be used later by a Government in this country. Those dangers face this country. People will look back to these debates and say that it is a disgrace that such a measure was forced through by a guillotine and forced through by a bovine majority that has not even been interested in the betrayal of the rights of the people of this country.

Mr. Cash: I spoke on the interpretation of the Preamble in Committee, and I should like to say now that I am deeply concerned about the manner in which legislation is enacted in Europe, and which has to be implemented by the House by virtue of the European Communities Act.

I am not against the Act or the Bill, in principle, but I feel deeply and strongly, as a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation and having witnessed the manner in which legislation is passed to us, its effect on our commerce and industry. I take the Directive on Product Liability as an example. There are other directives in which I was involved before coming to the House where I have seen livelihoods affected. That was not due to a deliberate act by civil servants or indeed by Ministers, but because people were unaware of the effect of European legislation.

In this instance the directive, which related to radiation and the implementation of measures relating to radiation, livelihoods would have been taken from many people. But for the fact that a serious attempt was made to make sure that people were aware of the implications, their livelihoods would have been taken away. That can happen in many different ways. I ask the House, when considering the Bill and European legislation, to bear in mind that to have legislation passed with the consent of the electorate implies accountability.

Accountability to whom? I spoke earlier on the question of sovereignty, which for me means effective control. In this context, when we consider the manner in which legislation is produced in Europe and the fact that it must be enacted by this Parliament by virtue of the European Communities Act, there is accountability by Ministers in theory and largely in practice.

Much of the legislation goes on without being properly considered and it has a much greater effect upon the people of this country and our commerce and industry than is commonly recognised. I plead that it is essential to scrutinise that legislation effectively in the House, and that the terms of reference of the Select Committee on European Legislation are improved.

I finish by reminding the House of some legislation that was passed recently relating to the Chernobyl disaster.

It included as its legal basis the whole of the European treaty. In other words, there was no specific power to which the Foreign Office was able to point in determining the basis upon which that legislation was to be imposed upon the people of this country. If that is the basis upon which people proceed, I think that we have an open door to legislation of any description.

It is the matter of the greatest possible importance that we ensure that sovereignty does, indeed, remain in this House, that we have effective accountability and that Ministers are fully aware of what is done in thier name by bureaucrats and civil servants who go across to Europe in the working groups and legislate on our behalf. It is essential to maintain the democracy of this House and its sovereignty and to ensure that we do know that the legislation done in our name is known to have been done on behalf of the people of this country. If there is a gap between legislation and the electorate of the kind that I have seen developing in Europe with a volume of legislation of this complexity, I believe that Europe itself will disintegrate because it will be seen to be undemocratic and bureaucratic in the extreme.

11.50 pm

Sir Russell Johnston: I welcome the Third Reading of the Bill. I repeat the view that I have expressed throughout the progress of it, that the changes it introduces are limited and sensible. I consider that the various examples that we have been given by anti-Community Members of terrible consequences being imposed upon us through majority voting are just plain nonsense. Again and again, whether we were discussing tax harmonisation, pollution or regional development, we were told that somehow or other, and apparently completely irrespective of political colour, these foreigners — aliens was the word much used, I thought rather offensively by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) — would get it wrong and impose unacceptable policies upon the country, not to mention what foreign judges might do.

I find this approach quite untenable; and the suggestion by some who produced this approach — that they were not really against the Community at all, but wanted to improve the Community—was totally incredible.

I felt that the Minister, with respect to her, was sometimes less robust in defending the Bill than she could have been. I suppose if one is a reasonable person, which she is, there is always a certain disposition to seek some kind of accord with critics, even if they are evidently intractable and unconvertible as is the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). However, it sometimes leads one to claim that changes that one proposes do not actually make much difference at all. It is certainly my hope that the Bill will make some difference; likewise, this is the belief of nearly all other member Governments. The major difference should be a greater capacity to arrive at decisions without undue delay, far less some of the indefensible procrastinations that we have seen in the past.

Taken in conjuction with the more effective operation of the Court and the modest increases in powers of the Commission and the Parliament, this will achieve greater integration advance what I believe in, the historical welding together of the old European states and nations, and increase understanding and appreciation of our mutual dependence. As I have said before in many arguments with the hon. Member for Walthamstow ((Mr. Deakins), this will lead to a style of government in Western Europe that one can call federal quasi-federal, devolved union or whatever word one likes to use, but it means that there are a lot of things that we can do better together — oil pollution control, fishery conservation, fair competition, regional development, economic co-ordination and political co-operation.

This is all good. I do not believe that it reduces the rights of our citizens; I think that it enhances them, and I applaud it.

11.53 pm

Mr. Foulkes: As we come to the end of the very sorry saga of the Bill, it is appropriate to remind the House that the Government originally did not want the proposals now included in the Bill and in the Single European Act. The right hon. Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) insisted on major reservations in Dooge, which have subsequently been abandoned. The Prime Minister petulantly opposed the inter-governmental conference, but the Government were forced into a humiliating reverse. They had reluctantly to accept some fundamental changes that they opposed to get concessions on the internal market. In an attempt to hide their embarrassment, they first tried to slip the Bill through with the minimum scrutiny and discussion. When they were rumbled by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and we started to give the Bill careful scrutiny, the Government ruthlessly wielded one of the most drastic guillotines ever.

The Bill represents the first major transfer of sovereignty from Westminster to Strasbourg and Brussels, involves increased pressure to harmonise VAT, means the establishment of a new European Court of Justice, gives additional competences to the European Community, changes the name of the Assembly to Parliament, and means a move towards greater economic and social cohesion — in other words greater European union. These are major issues that should have been considered in detail by the House. Many vital questions remain unanswered on the internal market, the effects, on employment, on insurance, procurement and company law. Many matters have not been discussed by the House. There are many implications of which the House, let alone the country, remains unaware.

The hon. Lady deserves credit, and the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) was, unusually, a little discourteous and ungenerous. She deserves credit for one thing, her diligence and stamina in piloting the Bill through single-handed — "Timless" on most occasions. We have seen some amazingly skilful footwork. I know from an unusually reliable source — that is the usual phrase for a Foreign Office leak — that, like the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens), that well-known the danseur extraordinaire, that the Minister is fond of dancing — not modern dancing, but dances such as the conga and hokey-cokey. However, if she tries to divert attention from the Government's twists and turns in the Bill, and its importance, by launching into the usual sad, tired, tattered attack against the Opposition, she will do herself no credit.

No doubt, the Minister will also try to claim that the changes negotiated at Luxembourg will be good for Britain. Conservative Members should remember Fontainebleau. We were told that the agreement reached there would be good for Britain. The same claims were made then as are being made now — a great victory, a permanent solution. The reality was the opposite. No financial discipline — our contribution has become greater. We hve seen the 1·4 per cent. VAT reached, and no doubt we shall see it breached, and agriculture spending is spiralling. If that is a good deal for Britain, the English language has lost its meaning.

The Minister may also be tempted to praise the success of the Community in certain matters of concern such as vehicle standards or health. However, even if we concede that there have been some minor advances on such matters, at what expense have they been achieved in concessions and in the horse trading in the European Parliament?

The Minister may also claim that the Government have not wavered in their commitment to the European Community, and that the habit of co-operation on foreign policy is entrenched in the European Community. The reality is entirely the opposite. We were out of step in withdrawing from UNESCO, when we cravenly left when President Reagan said jump.

Mrs. Chalker: Whas has that got to do with the Bill?

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Lady must listen — she will have an opportunity to reply to the debate. We were told that in the Single European Act, to which she put her name, there was agreement about co-operation on foreign policy. Far from working together, the United Kingdom has been out of step. We stand alone within the Community over the raid on Libya. The Foreign Ministers of the Community were deceived by the British Foreign Secretary about that raid. We are now at loggerheads with the Community over how to deal with the apartheid regime in South Africa.

I predict that the Minister will try to take some credit for what she will describe as a great achievement — the so-called £4 billion rebate. Under the 1974-1979 Labour Government Britain's net contribution to the Community was £380 million a year. Under this Conservative Government, between 1980 and 1986 it has been over £800 million a year. In 1984-85 it amounted to £936 million and in 1987-88 the net amount that we shall pay will be £1·2 billion.

If the Single European Act is the result of what the Prime Minister described as "batting for Britain" we, like the England cricket team, need not only a change of captain but a change of team. I ask my hon. Friends to take this opportunity to vote once more on Third Reading against the Bill, and I give a pledge on behalf of the Opposition that we shall continue the fight against the Bill just as vigorously in the other place.

Mrs. Chalker: There have been nearly 40 hours of debate on the changes to the European Community treaties that will be brought about by the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. At each stage I have tried to respond to the questions that were put to me by hon. Members. I shall do so again now, if I can. If that is not possible, I shall respond in writing.

The House has to take its decision on the Bill as a whole. It was right to go through it in detail and to weigh up the implications of these changes, but we should concentrate on the material facts. However, many hon. Members have not been trying to assess the material facts, or even the implications. They returned to the 1972 debates and the 1975 referendum debates and questioned our membership of the European Community. It is right to be critical when things go wrong. However, we took the decision to enter the Community, and as one of the leading partners in the Community we should be concentrating on current issues, not fighting the battles of years ago.

I wondered for a moment why the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) referred to the hokey-cokey and then I realised that he had a copy of some, though not all, of my notes. Whether he dances the eightsome reel with joy, or whether somebody else dances another dance, there is one thing at which he and his party are more expert than any other party in the House—their European hokey-cokey. The right foot of some Opposition Members goes in while the left foot of other Opposition Members wants to take them out. In that sense, it is the most perfect description of the Opposition's attitude towards European legislation.

In previous debates, I recalled again and again the decisions made by a Labour Government — the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) was a member of that Government, and must stand by the decisions that he made then—which were the foundations of the steps that we have taken over the years to reach this first amendment of the treaty of Rome.

The Labour Government played games with our membership of the Community, telling people that they would renegotiate our terms of entry, when all that they did was to renegotiate the terms of their election manifesto. The Conservative Government have not wavered and will not waver. In our 1983 manifesto, we were convinced, as we are today, that the development of the Community is vital to Britain. It is vital to cement not only a lasting peace in Europe but to end centuries of hostility. We said that we had come to office determined to make a success of British membership of the Community, and that is what we have been doing. The Bill is a further step in that direction.

Unlike the steps attempted half-heartedly by Labour Governments, this Government, under this Prime Minister, secured a lasting agreement worth more than £1,000 million to Britain this year alone. The Government have taken major steps to agricultural reform, with price reductions of nearly 1·5 per cent. three years ago increasing to more than 7 per cent. in real terms for cereals this year. Those steps are part of the process of improving the Community of which we are full and living members.

The Government have also secured agreement that agriculture must be tackled as an international problem in the GATT, in OECD and through discussion with major producers, but we do not deny the importance of structural funds, including FEOGA guidance, which we have been debating in the Bill. That is another important element in what we seek to do.

The Government have played their part in securing the democratic future of Spain and Portugal through membership of the Community. Anyone who takes that for granted should reflect for a moment on how our interests would be affected if there were Communist Governments in Madrid or Lisbon.

Mr. Deakins: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is within the rules of order for any hon. Member speaking on the Third Reading of a Bill to mention matters that are not within the Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Third Reading is confined to matters that are within the Bill, but the Minister was in order. There is reference to the newer members of the Community.

Mrs. Chalker: I was about to say that European political co-operation is part of the Single European Act. Only with wider membership of the Community can European political co-operation, which is important to us, come within our grasp. The hon. Member for Walthamstow is right to say that it is not mentioned in the Bill, but since the Bill implements the Single European Act ——

Mr. Deakins: Parts of it.

Mrs. Chalker: Since the Bill implements parts of the Single European Act, it is covered.

As a result of the Bill, the Government will take decisions, whether on animal health or on research and development, that benefit not only Britain but the entire internal market.

This is where we come to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow). Through qualified majority voting we shall succeed in bringing about sensible decisions which will not be blocked by a single member state. Such decisions have been blocked in the past, often by nations not even interested in the matter in question. We want changes in the internal market because we want to open up the possibilities for new enterprise and new work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North is anxious about the blocking minority. We went through all that during the debate on one of the amendments. We have sought to make progress and have enshrined in the Bill the progress that we have sought and the issues upon which we have sought it, that is, qualified majority voting for the completion of the internal market, with proper safeguards in the areas of human, animal and plant health, and in the areas of fiscal changes, the movement of people, and the rights and interests of employees.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): What about the veto?

Mrs. Chalker: I shall come to the veto in a moment. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North is worried that small nations might combine against us. We have now reached a degree of agreement on these issues with everybody pushing forward to bring an end to the barriers that divide Europe, where such barriers can sensibly be removed. This is the right way to go. If I thought for one moment that any of the fears in the mind of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North were real, I would have told him so. I do not believe those fears are justified. He and the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) asked about the veto. Where important interests are at stake, discussion must be continued until unanimous agreement is reached. That is exactly what we mean by the Luxembourg compromise and that is why we shall——

Mr. Shore: That does not apply specifically to the articles that relate to the completion of the unified market. By definition, the veto power cannot apply to them because unanimity rules have been replaced by majority voting.

Mrs. Chalker: The unanimity rule has been replaced by qualified majority voting, but as we said in the detailed debates on the Bill, qualified majority voting has been agreed for those issues where we wish to make progress and where it is in Britain's interest to make progress. It is right to make progress, but we still have the right on other issues to exercise the veto where it is in the interests of Britain to do so.

When we joined the Community we accepted a treaty that was negotiated by others. In this Bill, we are asking the House to accept amendments to the treaty negotiated by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in British interests. She announced that treaty to the House on 5 December and when it was worked out, my right hon. Friend realised that not only were its provisions in the interests of Britain, but they would safeguard all the things that we have worked for since the Milan summit.

The amendments to the treaty of Rome contained in the Single European Act and effected by this Bill are not major changes in treaties. They do not have the constitutional implications that were inherent in the terms of our original accession to the Community. They are changes that will enable Britain to realise more fully the benefits of our membership. It is to the benefit of Britain to speed up the completion of the internal market and that will be helped by the Bill.

It is also to the benefit of Britain to have a clearly defined Community programme for research and development. The changes negotiated at Luxembourg mean a good deal for Britain. If the changes agreed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister have not aroused a great debate across the country, it is not because few people know about them. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has explained them, so has my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and so have I. Those who oppose the changes have written about them copiously. The reason that there has, in the Opposition's terms, been no great debate in the country about these sensible amendments to the treaty, is because the great debate is over. The British people——

University College, Swansea

Motion made, and Question proposed That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

12.26 am

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I would like to take this opportunity to draw attention to the problems facing University college, Swansea, and the university of Wales. The college in my constituency is on one of the most delightful campuses anywhere in the country and it has an extremely good academic record. However, it is in a state of complete demoralisation. The college has already endured cuts over the past five years—quite severe cuts for a small college—and over 30 of the academic posts have already gone.

The college had been warned, as had other universities, that a successive round of 2 per cent. annual cuts lay ahead for the college. That would have been a severe enough blow, but, out of the blue, it was told of the latest massive University Grants Committee cut. That cut was portrayed by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales, who does not seem to quite understand these things, as a cut of only 0·5 per cent., carefully ignoring the fact that when inflation is taken into account the cut actually becomes 5·5 per cent. In cash terms, the university now has to save £850,000 during the next academic year.

It is worth noting that the average cut in Wales at university level has not only been higher than in Scotland, but has been much higher than the average in England. When the UGC cuts were first announced it was feared that compulsory redundancies would be necessary at academic and non-academic level. As the Minister will appreciate, the prospect of further redundancies in one of our major employers, in a city that already suffers from abnormally high unemployment, was regarded with considerable alarm, especially as the university is at a financial disadvantage because the loss of industry that there has already been in the area limits its ability to find industrial sponsors.

At least we have now been told that there is a possibility that the cuts can be accommodated without compulsory redundancies. They can be accommodated by natural wastage, which is a nice way of saying that we do not fill the job again, so jobs are lost in the area anyway, and possibly by voluntary redundancy, if enough people come forward and offer to give up their jobs. If not, I assume that we are back to the situation where compulsory redundancy may be under consideration.

Whichever way the matter is resolved, we are at the end of the road for the college after so many years of cuts. We are now at the limit of the cuts that the university can take without there being severe redundancies. Even if we achieve this round of cuts without compulsory redundancy, the effects will still be severe on some of the lowest-paid people who work on the campus. Many people do non-academic work there. For example, the National Union of Public Employees tells me that a decision to save on cleaning work in the university by cutting four and a half hours per person off the working week, which may not sound severe when one first considers it, is put in a different perspective when one realises that 100 cleaners on that campus work only 19 hours in the first place. In losing four and a half hours, they will be losing a quarter of their income, even if they manage to save their job. Also because they will be below 19 hours, they will lose their national insurance, and their employment and redundancy protection.

The university is having to make severe cuts in its structure. We are losing the department of oceanography and the economic history department, the only separate economic history department in the whole of Wales. We are losing our drama unit. There is to be a 50 per cent. cut in the Taliesyn arts centre on a budget of £120,000, which is made even more severe by the fact that it will also lose some of its bread and butter income, because the closure of the drama unit will mean that it loses the productions that the drama unit previously put on. Already, it is facing the need for cancellation of contracts for events that were due to take place in the next two terms, and is having to consider scrapping programes for exhibitions in the arts centre.

The arts centre manager assures me that the cuts are so severe that he will barely be able to meet the wages of a skeleton staff at the centre, yet that centre is important because, in addition to its general contribution to the cultural life of Swansea and the surrounding areas, it is a focal point in south-west Wales for Welsh language activities, and has a co-ordinated programme to help local school examination candidates with their set text work. To try to make up the money that it will lose as a result of the UGC cuts, it will have to convert its operations to that of yet another conference centre. It will be one more competitor for the already limited number of conference engagements available.

In a perverse way, to add to an already severe position for the centre, it now faces the possible crippling demand from the Welsh Arts Council for a refund of part of a capital grant of £90,000 because the grant was provided in the first instance for the building to operate as a theatre.

The whole exercise in relation to Swansea and the University of Wales as a whole is based on serious misunderstandings. First, there is a misunderstanding of the nature of the role of the University of Wales. It is deliberately a federal structure. As the Minister may have been told, it was set up, not by great endowments and charitable funds or Government money but by the collection of pennies from the people of Wales. They were determined that they would have their own national university. In order to ensure that the facilities were available to the maximum number of people in Wales, it was decided to organise the university on a federal basis. Thus there is a series of colleges, each of which is small, but they need to be widely diversified in the courses that they offer. Because they are small, any changes in financing—even small changes—quickly affect viability. Because they are small, they have been at a disadvantage in the latest round of assessments by the UGC. Their size has exacerbated the problem of research financing. The research criterion has been used by the UGC vastly to the disadvantage of the Welsh university colleges.

The second misunderstanding is about the inter-relationship of departments within any one college. Increasingly, youngsters want to study joint honours courses. They do not want all their academic and intellectual eggs in one basket. They want flexible choices to be available to them. If the number of departments within a university is limited, the range of options available to students is reduced, perhaps deterring students from attending that university. The position is a little worse in Wales because of the way in which part 1 of a degree course is organised. A wide range of choice is required in the first instance.

One can demonstrate the problem by referring to the loss of the drama unit. It will be bad enough to lose the drama unit, but inevitably the English department will be hit. There is a tendency for students to take drama with other English studies. I believe that when Bangor university cut back on classics, it also lost enrolments in English departments because of the tendency of young people to link the two subjects.

The University of Wales is a major central Welsh national institution. It is part of our national, cultural and educational inheritance. It is no good the Secretary of State for Wales trying to wash his hands of it. It must be recognised that his reputation as the Welsh Secretary is inevitably linked to what happens to our university. I find it disturbing that he has been, at best, ambivalent, and more aptly evasive, in his responses to the university's future.

I asked the Secretary of State whether he would allow me to take a deputation from University College, Swansea, to meet him. He was unable to agree. He said that responsibility rested with the Department of Education and Science. That would have been fine if he had said that he had no responsibility in that context. However, when we had a debate on higher and continuing education on 25 June, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales—the hon. Member for Conway (Mr. Roberts)—trying to show the depth of concern that he and his right hon. Friend have for the university, said:

"We keep in close touch with the UGC to ensure that Welsh needs are fully taken into account—"

On the basis of the review, they are not making a good job of it. He continued:

"My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I met the chairman of the UGC recently to discuss next year's allocation—".—[Official Report, 25 June 1986; Vol. 100, c. 414.]

The Welsh Office must make up its mind. It cannot, when it suits it, say, "It is nothing to do with us; it is someone else's responsibility", and try to win dubious applause in Wales by pretending that it is taking action when, in fact, it ducks for cover as soon as it is asked to take responsibility. It is no good trying to evade the fact that, in Welsh eyes, the Secretary of State for Wales and his reputation are closely linked to the future of the university colleges of the principality.

When the Secretary of State saw the Association of University Teachers recently—he will see the AUT, but apparently he will not see his parliamentary colleagues—he advocated a collegiate approach based on small colleges each of which would concentrate on areas of excellence. But that fails completely to recognise the departmental relationship and the need for breadth of choice and linked choices to which I referred. The vision of the Secretary of State is false and too restrictive. It is a formula for low enrolment. As numbers become smaller, income will become smaller, and the university will be pushed further on the downward spiral.

On 25 June, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales—the hon. Member for Conwy—said that the UGC had made a "special allocation", recognising the needs of the university in relation to the Welsh language. If our allocation is already worse than those in Scotland or England, even with a special allocation, how bad would it have been without that special allocation? Our position would surely have been worse. Is not the Secretary of State for Wales defending our university at all? Does he accept that it should not be among the most severely penalised of all the universities? I understand that the Secretary of State for Education and Science has asked the UGC to review the financial position of the Scottish universities. We expect at least the same for Wales. We expect the UGC to consider the Welsh position again, bearing in mind the unique role played by the university of Wales in the context of Welsh national aspirations and life. If we do not get this second look, we shall want to know why the Secretary of State for Wales seems to have so little influence with the Government and his colleagues in the Department of Education and Science.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): I listened with interest to the statements by the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) about University college, Swansea, the funding of the university of Wales and universities generally. He set out his case with his usual diligence, and I am grateful for his clear exposition of his concerns.

I sympathise with some of the right hon Gentleman's anxieties. I hope that this does not sound frivolous, but it was while he was lecturing at Swansea that Kingsley Amis wrote "That Uncertain Feeling". I know that this is a difficult period for the whole university system, including Swansea. It is important at the start to get the debate into context. My right hon. Friend's predecessor, the former Secretary of State for Education and Science, announced on 20 May that the Government were willing to increase financial provision for the universities. That willingness is, however, clearly and reasonably dependent upon the universities committing themselves to a programme of action to improve quality and cost-effectiveness. In particular, we have told the universities that we shall be looking for evidence to demonstrate progress towards better management, improved standards of teaching, selectivity in research funding and rationalisation of small departments. We have started discussions with the UGC and the vice-chancellors on this and are aiming to reach agreement in detail on the way forward before public expenditure plans for 1987-88 and later years are finalised in the autumn.

Sceptical commentators have dismissed all that as "jam tomorrow". "I Want It Now" they say, in the words of another Kingsley Amis title, and they affect the belief that, unless the Government hand out a specified sum of hard cash now, without conditions, many universities will be on a slippery slope towards closure. That is just not so. I am glad that the right hon. Member for Swansea, West did not go that far.

I should like to take this opportunity to reassure the universities that the Government will not make statements like that made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) on 20 May unless they intend to follow them through. There will be an increase in financial provision if universities will make progress on the changes which we have identified as necessary. The amount of the increase will be determined in the autumn. It will depend in part on the Government's decisions about relative spending priorities. The universities' case will be greatly strengthened if there is clear evidence of their determination to press ahead with measures to reinforce quality and value for money.

The vice-chancellors have said loudly that they are seeking funds sufficient to maintain the universities' activities at their 1985-86 level. At this stage I am in no position to promise such an outcome; and my position tomorrow would be several Benches further back if I were to do that. However, we have heard what the vice-chancellors have said and what the UGC has said and I have listened carefully to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West this evening and noted his remarks about his institution.

Most of my remarks relate to the changes to which we hope the universities will commit themselves. I would like to spell these out in more detail and relate them to some of the points made by the right hon. Gentleman about University college, Swansea. First, I would like to consider management.

The Jarratt committee on efficiency in universities reported in March last year. It did not find that universities were gnerally wasteful or that there were particular areas in which major economies could be made overnight without any effect on universities' teaching and research activities. But it did conclude that throughout the university system there was scope for improvements in management both to ensure that full value could in future be gleaned from the large sums of public money involved and to make the system more effective in responding to the changing needs of the nation in the fast-changing world of the late 20th century.

Some of those who are concerned about these matters were, I know, worried last summer and autumn about the silence with which much of the university world appeared to have received Sir Alex Jarratt's report. A good part of the explanation for that seems to have been simply that most universities were heavily preoccupied with the preparation of their submissions for the UGC's planning exercise. Since then we have heard a good deal about deliberations within universities about these matters. Many, perhaps most, universities have by now given careful consideration to the central recommendations about the need for streamlined, responsive management structures with clearly identified levels of decision-making and responsibility. Certainly, I know that University college, Swansea has.

The Department has heard rather less about the attention being given to the more detailed recommendations from the Jarratt exercise — on financial management, purchasing, building maintenance, and the use of space.

Let me turn now to the question of teaching standards. As hon. Members know, the UGC's recent grant allocations were not based — even in part — on an assessment of teaching quality in universities. I fully recognise that such assessments are very difficult, but I hope that the UGC might be able to make some moves in that direction over the next few years. I assume that the right hon. Member would share that hope.

However, whilst UGC involvement in that way would be a useful lever, real action to sustain high quality teaching must be centred within each university. There are already a number of promising signs. Later today the CVCP will be publishing the final report of Professor Reynolds' working group on the maintenance of academic standards. I understand that it includes much valuable advice and guidance for universities on matters such as the effective use of external examiners. A few weeks ago the vice-chancellors circulated draft guidance on the training needs of university academic staff. These are important steps and, if universities respond as suggested, significant improvements seem likely. But, to my mind, the greatest promise lies in the talks which the vice-chancellors have been having with the Association of University Teachers about the introduction of more systematic appraisal for university lecturers. Those talks are at an early stage but I am encouraged by what I have heard of how this difficult question is being addressed.

This brings me on to selectivity in research funding and the appraisals made by the UGC of each university's research strength. I have discussed this with many experienced and knowledgeable people in higher education. No one has yet challenged the principle. I admit, though, that most of those with whom I have spoken, whilst agreeing that the UGC's assessments were broadly right, disagree with the ratings given to one or two departments which they know well. Perhaps not surprisingly, in all such cases they believe that the department concerned deserves a higher rating. It may reassure them, and hon. Members, to know that these ratings are not cast in stone for all time. The UGC will be keeping them under review and refining its procedures by experience. However, I must state at this point that I am not aware of any undertaking by the UGC to review the Scottish position. It is possible that I may have missed something but I would hope that I have not. I cannot give any assurance of the kind requested by the right hon. Gentleman.

University college, Swansea did not fare as well as some other universities in these research ratings. Indeed, the UGC has told the college that the main reason why it will suffer a cut in grant of 0·5 per cent. next year, although I accept the right hon. Gentleman's point about financial reality was the committee's selective distribution of resources in support of research strength. That does not mean that there is no high quality research at Swansea. On the contrary, the UGC assessed research in chemical engineering, civil engineering, electrical and electronic engineering, social anthropology, sociology, German, history, and philosophy as of above average quality. This was, however, more than counter-balanced by the below average ratings given to research in 10 other subject groupings. As in other universites, there are some hard questions for Swansea to address. A central concern may be whether academic developments in the coming years should involve some increased concentration on areas of strength.

Such a concern links with the fourth area of change which the Government have identified—the rationalisation of small departments. The UGC has already begun a programme of rationalisations across the country as a whole. Proposals for small departments involved in the teaching of Scandinavian languages and Italian have already been announced. More minority subjects are in the pipeline and the UGC's programme will progressively move towards tackling some of the large subject areas.

But the UGC cannot act alone. Much of the impetus must come from within universities. That is why I was pleased to hear that the University of Wales has established a rationalisation committee and that the Welsh colleges will be participating in a careful review of whether the present distribution of subject provision can be bettered.

Our other great federal university, London, has grasped the nettle in recent years and committed itself to major restructuring. Much of that is now complete. No one would pretend that it was easy; there has undoubtedly been trauma for many of those involved. But few would deny that London university and its constituent colleges are stronger as a result. I wish the University of Wales well in treading the path of rationalisation.

The fifth part of our four-legged programme for improvements is academic pay. The AUT and CVCP are currently working up detailed proposals to put to the Department this summer. Our willingness to consider making extra funds available on this front will depend greatly on the readiness of the universities and university lecturers to agree a new pay structure which provides greater flexibility and helps the recruitment and retention of staff of appropriate quality.

The right hon. Gentleman was right to refer to the position of non-academic staff in universities. I have talked to a number of their representatives on my visits to universities throughout the country and I agree that their position should not be forgotten in the changes that are taking place. I am aware of the strains of readjustment on their position, and any improvement in university funding as a whole will, naturally, be to their indirect benefit, too.

Most of what I have said has focused on the future and on prospective improvements in our university system, which will be of importance to the nation and which, I know from talking to vice-chancellors, are generally regarded as necessary.

The right hon. Gentleman concentrated on the effects of selectivity on his university and on the University of Wales. I reiterate what I have told the House several times, that the UGC does not discriminate in any way between universities on grounds of location. It applies standard considerations to all universities. However, I readily acknowledge that, like all universities, University college, Swansea, faces a difficult task in containing its expenditure within the funds available, while sustaining quality and reshaping its provision in the light of developing national needs. I believe that, like other universities, it will be up to the task.

UCS is, I know, looking in the right directions. Recent developments have included pace-setting work in biotechnology — one of tomorrow's sciences — and the establishment on the Singleton park campus of the innovation centre which, as well as generating some income, should facilitate increasingly important links between academics and industry. These are worthwhile developments and show clearly that, like the Government, University college, Swansea, has its eye to the future.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the question of small departments. Many difficult decisions will have to be taken by a number of universities in the coming years, but it is my strong impression, judging from the remarks of people within the system with whom I have talked, that there is a growing recognition that — as Professor Bernard Crick put it in a recent article, and his political persuasion is not close to mine—universities can not be department stores. So there is a general and growing recognition that there must be rationalisation of small departments, but it must be sensitively done. I believe that the UGC intends to pursue that in a sensitive way.

In conclusion, let me stress that the Government place great importance on our higher education institutions; on the universities, polytechnics and other colleges in the public sector. They make a vital contribution to the nation's economic and cultural development. Our policies are aimed at increasing that contribution and its effectiveness.

Since 1979, full-time home student numbers have increased by nearly 80,000. Our aim is to increase participation rates for both 18 to 19-year-olds and for mature students beyond the record high levels already achieved. We are reviewing university funding levels in the light of the improvements in train in that sector. University college, Swansea, and the right hón. Gentleman's constituency should benefit from these policies as much as the rest of the country.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to One o'clock.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Irina Ratushinskaya

9.35 am

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): I wish formally to present two petitions on behalf of the members of St. Mary's church in Nottingham and another on behalf of the residents of the county of Nottinghamshire, who pray

That the poetess Irina Ratushinskaya is confined in a Soviet labour camp because of writing poetry, that she is in very poor health and in the view of her husband and her fellow prisoners her life is in danger.

They continue to pray that the Foreign Secretary will work for her release.

Anyone with an ounce of humanity, no matter of what political conviction or origin, would be appalled at the grounds of imprisonment of Irina Ratushinskaya and the conditions in which she is kept. I give my wholehearted support to the petition and I hope that her release will be on the agenda during the forthcoming visit of the Soviet Foreign Minister.

To lie upon the Table.

Policing (London)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

9.36 am

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Never in peacetime has there been a more challenging year for the Metropolitan police, and never have its operations been more under the seachlight. This is an important debate in the policing year for London. It gives the Home Secretary a chance to account for his stewardship as the police authority. It gives right hon. and hon. Members the chance to criticise and make suggestions publicly. Of course, it is not the only chance, and I welcome the many interventions which come to me throughout the year from hon. Members representing London constituencies, even though I do not always agree with them. It is my duty to listen carefully to them and I also attach great importance to the periodic meetings that I have with them.

Before we get into the issues of the policing of London, it is worth taking a brief step back to consider the general portrait. The Metropolitan police is a big force, nearly 27,000 strong. It is now expanding again and will cost the ratepayer and taxpayer £850 million this year.

The force must cope not just with a crime rate which has been increasing fairly steadily for 30 years now, but with a constantly changing variety within that crime rate. There is ceaseless vigilance against terrorism. Drugs are the latest and most dramatic element within the scope of organised, large-scale crime. The force must cope with specific events, and obviously we think especially of the two riots in London last autumn. It must also cope with other events which swallow up many police officers in inevitable duties. The industrial dispute outside Wapping still involves several hundred police officers a day and at its maximum up to 1,700 or 1,800 officers on one evening. For football matches, 850 officers may be required on an average Saturday during the season. People exercise their legitimate right to demonstrate and there were five demonstrations last year in London which required more than 1,000 police officers.

The Metropolitan police perform that variety of tasks firmly within the British tradition of unarmed force under the law of reasonable force—the law with which all hon. Members are acquainted, which binds a police officer just as much as it binds any other citizen. It is worth remarking, in view of much that is written and feared, that firearms were used by the Metropolitan police five times last year. When I was in New York in May, I was told that the New York city police used firearms on 238 occasions. That is a contrast to which we must hold.

Before I deal with the inevitable complaints, criticisms and suggestions, the first fair comment must be that the job that I have described is well done. The House would not be doing its duty if it did not return that verdict, and the thanks which should go with it.

The police have to cope with strains and tensions in all our inner cities. I suppose that they are most formidable in London. No one, certainly not the police, supposes that they can cope alone with these strains and tensions. They are the front line in dealing with crime and disorder, but they are only part of the array of institutions and agencies —central, local and voluntary — that are needed to handle the results of the social and industrial revolutions in our cities.

[Mr. Douglas Hurd]

It is important to make that point. I do not doubt that the Metropolitan police need more men and new equipment, and the media tend to focus on decisions in that area. But however many police are on the streets and however much equipment is available to them, it is not by these means alone that the strains will be eased and that society in our inner cities will be made more stable. Obviously, there needs to be more of a concerted effort by this array of institutions and agencies in order to encourage and stabilise the hearts of our cities.

In this effort the police play a big part. I note the comment of a Brixton youth worker in the Commissioner's report. He said:

"Life here could have been better if every agency had worked as hard as the police to make changes."

I should like to deal with three parts of the police effort —not with the enforcement process, with which I shall deal in a minute, but with the process of working with other agencies to obtain and build up the confidence and understanding of the citizens of London whom the police protect. An important strand of this policy is the continued development of community consultative groups under section 106 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. At the last count these groups had been established in 35 of the 40 boroughs and districts within the Metropolitan police district. The Commissioner hopes that groups will have been set up in the remainder by the end of this year.

Of course they vary, but several of the groups have now proved their worth over two years or more. They give the police a better feel for what most concerns local people, and they enable the police to explain their response to these concerns and the difficulties and constraints under which they operate. In times of crisis—this was certainly true in Brixton last autumn—they provide a safety valve for the expression of community anxiety, or even anger.

That was very noticeable in Lambeth and Brixton last autumn when the people voted with their feet by going to the meeting of the consultative group rather than to the rival meeting that had been organised by the council's police committee. These groups are becoming well established. It is very important that they should remain alive, responsive and as representative as possible of the diverse communities which they serve.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the Home Secretary tell the House why there is a problem in the five boroughs in which groups have yet to be set up? There are profound and honestly held disagreements between the police and the local communities in those areas. Is the Home Secretary satisfied that they can be swiftly resolved so that both sides feel that an adequate outcome has been reached and that a victory has not been scored by one side over the other?

Mr. Hurd: I sympathise with that point. There are gaps, but I hope that they will soon be filled. There is a particularly important problem in Haringey, which I very much hope can be solved. The gaps arise for different reasons. So far, the negotiations have not succeeded, for a variety of reasons. There has been a series of negotiations in which the Home Office has tried to be helpful. I shall ask my hon. Friend the Minister of State to be more specific about the five gaps when he winds up the debate.

My main point is that these consultative groups, although they are now enshrined in statute, are not basically a bureaucratic concept. They are an attempt, in the sphere of policing, to solve a problem that is recognised by all hon. Members — the danger of remoteness between those who exercise authority in the different spheres and those whom they seek to serve. The danger of remoteness is particularly difficult in London, which is a city of villages and many small and varied communities.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): In those areas where the local police want to co-operate with the newly established police committees that have been set up by the local authorities, does the Home Secretary accept that they ought to be able to do so?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, of course they can do that. The problem about the police committees—I mentioned the Lambeth police committee—is that so often they seem to have a different aim. In Lambeth, the contrast between the consultative committee, which enjoys a great deal of confidence among the ethnic minorities, and the police committee, which seems to have an anti-police and highly politicised purpose, does a great deal of harm.

The second area in which I am sure that the police are and should be active is in making further progress in the recruitment of officers from ethnic minorities. Last year, 44 recruits from ethnic minorities joined the force. There are now 307 in the force, compared with 138 in 1981. That is progress, but the figure is still far too low. The Commissioner and I both want to see many more black and Asian recruits, to make the force more representative of the community that it serves. This requires a sustained effort by the police. It also requires a sustained effort by influential people within the communities concerned.

For his part, the Commissioner has reviewed recruitment procedures and has canvassed a wide range of bodies and individuals for practical suggestions. As the House will have seen from the press, special recruitment exercises have been mounted in areas with large black populations. That effort will continue. I can quite understand why some people from the ethnic minorities are reluctant to join what may be represented to them as a racially prejudiced organisation. I am sure that they are wrong to take that line. There is no place for racism in the police service, and where it exists it must be rooted out. I strongly support the Commissioner in his efforts, through training and better supervision, to ensure that all officers treat individuals fairly and with respect.

This leads me to my third point, which is often raised legitimately, in particular by Opposition Members: response to racial attacks. This is a serious problem. It is perfectly right that information about racial attacks should be conveyed to the public as a whole, outside the areas that are mainly affected. A racial attack is aimed at a whole community, not just at an individual. It is this extra dimension which makes a racial attack so abhorrent. Last week I had a useful and interesting discussion with the Joint Committee against Racialism. I know that Sir Kenneth Newman shares my view that everything possible must be done to prevent such incidents and to apprehend and prosecute those who are responsible for them.

The approach of the Metropolitan police to these attacks is based on two propositions, which are not yet as widely known as they should be outside the police force. The first is that any incident should be regarded as racial if the victim or anybody else believes it to have been racially motivated. That is a quite revolutionary principle in policing terms. It is important that it should be applied throughout the Metropolitan police and that it should be understood by the members of the ethnic communities.

The second principle is that the suspected presence of a racial motive warrants a higher level of response from the police to an incident than it would otherwise receive. That, too, is a quite revolutionary principle in policing.

New approaches to the problem, involving the police in working with other local agencies, have been tried out on a pilot basis in five different parts of London. The lessons learnt have recently been issued in the form of new guidance to all operational commanders. These stress the value of follow-up visits to victims, the use of crime prevention officers to give advice and the involvement of experienced detectives. Neighbourhood watch schemes can also have a part to play in combating racial attacks.

However, the police need to know when and where attacks are occurring in order to respond effectively. It is natural that victims should be reluctant, for all sorts of reasons, to report incidents, but it is essential that they should overcome their reluctance. They will be more willing to do that if they feel assured that they will receive a sympathetic response from the police. The encouragement of local community leaders is all-important. There has to be mutual trust between them and the police, and that is what the police are aiming for.

I deliberately began with these aspects of policing in London because of frequent comments from people, some of whom should know better, that the Metropolitan police ignore these aspects. I doubt whether any police force in the world pays more attention to informing itself of what is going on in its patch, and to seeking to work with the citizens whom it protects.

The riots last autumn showed the need for intensifying these efforts, not abandoning them. That is not the only lesson. I greatly appreciate the way in which the Commissioner conducted his review of these events, the results of which were made known a few days ago. This was the result of an exercise in internal consultation by the Commissioner, in debriefing and gaining information from his men of all ranks. He deliberately engaged on this painstaking and inevitably rather slow operation to deal with the effect on morale of the riots last autumn. I admire the careful way in which the mistakes were analysed and presented to the public and the lessons drawn will help to restore the position.

As a result of his report, the Commissioner convinced me, and probably all hon. Members, that his force needed more men and equipment. When we took office in 1979, the strength of the Metropolitan police was 22,225, 16 per cent. below an establishment that had not been properly reviewed for many years. I comment on those figures because they are part of the story. Over the next four years, the strength grew steadily. By the end of 1983, it had increased by more than 4,500, to around 26,700. The strength of the civil staff, most of whom work in direct support of police officers, had also grown substantially.

In London, as in the rest of England and Wales, there was a second phase. The phase of growth was followed by a period of consolidation. There was a further modest growth, with the emphasis on making better use of existing resources. This must be right, and no Government will be pushed off that course. The resources devoted to the Metropolitan police are massive by any standards and the taxpayer and the ratepayer have a right to be confident that they are getting value for money.

There has been a strong drive to replace police officers by civil staff where they are doing desk jobs that do not require polce powers, training or experience. Over 300 officers were released for operational duty in this way in 1984-85 and 1985-86. The Commissioner intends that the reorganisation of his force should release a further 200 officers. To put the figures into some kind of perspective, I point out that the number of officers released through civilianisation is equivalent to the manpower of an average Metropolitan police division. That is quite an achievement.

My announcement to the House on 20 May marked the beginning of a third phase. It became clear last autumn that the escalating demands from crime, public disorder and terrorism were putting the Metropolitan police under pressure. I set in hand an urgent review to assess the proven need for additional manpower, taking into account the scope for increasing the operational strength of the force by further civilianisation and other efficiency methods. In May, after the review, I was able to announce a programme of steady expansion over the next four years. During this new phase, we shall not be allowing the emphasis on efficiency and effectiveness to falter.

The force will receive an increase of up to 1,200 in the police establishment over the next four years, on top of the 50 to which I agreed in principle last October. There will be an increase of up to 600 in the civil staff ceiling to help further with civilianisation. That should release at least a further 400 officers for operational duty. The effect of the reorganisation will amount to an increase in operational strength of 1,850, when the effects of the Commissioner's reorganisation are taken into account. As a first stage, I have already approved increases of 350 in the police establishment and 150 in the civil staff ceiling for 1986-87. These increases have to be phased to maintain the present high calibre of recruits and their training.

The exact deployment of this manpower will be a matter for the Commissioner. He plans to strengthen the squads dealing with serious crime, including drugs and fraud, and there will be additional resources for anti-terrorist and protection duties. However, he intends to allocate the lion's share to ordinary policing duties in divisions. I look forward to seeing a steady increase in the number of officers on the streets. We all know from our postbags and visits to different parts of London that this is what people living in London want.

As a result of the review, the Commissioner asked my authority to purchase a number of additional items of equipment. In my reply on 2 July to a question from the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), I announced that I had authorised the purchase of 700 additional radios, 80 protected personnel carriers, 24 ballistically protected vehicles and 1,500 long truncheons. I shall add a word of explanation about this equipment.

The protected personnel carriers are "minibus" style vans with some protection against missile attack, which the Metropolitan police will use for transporting teams of officers where there is disorder. The ballistically protected vehicles are specially armoured Land Rovers, needed to provide proper protection against firearms and sustained attack by petrol bombs. They will enable the police, when necessary, to go into the heart of a riot in safety. The vehicles are for use only in serious disorder and will not go out as normal patrol. They are being built as quickly as possible, but it will be some time before they are ready. In the meantime, the Metropolitan police are arranging temporarily to borrow a number of armoured protected vehicles from the Ministry of Defence. Attacks on the police at Tottenham involved the use of long poles and other similar weapons—many hon. Members will have seen these attacks on television—and unfortunately the police were unable to respond effectively with their shields and present issue truncheons. Hence the request for the longer truncheons and hence the authority that I have given the Commissioner to buy them. They will provide the police with a response to such a situation if ever, unfortunately, such a response is needed. Thus, it will make it less necessary to go further up the scale of response.

As I told the House on 2 July, the long truncheons are to be used only in serious disorders. They will play no part in normal day-to-day policing. I make no apology for having authorised this list of equipment—not for the everyday activities of the Metropolitan police but to ensure that they are not exposed to any unnecessary harassment, trouble, or perhaps loss of life, in moments of extreme difficulty.

However, to argue, as some have, that by asking for this equipment the Commissioner has changed the nature of the police force is absurd nonsense in the light of the facts that I have given to the House about the way in which the Metropolitan police organise their affairs.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): It might be useful at this point to add that the concern of hon. Members is not just the one that the right hon. Gentleman has just mentioned; widespread training in riot techniques, the way in which riot police, are deployed, and the purpose to which they are put at any one time are of equal, if not greater, importance.

The Secretary of State may recall that I sent him a four-page account of what happened on the nights of 29 and 30 March, and I think that he will agree that my eye-witness account of the deployment of riot police and the claims of the Commissioner to the Home Secretary in his letter, and his letter to me of 14 May are incompatible. Are not the important factors the ways in which new equipment and existing equipment are deployed, and training for their use?

Mr. Hurd: Of course, the training is crucial. The police have to be trained to deal with all manner of situations to which they may be exposed. That training needs modification from time to time, and inevitably has been modified as a result of the disorders of last year. It is essential that in every case the operations continue to be conducted under the general principles of an unarmed force and under the law of reasonable force.

As the hon. Member said, there is controversy about the methods of deployment at Wapping. I have gone through this carefully with a number of right hon. and hon. Members who came to see me about it. I have analysed it carefully with the Commissioner and where there are specific complaints and points they should be looked into. The hon. Gentleman is moving me from a general point, upon which I do not think we disagree, to the disagreements that we have about deployment at Wapping. I wish that there was no need for the deployments at Wapping and for the distractions which divert the police from the task of protecting Londoners from ordinary crime. I do not think the hon. Gentleman can argue that the situation at Wapping can simply be left unpoliced.

Drug trafficking is proably the single most threatening form of major crime. Last year the Commissioner increased the strength of the central drug squad by 50 per cent. from 38 to 57 from within existing resources. In May, I confirmed the agreement that I had earlier given in principle to an increase of 50 in police establishment for 1986-87 specifically to strengthen the force's efforts against drugs. The manpower increases which I announced should enable the Commissioner in due course to reinforce this effort still further.

Even in advance of getting these extra men, the central drug squad has proved highly effective. During 1985 it removed 40 major trafficking organisations from London. Those organisations had been dealing in heroin and cocaine and producing amphetamines. On the preventive side, the squad produced a lecture package about drug misuse which has been given to all community liaison officers.

None of us can be complacent about the size of the task that not only the police face in the matter of drugs. The low price and the high purity of the drugs still being peddled on the streets of London are grim indicators of the amount of drugs still reaching this country. I came back from a recent visit to New York greatly sobered by what I learned about the affliction of drugs that hangs over that city. We are lucky in comparison to New York. In New York I heard what are perhaps the toughest cops in the world saying that, whatever powers and resources they had, the key to the problem was education to reduce the demand. The educational preventative side is the area in which we need to redouble our efforts.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I apologise to the Home Secretary for having missed the beginning of his speech. No doubt he will have seen a report in the London Standard and will have had reports from the United States about crack, a new form of cocaine which is exceedingly cheap and which addicts find exceedingly effective. It is damaging to them. The Home Secretary said that he was in the States recently. What liaison is he maintaining between the Metropolitan police and police in the States to try to make sure that a crack epidemic does not hit London?

Mr. Hurd: There is close liaison. The hon. Member is quite right to draw attention to crack. It is a terrible scourge in New York city. A year or two ago it was simply something that a few eccentric people dabbled with in Los Angeles, but it then spread to an amazing extent. It is very cheap, potent and effective, as the hon. Member knows. Police forces throughout England and Wales are in close touch about the American experience, which so far, happily, has not reached our cities—at least not to any significant extent.

Less dramatic but hardly less worrying to Londoners is the steady onset of general crime, which has been continuing steadily for 30 years. It may have slowed down slightly last year, but it is still relentless. The Commissioner made it part of his force's goal last year to enhance the detection of specified offences, including robbery, burglary, drug misuse and racial attacks. Overall, the number of serious offences recorded by the Metropolitan police in 1985 was 3 per cent. higher than the year before. This total conceals worrying increases of 7 per cent. in offences of violence against the person and of 11 per cent. in robbery. It also obscures a heartening decrease of 8 per cent. in burglaries, including an 11 per cent. drop in burglaries from dwellings.

The number of arrests made for serious offences and the number of offences cleared up both rose by 6 per cent. Arrests and clear-ups increased in every offence category except burglary. This represents an improvement in the performance of the force against crime in a year when there were heavy demands from other quarters as well.

Although in everyone's opinion the clear-up rate is disappointingly low as a total percentage, it improved slightly last year, and for the most serious offences—homicide, sexual offences and violence against the person—the clear-up rates are much higher than average. The Metropolitan police have continued to invest a great deal of energy and commitment in crime prevention. This is a portfolio which has many aspects and there is huge scope for the expansion and greater effectiveness of crime prevention.

The item in the portfolio which has captured the public imagination is neighbourhood watch. The number of schemes has continued to multiply, and now stands at about 5,000 in London alone. There are encouraging signs that schemes are now beginning to spread from the suburbs into the inner city and the orange and blue neighbourhood watch sign has become a familiar feature in the streets of many parts of London.

It is important that local authorities—I am thinking here of Greenwich—which have been suspicious and obstructive about the neighbourhood watch schemes and have held up their development by withholding planning permission, should realise the importance of what is being done. Many of those who live in watch areas speak enthusiastically of falls in the level of burglary. With proper caution, the Commissioner is not at this stage making any large claims about the overall effectiveness of neighbourhood watch. This is not a sign of scepticism; it is simply that it is sensible to wait until it has been fully evaluated before reaching a general judgment.

The anecdoted and pieces of evidence coming to the surface about neighbourhood watch are encouraging about its impact on crime levels. Quite apart from that, there can be no doubt that neighbourhood watch has led to a greater feeling of security in many areas and has reduced the sense of helplessness in the face of crime. That is because a joining scheme is a practical, positive step that citizens can take to protect their own property and that of their neighbours.

Many right hon and hon. Members have longer acquaintance with the Metropolitan police than I have, but we all work in London and I hope that we all regard it as our force. Certainly, no responsible party can shelter within its ranks those who go out of their way to exploit every difficulty in which the police may find themselves or who try for political reasons to build up hostility to the police. I have deliberatly not developed those themes because this is not the occasion on which that should be done. This is a sufficiently practical feature in the day-by-day policing of London to find some part in this debate. Those who have pretensions to be taken seriously as supporters of the police cannot at the same time support for election to this House or to the boroughs of London those who slyly or in the open are enemies of the police. There will be occasions on which we can develop these points with practical evidence, and we shall not hesitate to do so.

Mr. Tony Banks: Give us some names.

Mr. Hurd: There is no shortage of names and in future there will be an opportunity to deploy them. My own impression, which I hope is widely shared, after nine months of being responsible for the police authority in London, is the professionalism of the force. There is the professionalism of the Commissioner and the leadership, but equally striking is the professionalism of the new recruits. I hope that all hon. Members will take the opportunity to meet and talk to the recruits.

I am sure that we were right to phase the further expansion which I announced on 20 May so as to make sure that there was no dilution of quality or lowering of standards in the intake.

The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) was right in what he said about the importance of training. Anyone who visits Hendon and sees what is going on there will be impressed.

The essence of professionalism is that professionals are never satisfied with their achievements and are conscious that they must have an open ear to the criticisms and suggestions that are made; that is true of the Metropolitan police and certainly true of training.

The police are professional in the versatility with which they cope with all their various tasks and they are also professional in the strength and sternness of the discipline arrangements. That is crucial. There was a long series of exchanges and developments about the incident some time ago in Holloway road and I am glad that the stalemate in that case was resolved.

The discipline point has been greatly reinforced by the effectiveness of the new Police Complaints Authority, which was illustrated most vividly by the swift way in which the police took over the supervision after the shooting of Mrs. Groce in Brixton.

We, the House and Londoners are right to be anxious about the rate of crime and the way it rises and has risen steadily during the lifetime of the previous Government and of this, and, indeed, for much longer than that. The police have no time to be despondent about that. They have to get on with the job of protecting London and Londoners. We have an admirable force, admirably led, and I hope that the account that I have given will help to show that they deserve the support and understanding of every Londoner.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): First, I apologise to the House for being unable to stay until the end of the debate. I have long-standing engagements in South Wales later today, including meetings with the police there, which it would have been difficult for me to rearrange.

The past year has seen a further rise in crime in London and little evidence that, despite their very best efforts, the police are having much success in coping with that increase in crime. The Commissioner's report for 1985 contains all the reasons both for the rise in crime and for the frustrations of his force at being unable to respond as adequately as he would wish to the record crime wave.

[Mr. Gerald Kaufman]

The Commissioner deals first with the manpower shortage in the force, although he does not devote sufficient attention to certain aspects of that shortage. As the Home Secretary admitted, the failure to attract appreciable numbers of the ethnic minorities into the force continues, without any real remedies being put forward to counter that failure.

It is perfectly true that part of the problem lies in insufficient numbers from the ethnic minorities coming forward to join the force, but insufficient attention is paid to why too few come forward. One reason is perceptions among the minority communities about racialism in the police. The Commissioner's report should have devoted more than the most cursory passing reference to that undeniable problem, to which the home Secretary referred today.

What seem to be serious examples of an attitude in parts of the force that should be dealt with firmly are given in the Islington crime survey, a remarkable statistical compendium which throws much light on crime and fear of crime in that part of London. The survey shows that three quarters of young blacks, male and female, believe that the police treat them unfairly. That view is given weight by statistics on the use of stop and search powers which demonstrate that, while 31·6 per cent. of white males under 25 were stopped in Islington for search purposes—that itself is a remarkably high figure—the rate for young blacks being stopped was 52·7 per cent. Until firm action is taken to root out racialism, many black and Asian men and women will feel that policing is not a career for them.

In any case, application to join the force is not necessarily a passport to acceptance. The statistics in the Commissioner's report show that, while, overall, 19 per cent. of applicants for the force were interviewed last year, the proportion of applicants from the ethnic minorities who were interviewed was not 19 per cent. but 15 per cent.

The same discrimination continues to be shown against women. Despite continuing denials that a quota of 10 per cent. is operated for women, the proportion of women in the Metropolitan police continues to hover at somewhat below that figure—9·4 per cent. last year, almost exactly the same as the year before. Again, that is not surprising. While 21 per cent. of male applicants were interviewed, the figure for women was 16 per cent. While 63 per cent. of men interviewed were accepted, the figure for women was only 53 per cent.

Of course, the Commissioner's main worry is the size of his total force. He complains constantly that he has too few policemen and policewomen and that the response of the Home Secretary to his lamentations is distinctly inadequate. It certainly fails to live up to those grandiloquent promises of the Prime Minister at last year's Conservative party conference that the police had only to show need and they would be given what they needed. The famous blank cheque was taken to the bank and it bounced.

Whether the Metropolitan police need more men and women is open to argument and to proof. What is certain, and what emerges from every piece of evidence offered by the most impeccable authorities, is that such manpower as is available is not being used to maximum effect. That is a further argument in the case put forward by the Commissioner.

In one of the plethora of almost meaningless homilies to which the Home Secretary has taken to subjecting us, he said on 29 May:

"I therefore expect to see a steady increase in the number of officers on foot patrol, deterring the criminal and the hooligan and protecting and reassuring the citizen."

He said much the same thing today. But the answer to that pious aspiration that emerges from the Commissioner's report and from his strategy report issued in January this year is—fat chance.

That blighted statute, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, against whose lack of efficacy we warned during its prolonged passage through the House, is cited again and again by the Commissioner as one reason why he is hampered in his fight against crime. On page 14 of his report the Commissioner complains:

"Further drains on our street duty officers are caused by training commitments arising out of new legislation."

He draws attention to the limited time for teaching his force what he calls

"the complexities of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act."

On page 68 of his report he complains about "serious restrictions" on his scope being imposed by the training requirements of the Act. On page 73 he points out that his policing skills programme had to be suspended due to the "extensive training demands" imposed by the Act. Understandably, he describes that as "frustrating".

Mr. Hurd: It is perfectly true, as the Commissioner reasonably points out, that when there is a major new piece of legislation, police officers have to be trained. What they are being trained in is essentially new safeguards for the citizen. The right hon. Gentleman is a fair man and he will acknowledge that, although the new Act is complex, it is simplicity itself compared with what it would have been if we had accepted the amendments constantly put forward by the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends.

Mr. Kaufman: The safeguards to which the right hon. Gentleman refers are necessary only because of the unacceptable powers which have been inserted in the Act. If the Government had not given the police powers, against which we strongly argued during the 59 sittings on the Act, the safeguards which require this training, to which the Commissioner draws attention, would never be necessary.

On page 75 of his report the Commissioner states that he has been unable to implement a crime prevention training programme for operational constables, sergeants and inspectors due to the demands of training for the Police and Criminal Evidence Act.

In his strategy report, Sir Kenneth spells out the problem even more starkly. On page 47 of the strategy report, he says:

"I am concerned that future demands being placed on the Force, in particular those that will arise from implementation of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act and other legislative requirements will, unless additional resources in terms of manpower and finance are made available, increasingly dissipate our capability to fully address ourselves to any emergent problems."

Again, the strategy report states the problem very bluntly. The Commissioner says:

"The levels of deployment of street duty constables, which includes home beat officers but not the district support units, was affected by the miners' strike. The Force has worked to maximise this visible element of policing because, among other factors, there is evidence that street patrolling reduces public fear of crime. Results, however, have been marginal. The pressures of public order and training have militated against major gains in this area."

The Commissioner's annual report says the same, as does another document which is perhaps even more damning, as it comes from the most senior officer of the House who is empowered to assess the efficiency and cost-effectiveness of public services. In his report on the Metropolitan police, which was issued less than three months ago, the Comptroller and Auditor General said:

"There were also occasions when external demands (eg for public order duties elsewhere) left insufficient numbers to maintain essential services".

If training is depleting the force's ability to respond to crime, let alone to seek to prevent it, public order duties are having what in many respects is a crippling effect. The Home Secretary and the Commissioner seem at times to be obsessed with public order — sometimes to the apparent exclusion of all other issues. Outbreaks of public order are, of course, repugnant and frightening. Whatever the causes, there can be no justification for violence and rioting. The public are understandably horrified when they see scenes of arson and mayhem on their television screens.

At the same time, it is very important to put such disturbing outbreaks into perspective, even when we are considering a year in which the Brixton and Tottenham riots took place, during which Police Constable Keith Blakelock and Mr. David Hodge were killed, and in connection with which Mrs. Cynthia Jarrett died and Mrs. Cherry Groce was shot and paralysed. The House will wish today to offer its renewed sympathies to the bereaved families and to Mrs. Groce.

Alarming as those disturbances were, they accounted for only a small proportion of crime in the Metropolis in 1985: 1,251 alleged offences out of a total of 732,559 offences in the Metropolis for the year. That is less than one fifth of one per cent. of the total. The number of public order offences in the Metropolitan police area last year amounted to 638, or 0·8 per cent. of the total. That is far fewer than one in a thousand. Yet, from the reaction of both the Commissioner and the Home Secretary, one would think that public order was the principal law and order problem in London, and in the country as a whole.

In the case of the Home Secretary, one cannot help feeling that that indefensibly disproportionate concentration on a fraction of 1 per cent. of all crime in London is a deliberate distraction from the abject failure of his and the Government's policies on law and order. Today was a very good example. The Home Secretary spoke for 24 minutes before he mentioned non-public order crime, and in a speech of 35 minutes he spent exactly three minutes —I timed it on my stopwatch—on the record outbreak of crime that is afflicting London.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I noticed the right hon. Gentleman's somewhat Freudian slip when he spoke about outbreaks of public order, and it may tell the House a little about some of his unspoken attitudes. However, to rest his case on the number of offences that are associated with public order is to misunderstand the problem. The whole problem, as stated by the Commissioner, is that it is very manpower-intensive for the police in London to have to allocate so many of their available men to the policing of public demonstrations and other public order problems.

Mr. Kaufman: I shall come shortly to the question of whether the police have to do that, as distinct from their being willing to, or wishing to. But let us look at one example. Huge sums of public money are misdirected to such events as the policing of the industrial dispute at News International at Wapping. More than 662,000 police man hours have been misapplied to that exercise. As much as 7 per cent. of the whole Metropolitan police force has been stationed there on one given occasion and nearly £1·5 million of public money has been spent on buttressing Mr. Rupert Murdoch's refusal to negotiate reasonably with those with whom he is in dispute. When criminals are running amok in London and throughout Britain, in many cases almost uncontrollably, it is unacceptable that the long-suffering police should be used against their will as a private security service to enable Mr. Rupert Murdoch to pocket his profits.

On this issue of public order, massive reports are compiled, weighty speeches are delivered and vast amounts of cash and equipment are allocated. I only wish that a fraction of that Government attention was devoted to the 99·9 per cent. of crimes which afflict Londoners and which mean that each London family has a 41 per cent. chance of being a victim of crime. Every survey of public opinion in London shows that there is an enormous fear of crime in the capital.

The Islington survey showed that crime was regarded as the second biggest problem in the borough, not far behind unemployment. Nearly half of all women in Islington worry about being raped, sexually molested or pestered. The survey showed that over a quarter of all people in Islington always avoid going out after dark because of their fear of crime, and that figure rises to over one third in the case of women. Those fears no doubt apply much more widely than to one borough or city.

The statistical section of the Broadwater Farm report, the part which everyone, regardless of his views on the report as a whole, will accept, shows that people on the Broadwater Farm estate wanted the police to concentrate on sexual assaults on women, heroin control, mugging, burglary and racial assaults. About 80 per cent. of all age groups and both sexes, including young blacks, saw crime as a big problem, and saw the top priorities for the police as being an immediate response to 999 calls, the detection of criminals, the deterrence of crime and crime prevention advice.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the problems about the statistics produced by the Metropolitan police is that there is a deliberate understatement of the number of racially motivated and racist attacks in London because of the method of collecting those statistics? Should not a clear instruction be sent to all police stations requesting much more vigilance in reporting racist attacks and racial incidents?

Mr. Kaufman: My hon. Friend has drawn attention to an important point which applies, for different reasons, to rape as well. We do not know the figures for some of the most serious offences. On Monday, I and my hon. Friends will meet the Home Secretary to discuss the whole question of racial attacks, and to see whether there is a basis upon which we can agree to legislate on the matter. I am glad that the Home Secretary devoted some attention to that point in his speech.

The apprehensions of those cited in the Islington and Broadwater Farm surveys are confirmed by a special survey that was conducted last August for the Metropolitan police by National Opinion Polls, and which was published in the Commissioner's strategy report. It showed that 68 per cent. of Londoners feared having their home broken into and having something stolen, that 63 per cent. feared having their home or property damaged, that 62 per cent. were afraid of being mugged or robbed, that 61 per cent. of women were afraid of being raped, that 60 per cent. of women feared being sexually molested and pestered, and that 54 per cent. of Londoners, male and female, feared being attacked by strangers.

Many of these fears are justified. In Islington, over the year which was surveyed, 31 per cent. of households had a serious crime committed against them. Crime is running rife in London. The one success last year was a reduction in the burglary level, and I heartily congratulate the Metropolitan police on the part that it played in this achievement. Unfortunately, however, it has not been maintained. The first quarter's figures for this year show that last year's 8 per cent. reduction in burglary has levelled off to a 1 per cent. drop.

The record on robbery, theft and criminal damage has also worsened. The situation was bad enough last year, when offences of theft rose by 33 per cent., violence against the person by 7 per cent., criminal damage by 10 per cent., robbery by 11 per cent., and fraud and forgery by 11 per cent. Racial attacks, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) has drawn attention, rose disturbingly. As my hon. Friend has said, these attacks cannot adequately be quantified.

Mr. Tony Banks: I know that when my right hon. Friend sees the Home Secretary on Monday he will talk about racial incidents that are recorded in the Metropolitan police area and nationally. I ask him to draw the attention of the Home Secretary to the disturbing increase in racial attacks in Newham, which, together with Tower Hamlets, records the largest number of racial attacks each year. This is a worrying and disturbing problem and one which concerns all those who represent Tower Hamlets and Newham.

Mr. Kaufman: I shall do that. We have a disturbing number of racial attacks in my constituency in Manchester and I shall be discussing that as part of the general problem. The Home Secretary, however, is the police authority for London, and I have no doubt that he will take particular account of that direct responsibility when I see him on Monday.

Crime presents a bleak picture, and one which continues to become bleaker. The deterioration in law and order in London in the seven years since the Government came to power can be described only as alarming. The clear-up rate continues to be extremely disappointing as well as very expensive. Last year the overall clear-up rate for crime in London was a depressing 18 per cent. The clear-up rate for theft was only 17 per cent., and for burglary it was only 10 per cent. The cost of clearing up crime in London was huge. Last year, average gross police expenditure per cleared-up crime in the other 42 police districts in England and Wales was £1,800, but in London it was £7,000.

At the same time, crime continues to increase. Last year, 732,559 serious offences were reported as having been committed in London. That was a 29 per cent. increase on the 1978 figures. Violence against the person in London under this Government has increased by 43 per cent., while burglary has increased by 27 per cent. and criminal damage by 69 per cent.

Let us consider the number of crimes committed per 1,000 of the population, comparing the situation now with what it was when the Government came to office. All crime has increased by 41 per cent. Burglary has increased by 38 per cent., violence against the person by 57 per cent. and criminal damage by 84 per cent. When the Government took office, 65 serious crimes were committed every hour in the Metropolitan police area, and the figure is now 84. On the same basis, 39 crimes of violence were committed every day, and the figure is now 55. There were 183 cases of criminal damage every day and there are now 310. Burglaries have risen from 336 a day to 425. Thefts have risen from 888 a day to 1,058. When the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), who represents a London constituency, became Prime Minister, a serious crime happened somewhere in the metropolitan area every 56 seconds. There is now a serious crime committed every 44 seconds.

The fight against this disturbing escalation in crime is faltering. During the Prime Minister's period of office, the total clear-up rate in the Metropolitan police area has fallen from 21 per cent. to 18 per cent. The clear-up rate for theft has fallen from 20 per cent. to 17 per cent. For criminal damage, the rate has fallen from 14 per cent. to 11 per cent., and for burglary there has been a reduction from 11 per cent. to 10 per cent. The number of police officers has risen but the number of crimes per policeman or woman has risen faster, by 7 per cent. The clear-up rate per police officer has fallen by 14 per cent. under the Government. That is a devastating picture of crime in our capital and the surrounding areas.

The crime rate among young people continues to be especially disturbing. Of those arrested for notifiable offences, 48 per cent. were under 21 years of age. Of those arrested for robbery, 60 per cent. were under 21, and for burglary, 63 per cent. were under 21. Over 70 per cent. of those arrested for motor cycle theft were under 21.

Apart from the increasingly empty and unconvincing rhetoric that we have from the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister — we have had the right hon. Gentleman's speech today and there was the report of the Prime Minister's interview with The Guardian yesterday — what are the Government doing to try to prevent crime or to pursue it? The Home Secretary has said repeatedly that crime should not be a party political issue, and I agree with him. He says that crime has been rising, regardless of the Government who have been in power, for 30 years. Indeed, he said that again today. It seems, however, that the 30 years began in 1979. From 1974 to 1979 the Conservatives lost no opportunity of blaming crime on the Labour Government.

As the Government continue to mouth platitudes on law and order, it is right to ask what they are doing to cope with it. The best way of coping with crime is crime prevention, and there have been two seminars on crime prevention at 10 Downing street. Last week the Home Secretary gave a parliamentary answer nearly a column long in Hansard in which he claimed to list what the Government were doing to prevent crime. He might just as well not bothered to plant the question because the answer added up to nothing in particular.

The Prime Minister, in one of her unguarded moments, told the House in March that people ought to see to their own crime prevention. She said:

"Most people will and should be able to make their own provision for crime prevention." — [Official Report, 13 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 1079.]

The problem is that those who are most vulnerable to crime are those who are least able to take precautions against it. The Islington survey shows that income is a major factor in determining whether security devices are installed. Many people who would like to take crime prevention measures cannot afford to do so. That is why such measures cannot be left to the market and why the next Labour Government will introduce a safe estates policy and will make crime prevention grants available to both home owners and tenants.

As the Home Secretary admits and as the Commissioner proclaims, we must take action to tackle the causes of crime. What the causes include is made clear by the Commissioner in his review of civil disturbance that was issued a few days ago. His opening paragraph reads:

"In 1981, Lord Scarman in his report described the social conditions prevailing in the Borough of Lambeth and particularly in Brixton. These features are as prevalent today as they were then and in some instances may have become more acute. Such conditions create a society lacking in stability and community identity, in the absence of which policing by consent becomes more tenuous."

Sir Kenneth Newman filled out that picture in his strategy report. He said:

"there are many areas of the city of London which are among the most deprived in the country . . . . Unemployment in London has continued to rise more sharply than in the rest of the United Kingdom and long term unemployment in particular is a problem . . .. It is difficult to quantify the impact of such unemployment on policing demands but I believe it will further increase social polarisation which may cause problems for police. Along with those categorised as 'Long-term Unemployed', the levels of unemployed school-leavers and young people are of particular concern to police in a city under stress from a variety of socio-economic forces. Whilst the complex inter-relationship between unemployment and other social indicators makes it extremely difficult to draw any causal link with crime, it is nevertheless fair to say that large numbers of disaffected and bored young persons in an area are likely to become a police problem."

The Home Secretary confirmed that view in two speeches that he made earlier this month. He spoke about dereliction, despair, discrimination, crime and violence, social stress and polarisation. He talked about money that the Government were putting into the inner cities. He mentioned the urban programme, the rate support grant and the housing programme. The latest figures for the urban programme show a 3 per cent. cut for the relevant London boroughs this year. Under the Government rate support grant has been cut for the GLC area boroughs by £6,000 million. Under the Government, housing investment programme moneys have been cut for those boroughs by £1,200 million. Under the Government, unemployment in those boroughs has risen by 270,000. It has more than tripled.

The Home Secretary must persuade his colleagues that he should put our money — the taxpayers' money, the ratepayers' money — where his mouth is. He should quote to them the disturbing words of Commander Alex Marnoch, who was in charge of Brixton jail at the time of last autumn's riot. He said:

"if unemployment continues to rise and the stabilising middle-age black population continues its exodus to safer areas, further major disturbances will be inevitable."

Commander Marnoch called for fresh initiatives from the Government, the local council and education, housing and social services departments. That is not easy under rate-capping arrangements. Commander Marnoch continued:

"Unless there is an influx of extra jobs, or the population moves away, we are going to have serious problems."

The Home Secretary should remind his Cabinet colleagues of the words spoken by Lord Whitelaw when he was Opposition spokesman on such matters:

"A Government that cannot protect its own citizens from attack in the streets of its towns and cities, that cannot protect property from damage, or homes from intrusion, has failed to live up to the basic duties of Government."

Thatcherite slogans will not solve crime in London and elsewhere in Britain, nor will they help the police in their vital, dangerous and difficult task. Years of failure under the Government have demonstrably proved that. What we need is not shrill hectoring, but patient effort — not instand slogan solutions, but hard and dedicated work over a long period.

The objective must be to take unspectacular but sensible measures that have a chance of stemming the rise in crime and, with luck, begin to turn it back from the record levels which it reaches year by year under the Government. That needs a partnership between people, police, local government and national government. We in the Labour party are dedicated to bringing that partnership about.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. It will be evident to the House that many hon. Members wish to take part in this important debate. The debate will be interrupted by a statement at 11 o'clock. Therefore, I appeal for brief contributions.

10.44 am

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): It is always a pleasure to speak in a debate on the Metropolitan police because they are among the world's great police forces. They are undoubtedly one of the most accountable police forces. We are able to debate its affairs not only in this Chamber but in committee, in our consultations with the commissioner and his senior policy group, and, of course, with the police authority for London, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Over the years, the increase in both money and manpower in the Metropolitan police has been substantial. Spending has increased from £295 million in 1978-79 to over £850 million in 1986-87—a 40 per cent. increase in real terms. Manpower is capable of rising to an establishment of 28,415 against the dismal days of the early 1970s when the strength of the Metropolitan police was around the 20,000 mark.

In addition to uniformed police manpower, the Metropolitan police has received remarkable resources in the form of its civilian strength, which was 3,355 in 1965 as against a ceiling today of nearly 13,500. The resources given to the Metropolitan police are substantial. I think that all hon. Members welcome that.

All hon. Members understand that the problem that the Metropolitan police faces in dealing with crime is complicated. Ninety five per cent. of all crime which affects the lives of people who live within the Metropolitan police area—not only those living within the boundaries of the 32 London boroughs but those who reside in the nine parliamentary constituencies outside those boroughs that are policed by the Met — is crime that relates to motor vehicles which constitutes 30 per cent. of reported crime to the Metropolitan police. Opportunist burglary accounts for about 25 per cent. of the crime figure. The rest is made up of thefts, vandalism, and so on, which are a great inconvenience to the ordinary householder whether he lives in suburbia or on an inner city council estate. The more serious crimes, which account for 5 per cent. of the figure, include murders, rapes and serious robberies which attract a great deal of public attention.

If we are to tackle the other 95 per cent. of crimes, we must consider how the public can be involved in the prevention of those crimes in partnership with the police. Also, we must consider how local authorities and other institutional groupings can contribute to the prevention of crime. In terms of the auto crime problem, car perimeter security attempts to design out crime. That probably offers more hope for the control of such crime than do patrolling police officers.

We must recognise the real limitations that are placed on the effectiveness on the police in London. Although patrolling police officers are welcomed and are a general reassurance to the public, it is a fact that of the 95 per cent. of crimes, very few are prevented by patrolling police officers. That is certainly true of burglaries. They occur under circumstances of stealth in blocks of flats. People climb through back gardens and enter houses where windows and doors may have been left unlocked and where the home owner or the landlord has failed to provide proper resources for the prevention of such an offence. We cannot blame the police for increases in opportunist crime.

We should recognise that every year there is growth in the availability of goods and money to steal, and this is best illustrated by the auto crime problem. In 1948, there were 2·25 million motor vehicles on the street; in 1986, there are 17·25 million—little wonder that the problem of auto crime has grown year by year. The same is true of burglaries. The availability of money in flats and houses has made stealing attractive to youngsters. As we have heard, half the number arrested for committing such crimes are young people under 21, many of whom are still at school. In fact, the peak ages for offending are 14 or 15. We must consider the problem in the light of the fact that the education system seems to be so boring to many young people that they opt out of school.

The problems of resolving crime in London will not go away simply because there are more police officers and resources. They will be contained by what the community does in consultation with property owners, whether private or public. The Government are clearly in the vanguard in promoting crime prevention involving the whole community. I commend the experiences of the former Conservative-controlled London borough of Hammersmith and Fulham which introduced the scheme to which the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) seemed to refer — that of giving assistance to the poorer members of the community to install crime prevention devices on doors and windows. That scheme was effective. I hope that those ideas will be built on elsewhere, but they require the local authority's willing co-operation.

The good news about the Metropolitan police record is that its investigation and clear-up rate of serious crime is good, on the whole. The clear-up rate for murder is 93 per cent. or more and for robberies it is 70 per cent. The detection rate for other serious crimes is good and provides a deterrent. Crime prevention offers one of the most important hopes for London people.

I take issue with the suggestion that the use of the police on public order duties is a waste of their time. I wish that fewer demonstrations and public order events required the attendance of the police. The Labour party cannot escape its responsibility. So many of the demonstrations which are organised in central London owe their origin to the Labour party and its supporters. If the Labour party really cares about good policing of London and about the effective use of police resources, it should impose greater moderation on their supporters and on their use of the public highway.

The same is true of Wapping. I did not quite understand the intention of the right hon. Member for Gorton. Did he intend that the police should be withdrawn from the streets of Wapping? Did he intend that the mob should take over private property? Did he intend that anarchy should prevail? The right hon. Gentleman should make it clear exactly what his policies are.

The police consultative arrangements are important. Most of the London boroughs have willingly co-operated in establishing them. It is a great disappointment to those of us who strongly believe in police-public relationships and crime prevention that, so far, nine Labour-controlled boroughs are not taking part in these arrangements, despite the will of the House which has urged their creation. It is humbug for the Labour party to pretend an interest in crime prevention and in good police-public relations, but in practice, in the authorities which it controls, to deny the opportunity for that consultation to take place. It is significant that in the London borough of Haringey, for example, there is no police consultative arrangement. That is tragic and unhelpful from the point of view of the people living in the borough.

It is interesting that Lord Gifford's report, which is, of course, a partisan document, refers to greater consultation between the police and the community. It is significant that Lord Scarman said the same in his 1981 recommendations. It is tragic that sections of the Labour party in London deny the opportunity for this consultation to take place in large areas of London where police-public relations are crucial.

The House often has debates on the Metropolitan police. It is customary for Conservative Members to praise and support the police, but we must at the same time be fairly critical of them. I know of no London Member who does not receive complaints about the way in which the police relate to the public. The police force in London is young and well trained. Nevertheless, the first encounter of many members of the public with the police is often difficult. The police must readdress themselves to the issue of how they relate to the community, especially to young people. It is no good setting up structures for good public relations if the police on the beat cannot carry out the intention of those instructions in their relationships with individuals.

The commissioner's proposals for the reorganisation of the police force are very good. At long last we have achieved a command structure in London with the emphasis on decentralisation, sending down to the districts and divisions as much control and accountability for police action as possible. I think that Sir Kenneth Newman will be remembered as the commissioner who set in train the better structure, organisation and officer training of the Metropolitan police. Some of the benefits will take time to emerge, but I believe that we shall see them in the years ahead.

I have referred briefly to crime prevention. I believe that the role of the local authorities in working with the Metropolitan police to prevent opportunist crime will be one of the most important features of crime prevention. I hope that that role will be developed and extended in the years to come.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I welcome the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd) to his first debate on this subject since his appointment last autumn as Home Secretary. I welcome also his slightly less abrasive style of introducing the subject compared to that of his predecessor. Another change since last year's debate is the fact that the London-wide authority which took an interest in these matters—the Greater London council—no longer exists. I look forward to the day when there is—I say this with no disrespect to the Home Secretary—a broader and more democratic base for the authority over the London police force than one Government Minister.

I shall quietly issue one rebuke. I think that I am right in saying that on nearly all, if not all, occasions the Home Secretary fell into the trap of talking about police men in the context, for example, of the increase in police numbers as opposed to using less sexist language. I believe that he realises that we have and need more police women. Already there are a substantial number. In describing the police force in London, the Home Secretary should recognise the role that policemen are required to play.

As we contemplate policing in London in 1986, the first issue which we should consider is the environment in which policing occurs. The Home Office will be fighting a continual battle unless and until the trend of social decline in inner London is reversed. This is best evidenced by unemployment, especially in the inner London boroughs. Unless and until we reduce our massive unemployment, especially of young adults and men, the general level of social unrest and discontent will continue to increase and policing will inevitably be more difficult.

It being Eleven o'clock MR. SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 5 (Friday sittings).

European Communities (Budget)

11 am

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Peter Brooke—statement.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We had to ask yesterday for a statement about the EC budget and that was granted for today. However, as yet I have had no copy of the statement. The EC budget is an extremely complex matter. The Government are apparently proud of their achievements there and yet they cannot possibly reveal them to the Opposition spokesmen so that they can get a sight of them before the budget statement takes place. It is an utter disgrace. I cannot see what the Government think they are playing at. It is just another example of their sheer incompetence.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): I should like to respond to the point of order. The opening paragraph of my statement apologises to the official Opposition for any delay in delivering the statement to them. However, all the figures in it had to be double-checked with Brussels and Strasbourg during the morning. I apologise to the hon. Lady.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is absolutely outrageous. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mrs. McDonald) is expected to make a considered contribution to this statement and the following discussion without having had the opportunity to look at the statement. Surely we could at least defer it for half an hour or an hour so that the Opposition have an opportunity to look at it and study it properly.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that I have any authority to delay this statement. Perhaps the sensible thing would be to hear what the Minister has to say and take it from there.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Surely it is better for the House to have a little time to contemplate these complicated matters before asking questions off the cuff. Surely that makes sense.

Mr. Speaker: It seems that it would be for the general convenience of the House if the Opposition had an opportunity to study the statement. That being so, I shall return to the Chair at half past 11. I think that that will give us sufficient time for the statement.

Policing (London)

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

11.2 am

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Home Secretary in part alluded to the issue of drugs which gives rise to concern, but he did not mention alcohol. In 1983 and 1984 the battle against drugs was seen to be one of the chief concerns in the deployment of resources for the policing of London. One of the underlying trends on the street is that the problem is clearly increasing again and the initial success is now being overtaken by a growing general trend across the range of drug use, not just of heroin, which has been of chief concern, but of crack, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). We need to find ways in which we can not only contain the problem but develop a strategy which works to pick up, not only the big dealers, who are obviously the key to a successful reduction and restriction of drug dealing in London, but the dealers at the next tier. In all honesty, I fear that at the moment, the battle against continuing and pervasive drug use in London is at most being held, and certainly not being won. We need to find ways to continue more effectively to develop strategies and should not just content ourselves with the new structural ways of trying to deal with the problem.

I hope that the Home Secretary also recognises that if there is also a problem of regular and consistent alcohol abuse, especially by young people in areas of high numbers of licensed premises, particularly on Friday and Saturday nights, there will be a massive use of police personnel dealing with offences which are often caused by one person who has been drinking against another who has also been drinking. In London the number of offences is great, the level of serious crime is great, and the percentage of that affected by alcohol is substantial.

I am sure that the Home Secretary recognises the problems in all urban areas where drink and crimes committed by the young adult are often interlinked. One cannot ignore this link as part of the general responsibility that the Home Office has for the control of licensed premises and so on. I make no suggestion that there should be a censored society but I do make a suggestion that there should be more responsible decision-making as to where and how one can allow late-night entertainment to continue in places where it does maximum disservice to a local community, and where there has clearly been regular previous abuse within that community.

I now turn to prevention. One of the mechanisms set up as part of the process of making policing responsible and accountable to the community—policing by consent—is the consultative committees. The Minister of State is aware of that and it has been raised in the meetings that he and his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary have on a regular basis with me and my colleague, the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), and also with representatives from other parties in London.

There were to be consultative committees set up everywhere under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 but they are not all in place. There appears now to be a discrepancy about how many. The Home Secretary suggested that six local authorities do not have consultative committees. The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) suggested that there were nine. I know less about other areas than I know about Southwark. When the Minister winds up, I should be grateful if he would include reference to those points. I hope that he will say what he considers to be the ways forward and not look back in a recriminatory way. We need to find ways to establish and make effective these committees.

In Southwark there was a severe problem. Both sides felt that they had a good case. The local authority and impartial participants, such as the Church, in the person of the Bishop of Woolwich, Methodist ministers and so on, became involved and felt that the police were not being sufficiently responsive to the desire to integrate the community. There was the local authority-established consultative procedure and the police procedure. While there are two competitive procedures and both sides feel that the other is being unreasonable, we do not make progress in establishing a proper forum in which people can properly air their concerns in a public place.

Mr. Wheeler: Perhaps I can assist the hon. Gentleman with his point. My information about nine Labour-controlled boroughs not taking part in the scheme came from a document which those boroughs published called "Policing London, July-August 1986." I assume that it is correct in what it says.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. That is why it is important that the Minister, if he can, gives us the most up-to-date position and tells us of any plans to resolve those problems.

Another important area in the prevention of crime is the special prevention needed for the vulnerable in our society. Two of those groups have been mentioned—women and ethnic minorities. Clearly it is right that the police should be deployed to ensure that those people begin to feel the security which they do not feel at present. Another group which is increasingly vulnerable is old people. Nothing is more horrifying than the regular series of reported offences of the most savage type often committed by young people on old people, especially old people on their own. We need to establish—it applies particularly within policing—ways in which the police locally are aware of the places where old people live, whether privately or in council social services homes, residential accommodation, and the areas where old people are concentrated. They should try to direct, not only neighbourhood watch, but other local mechanisms for mutual support, so that there are many more ways in which old people can feel secure in their own homes. Not only do they now not feel secure outside, in the street, on the estate, in the lifts or on the staircases and so on; they often now feel insecure in their own homes. It must be a priority in terms of expenditure. We should look at ways of providing grants to provide methods to help such people without them having to try hard to find that help. The police should be seeking ways of preventing crime being directed at them.

With regard to the response to crime, it is welcome that the establishment is being increased. That will help. The sooner that happens, the better. It is welcome that increasing numbers of police in uniform are being released from civilian work. Since I have been in the House, I have sought to have that done—it is a proper development.

However, I remain to be convinced about the net effects of reorganisation, in terms of increased personnel. I am reassured that we are still to have a consultative level, according to the latest letter that I have received. It is to be on a local authority basis for the time being, with the abolition of the police districts. Particularly given that the consultation process was unsatisfactory, I hope that we shall see the rewards that we were originally promised. My recollection is that last year we were told that there would be 300 extra police officers on the ground. In his speech today, the Home Secretary suggested that there were 200. Unless I am mistaken, that is a counting down by some 50 per cent.

I shall be unhappy if the reorganisation does not produce substantial benefits in front-line policing. One of the arguments for it was that administrators would be taken away from New Scotland Yard so that there would need to be less bureaucracy. People need to see the service, not lots of bureaucrats. I am sure that the Minister of State will accept that. I hope that he will appreciate that the test of reorganisation will be the number of people on the ground delivering the policing service.

The Home Secretary must accept that he does not yet appear to have an adequate answer to an important point made by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) as to why, despite the massively increased cost and increased police numbers, we still have such an unsatisfactory clear-up rate compared with some time ago. This last year, there may have been a slight increase in some of the areas of clear-up, but it is less than the national average improvement. We must keep on questioning why the massively expensive police force in London does not do better in clearing up many of the areas of crime. I accept that murder and homicide have a good clear-up rate, but the intermediate levels of crime still have a poor clear-up rate. Intrusions into people's houses and some crimes of violence against people have low clear-up rates. We need to work particularly hard because it is unsatisfactory that so much time and effort is deployed to so little effect.

The Home Secretary gave the figures for the number of times last year that firearms were used in London—five, compared with 238 in New York. I recognise that, but the other important figure is the number of occasions on which police officers go out equipped with firearms. That is important, because the tradition of an unarmed police force is one that we want to sustain. None the less, it is increasingly in question because increasing numbers of police go out armed, and the authority for the police being armed either seems to be unjustified in retrospect, or is worrying to the community or both.

I accept that there has been an increase in the number of crimes committed with firearms, and that we need to do more to restrict the use of firearms. The Home Secretary will remember that my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich and I raised this matter with him. More should be done to cut the outlets of firearms, allowing them to be used for crime. Ideally, the response should be to restrain the police from dealing with the problem in the same way. Otherwise, the problem escalates. That matter intensely worries many people in London.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): The issue of firearms has been steadily reduced in recent years. The latest figure for 1985 compared with 1984 was another 14 per cent. reduction. I shall give the hon. Gentleman the absolute figures when I reply.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful for that response, and I shall be grateful for the figures. I hope that the Minister accepts that the public need reassurance that the police are not being increasingly equipped with firearms.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a further problem that more police are now being trained in the use of firearms, even if the issue of firearms is being reduced? Taken with the Commissioner's call for preparedness to use firearms, a dangerous precedent is being set.

Mr. Hughes: The report that was produced a week ago made it clear that there would be more training, in the context of the public order suggestions by the Commissioner.

Although there is to be no immediate deployment of plastic baton rounds, they are now to be provided. I hope that the Minister of State and the Home Secretary will accept that there would be grave discontent and substantial worry if from provision we went to deployment. It is bad enough that they are being provided anywhere — my party opposes that. I appreciate the dilemma, but we do not want Northern Ireland on the streets of London. Many people rightly fear that when they know that such weapons are in the armoury.

Policing has to go on day in, day out. It does not help either the police or the community when the police are distracted from their main task of preventing and dealing with crime. I have had correspondence with the Home Office, and I am not yet satisfied with the answer, about the massive deployment at Wapping—and the people at Wapping are not all thugs, as has been suggested by one Conservative Member. Many of those people have had no previous convictions in their lives. They go there to picket peacefully. They come to constituency surgeries such as mine and complain, saying "We were there protesting and the police started to interfere in our right to protest." Then there is escalation and the affair gets out of hand. There have been some horrendously violent incidents.

Last year it was the miners' strike that took police away from the streets of London. This year it is Wapping. Many incidents are partly self-induced responses. Although one has to make sure that in areas where there is a real risk of public disorder there is an adequate police presence, I do not believe that the way in which the police have responded in Wapping has been necessary as a response to the protest or compatible with the proper deployment of police throughout London. When police cannot be identified by individuals on the streets — there are real complaints — the Home Office's response should be, "Are we doing the right thing?" Action should be taken which will lead to a reverse of the escalation that has been added to by the number of police on the streets there.

Many public order protests, such as the recent anti-apartheid march, take place with thousands of people on the streets of London, and pass off peacefully every time. I hope that we can allow the police of London to get on with their job without being distracted. Many do an excellent job for Londoners, but they have an enormous way to go. I hope that the Home Secretary will take away from the debate not only our support for the initiatives that have been taken, which go in the right direction, but our concern about the things that distract the police from doing the job that we all wish them to do. I hope that he will respond in a way that will reduce the concern of many hon. Members about some of the ways in which London has been policed in the past 12 months.

11.18 am

Mr. William Shelton (Streatham): I listened with great interest to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I welcome very much what he said, especially his reference to Lambeth, to which I shall return.

I should like to refer to one or two of the problems that affect some of my constituents. The first is prostitution in Streatham. Areas that have never been afflicted by that malaise in the past are being so afflicted, and it is causing great distress among my constituents. I have written to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State about it. We all know what an extraordinarily difficult problem it is. I am told by the police that many of the ladies who arrive in Streatham to ply their trade come from King's Cross. I do not know whether that is true.

There are four possible remedies. The first is already being taken to some extent in Streatham. An extra police budget has been allocated by the chief superintendent, and there are regular patrols of two officers, who regularly make arrests. Apparently it is having some effect, but the problem is that to have a permanent effect, which will probably do no more than squeeze the problem into someone else's constitueny, those patrols must be kept up for another six months or a year, to break the link between the punters, as the police call them, and the prostitutes. That takes manpower and time. It is a drain on resources.

There are more police in Streatham than there were when the Conservative Government came to office, but there is now far more demand for "aid" for such places as Wapping and to cover demonstrations. I wonder what the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) thinks would have happened if no police had been sent to Wapping. I am prepared to wager that the News International building would not now be standing and perhaps there would have been loss of life. I am sure that if the right hon. Gentleman had been Home Secretary he would have arranged police protection. I wonder what would have happened during the raid on the distribution centre. Had a responsible Labour Government been in power, I am sure that they would have reacted in the same way.

I hope that the Streatham police force can continue its patrols. If it cannot, the situation will deteriorate again. A grave nuisance is being caused to ratepayers. They are molested on the pavement outside their houses or even in their front gardens. They find couples behind their garages. It is too much. Something must be done.

In Southampton the public are being asked to give confidential information about number plates of cars cruising the streets. The police then interview the drivers and ask them why they were driving round the streets. The police in Streatham are prepared to do the same. Considerable difficulties might be involved and it would be time-consuming, but the police are prepared to follow Southampton's example because of its deterrent effect.

Last year the penalty imposed on convicted ladies averaged £30. That is nonsense. I do not know how long that sum has remained unchanged, but the maximum fine for the offence is much higher. I hope that magistrates and justices of the peace will consider imposing more realistic fines.

I am urged by my constituents to press for the reintroduction of custodial sentences. I am not convinced that that is the way forward. I doubt that it is because too many people are already in our prisons. Some of the girls have families and small children who would have to be looked after if the women were imprisoned. However, I should like to know the Minister's view.

Another possibility is that of licensed brothels, which they have in France and Germany. I should find brothels repugnant. The idea would not command public support, and the House would not support such a move, so that cannot be the way forward. To repeat: we must have sufficient police to maintain patrols. Higher penalties should be imposed and we should consider following Southampton's example of lateral thinking.

Many hon. Members will have seen the alarming headline in The London Standard describing a heroin war in the streets of Brixton and a drug-related shooting. I see the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) present. His constituency takes in part of Brixton, which is divided between three constituencies in all. Two people were recently shot at Cynthia's night club in Acre lane.

Shortage of manpower causes a problem. The central drugs squad at the Yard is of enormous back-up help, but it is mainly involved with the major dealers and, rightly, with importation. That does not help the police in my constituency when dealing with the "Yardies", for instance, as The London Standard calls the new gang which is trying to take over and is behaving ruthlessly.

Only 12 officers are assigned to the drugs squad in Brixton. They are finding it extraordinarily difficult to cope. As always, manpower and money are the problem. Twelve men are not sufficient to cope with the task.

In Brixton, 11 squads are involved in major investigations. These include nine murders, one investigation for linked rape and another for the drug-related shooting. They have made six arrests and only five cases are outstanding. A man has been arrested in connection with the rape and another for the shooting at Cynthia's night club. The squads are doing well, but more resources are needed to contain the drugs problem as well in Brixton.

The situation is complicated. In Brixton a car bearing CD plates and from an African country is regularly on the "front line" and apparently makes frequent trips. The driver of the car knows he is under police surveillance. This is an illustration of the problems confronting the police in Brixton.

Streatham has about 60 neighbourhood watch schemes. They are first class. The year before last burglary figures fell by 5 per cent. and last year by 17 per cent. I agree with the police that that reduction is due partly to neighbourhood watch. A serious drawback is Lambeth council's reluctance to allow neighbourhood watch schemes on Lambeth council estates. That reluctance is gradually being broken down by pressure, but it is inexplicable that Lambeth council should not support the schemes.

What about neighbourhood policing—a phrase which sprang from the Scarman report? It is thought by some people, who are not aware of what is happening, to be soft policing. Streatham practises neighbourhood policing and it is certainly not soft.

The principles are, first, that the law must be upheld. Then, of equal importance, there is the need to secure the understanding and co-operation of the local community. That is what I mean and what the police mean by neighbourhood policing. Perhaps the police do not always achieve that aim but they try hard. They try to achieve the aim in two main ways in Streatham. The community police consultative group has already been mentioned. That group is experiencing difficulties in Lambeth. The police committee set up by Lambeth council has refused to discuss with the police matters of importance, and merely writes letters of complaint. However, with the change of leadership, meetings take place about every two months with Miss Linda Bellos, the new leader of Lambeth council.

I can give an example of the attitude towards the police in Lambeth. Two elderly people were recently strangled at an old persons' home. So far the police have not been permitted to take elimination prints from the staff. I hope that they will be allowed to take those prints. The police are prepared to take them on the premises.

I find it extraordinary that Lambeth council has thrown the community police consultative group out of the town hall. It is no longer allowed to hold meetings there. This group, which is of such importance to the community, has to hunt for church halls or community halls in which to meet. It has no resting place because the town hall, owned by the people of Lambeth, is denied to it. That is disgraceful. I know that my right hon. Friend's sympathies are with that group and I should be grateful if he can do anything to help. Understandably, attendance at meetings is falling slightly. However, it is going extraordinarily well. The main thing is that the police and the groups which attend are learning from each other about their respective problems and consequently the meetings are becoming much more constructive. They understand the points of view and the restraints. The fact that we have got through the period since September last year, when there were riots, so well until today—I make no predictions about what might happen, but I am very optimistic—is in great part due to the group, and it is vital that it should continue.

The second part of the neighbourhood community policing——

It being half past Eleven o'clock MR. SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to his ruling this day.

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Minister of State, Treasury, to make his statement, may I say that I deferred the statement today for half an hour to accord with what I took to be the unanimous view of the House, taking into account the exchanges which took place yesterday in the debates and the extreme complexity of this subject. I must make it clear that what has happened today should not be taken as a precedent, and that statements on Fridays will take place at 11 o'clock and on any other day immediately after questions.

Mr. Tony Banks: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to delay the proceedings with this point of order. We are told that the House exercises control through the accountability of the Home Secretary to the House over the Metropolitan police. Since this is one of the rare opportunities that we have to debate the affairs of the Metropolitan police, I hope that this complex subject will not detain the House so long that we cannot continue our discussion of a matter of great importance to Londoners.

Mr. Speaker: I always take such matters into account, on a Friday or any other day.

European Communities (Budget)

11.32 am

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): I am glad to have the opportunity to report to the House on this week's negotiations in Brussels and Strasbourg, which culminated in the adoption yesterday afternoon of a Community budget for 1986.

The Budget Council met in Brussels on 8 and 9 July and in Strasbourg on 10 and 11 July. I served as Chairman of the Council and my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury represented the United Kingdom at the 8 and 9 July meeting. The Council reached agreement with representatives of the European Parliament at 3 am yesterday, and the Parliament voted on the budget yesterday afternoon. With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall arrange for the main figures to be published in the Official Report.

The starting point for this week's negotiations was the European Court's judgment on the 1986 budget delivered on 3 July; copies are being placed in the Library. This found that the Parliament exceeded its legal powers in seeking to adopt the budget last December, in the absence of agreement with the Council, and declared the 1986 budget process to be incomplete.

The Commission responded by putting forward an amending letter which consolidated the budget voted by the Parliament last December and the Commission's own preliminary draft supplementary and amending budget presented in May. Compared with the Council's second reading budget of last autumn, the proposals in the amending letter provided for an extra 915·3 mecu, or £569 million of agricultural guarantee expenditure, an extra 492 mecu, £306 million, for commitment appropriations and an extra 1,326 mecu, £824 million, payment appropriations for the structural funds and non-obligatory expenditure, together with an increase of 500 mecu, £312 million for the United Kingdom's abatement.

The outcome finally agreed between the Council and the Parliament provided for a further addition of 184·7 mecu, £115 million, agricultural guarantee expenditure, and a reduction of 399 mecu, £236 million, in commitment appropriations for the structural funds and other non-obligatory expenditure, including a special reserve for negative commitment appropriations, and a reduction of about 135 mecu, £85 million, in payment appropriations for the structural funds and other non-obligatory expenditure. On the revenue side, it incorporated a surplus of 49·2 mecu, £31 million, available from the 1985 budget.

I have to tell the House that the new budget uses up all the available revenue within the £1·4 per cent. ceiling, together with the surplus carried forward from 1985. Compared with the 1985 budget, the increase in agriculture guarantee expenditure is 10·8 per cent. and in non-obligatory expenditure is 14·54 per cent. for commitment appropriations and 39·18 per cent. for payment appropriations.

Throughout the week's discussions in the Budget Council the United Kingdom's representatives made clear their profound and continuing concern about levels of expenditure in the new budget, and the implications for budget discipline. They underlined the United Kingdom's strong preference for retaining a significant margin of unused resources within the 1·4 per cent. ceiling. At the same time, they accepted that the increase of 1,100 mecu, £683 million in agricultural guarantee expenditure, which involves exceeding the budgetary discipline guideline limit by some 925 mecu, £575 million, could be justified by the exceptional circumstance of the abnormally rapid depreciation of the dollar since the original 1986 budget figures were prepared.

In spite of all our concerns, the new budget has many positive features from the United Kingdom's point of view. First, the United Kingdom's VAT rate, which would have been 0·69 per cent. on the Council's November budget and 0·73 per cent. on the Parliament's December budget, has been reduced to under 0·68 per cent. Secondly, we expect to receive a substantial share of the extra provision for the structural funds—well in excess of our VAT share.

Thirdly, in consequence of these changes, we expect the United Kingdom's net contribution to the 1986 budget to be significantly lower than was implied by the Council's or the Parliament's budgets of last autumn. Fourthly, the Council has succeeded in cutting the growth of commitment appropriations proposed by the Parliament, thus improving markedly the ratio between commitment and payment appropriations.

Dr. Oonah McDonald (Thurrock): First, may I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing us extra time in which to study the statement which I received at 11.1 am. I received an amendment to the statement at 11.20 am.

Having examined the statement, I wish to thank the Minister for his clear statement that, during the negotiations this week, the Government caved in completely. They protested, and then agreed to the complete breaking of budgetary discipline. Why are the main figures not present in the statement? After all, the Minister was involved in the negotiations for hour after hour. He was allegedly the mediator who brought the whole matter to a conclusion. Does he not know what figures he agreed? Why can he not report all those figures properly to the House instead of this absurdity?

The statement says that the 1·4 per cent. limit will be completely used up by the budget, plus a surplus carried forward from 1985. What is that surplus? What will the Minister do, since the harvest has not yet occurred and we do not know what dollar fluctuations will take place during the rest of the year—[Interruption.] Of course, we cannot know that. What will he do if the budget overruns the 1·4 per cent. limit? Will he and the Government return to the House later this year and ask for yet more money?

Why have the Government agreed to this massive increase in agricultural spending, quadrupling the breach of the budget discipline? Is it not incorrect to say that all this is simply due to fluctuations in the dollar? Is it not also due to the fact that the Agricultural Ministers refused to reduce farm prices sufficiently?

The Minister said nothing about overseas aid, yet press reports suggest that this was cut by at least £40 million. Does he not think that he should come clean about the

The statement refers to an increase of almost 40 per cent. in payment appropriations. What exactly are these for? Are they payments from the regional and social funds? Is this an effort to deal with the burdens of the past which the President of the Court of Auditors said totalled £9 billion by the end of 1984? Who will benefit from that? Will Britain or other countries benefit from it? Perhaps the Minister will tell us a great deal more about that.

Will the Minister not tell us exactly what is meant by the negative reserve that is already being described by European parliamentarians as a black hole into which, presumably, more and more of our own money will vanish? Does not the Minister's whole performance show that, far from being a mediator, he is being taken for a ride by those in Europe who are much more sophisticated in dealing with EC jiggery-pokery than he is?

This budget is short-lived. It cannot possibly last out the rest of 1986. It will lead to another financial crisis in 1987. Was the Minister not aware of the bitter resentment of the member states towards our rebate and will he not confirm that that rebate is tied to the 1·4 per cent. limit? If the 1·4 per cent. limit is breached so long before 1988, our abatement will also have to be renegotiated. Is he not aware of the fact that hon. Members on both sides of the House bitterly resent the fact that more and more money is going into the EC budget, primarily to be spent on featherbedding the farmers and on creating yet more obscene and wasteful food mountains, instead of being spent here on important public spending on schools and hospitals, a matter about which the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) complained in our debate yesterday evening?

Finally, is the Minister not aware that his behaviour at Brussels during the last week means that next year the incoming Labour Government will have to sort out the whole EC budgetary mess and make sure that we have a decent deal with Europe?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) made one comment and asked me 10 questions. Her comment was about the nature of the settlement that had been reached. The concern of everybody involved in this process during the past week has been to reach an agreement. Otherwise the Community would have been plunged into the regime of provisional twelfths, made worse by the fact that the base year upon which it would have been founded did not include Spain and Portugal. The only people to vote against the budget yesterday afternoon, and thus effectively in favour of the chaos that I have described, were the British Labour party and the Rainbow group.

To answer the hon. Lady's first question, I said that the main figures will be placed in the Official Report. There is a limit to how much data hon. Members can absorb in an oral statement. Secondly, the hon. Lady said that the 1·4 per cent. ceiling had been used up, together with the 1985 surplus, and she asked me about that surplus. The surplus is the audited and calculated surplus for the year 1984-85. That figure became available in June. Thus, it is possible for the Commission to make a statement about it at a meeting in early July.

As to the hon. Lady's question about the movement of agricultural expenditure and the pattern of the harvest, one of the reasons why the Budget Council, endorsed by the Parliament, increased agricultural expenditure by 185 mecu beyond the figure which the Commission had proposed was that in its figures the Commission had suggested that there was likely to be a required extra expenditure of 400 mecu which, in other circumstances, would have to be carried forward to a subsequent year. The Budget Council and the Parliament agreed that it was prudent to make an additional provision for the current year.

The hon. Lady asked me about budget discipline, in particular as it relates to agriculture. She implied that the behaviour of the dollar—I am surprised that she has not remarked upon the behaviour of the dollar in terms of the financial markets and its effect on agricultural prices—meant that this was yet another easy settlement for farmers. I do not know how many farmers the hon. Lady has in her Thurrock constituency but the farming community regard it, on the whole, as a tough settlement.

As to overseas aid, it is perfectly true that at an earlier stage in the proceedings this week the overseas aid figures were reduced by the Budget Council and that the Labour MEPs at Strasbourg referred to that. That figure has been restored in the final settlement. I am mildly surprised that the hon. Lady's Strasbourg colleagues had not let her know.

The hon. Lady's next question related to the increase in payment appropriations of nearly 40 per cent. She asked whether they were in the structural funds, to which the answer is yes. Other non-obligatory expenditure that is outside the structural funds is also included. The hon. Lady asked whether that expenditure related to past costs and who would benefit from it. The reason for the large increase in the payment appropriations is substantially because of the enlargement of the Community by the arrival of Spain and Portugal. I acknowledge that in these figures there is an element of past costs. The Commission has recommended that it is sensible to reduce the heavy overhang of commitments that is brought forward each year. As to who benefits, I said in my statement that the United Kingdom is likely to be a substantial beneficiary from that element in the change.

The hon. Lady also asked me about the negative reserve. I acknowledge that the negative reserve is an innovative device. The negative reserve entered the negotiations at around midnight on Wednesday night because the Parliament insisted that there should not be yet a further increase in commitment appropriations which did not have payments attached to them—exactly the issue that has given rise to the problem of past costs. However, the Budget Council said that it was impossible at that stage of the night, if it was to vote on the business the following day, for it to be able to determine what non-compulsory expenditure it should shift among that which lay within its competence so to do. This device was arranged so that it would have a slightly longer period in which to effect that switch.

The hon. Lady suggested that I had not served as a mediator. I do not know whether mediator is a term of abuse. All I know is that we secured an agreement between the Budget Council and the Parliament and that as a consequence the Community has not been plunged into the chaos of provisional twelfths.

The hon. Lady referred to bitter resentment in the House—this was the first of her "finallys"—and asked about the relationship of the 1·4 per cent. to the abatement. She has misunderstood the process. The relationship in the Fontainebleau agreement between the abatement and the 1·4 per cent. ceiling is favourable to the United Kingdom, in that the 1·4 per cent. ceiling cannot be negotiated without our agreement, in particular our agreement on any other abatement arrangements.

The hon. Lady's second "finally" related to feather-bedding farmers, but I hope that I have already responded to that point. The hon. Lady's third "finally" referred to what, in the unlikely contingency of a Labour Government being returned to office, they would do. In all the years that a Labour Government had responsibility for these affairs they never negotiated a sure instrument such as the abatement that we now enjoy.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the concern about this matter, but I have to take into account the point of order of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). I shall allow questions to continue until five past twelve, and then we must move on.

Sir Edward du Cann (Taunton): To put matters into plain English, which we do not always use when talking about EC affairs, while congratulating my hon. Friend upon what is reported as his outstanding chairmanship, now that he is back in the United Kingdom will he take time to read yesterday's debates in which he will see that deep and sincere anxiety was expressed in all quarters of the House about the apparently careless and prompt way in which solemn assurances given to British Members of Parliament have been breached?

There is no budgetary discipline. Agriculture expenditure is out of control and the additional funds voted, which were supposed to last for many years, have run out in less than a year of the new budgetary discipline. Is my hon. Friend aware that if he had made that appalling statement yesterday, before our debate, it is likely that the budget proposals would not have been carried by the House, as they should not have been?

Finally, to use that word once, and once only, will my hon. Friend give us his word, which I would trust, that we shall have no further proposals for increased contributions to the European Community until such time as the promises already solemnly made to us are adhered to?

Mr. Brooke: I have already had the considerable pleasure of reading the account in Hansard of yesterday's debate, and it appears to have been a thoroughly vigorous occasion. My right hon. Friend said a number of things. The business of the House is no business of mine, but that of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and, were we to have a debate, I should look forward to it, because we would be able to go into these matters in rather more detail.

Technically, the business of the House yesterday related to Estimates rather than the budget, but I am sure that my right hon. Friend understands that position.

As to his final question, I have long been conscious of the hazards of absolutely definitive negatives. I remember somebody who once used the word "never" at the Dispatch Box. I respond to my right hon. Friend in the spirit of his question.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): The Minister deserves congratulations on piloting through the adoption of the budget. Is not the attempt to portray every negotiation as a triumph for Britain unreal and counter-productive? Should not the concept of general Community interest, in which we share, be developed? In this connection, is he aware that it is strange that all the so-called positive features that he listed at the end of his statement seemed to be about the reduction of expenditure in job-creating areas? Is he aware that there is a need for a significant increase in expenditure in cost-productive sectors such as the structural funds, regional and social, research and development and overseas aid? Is he able to give us the figures, plus or minus, in regard to these funds?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to the hon. Member for his congratulations. Inevitably, one was asked elsewhere to comment in the margins of the meeting about the negotiations. I sought to convey that it has been a satisfactory conclusion in the sense that we have saved the Community from the chaos of a regime of provisional twelfths that would have been imposed for the next two or three months.

The hon. Member asked me about expenditure, not only in the structural funds but in other non-obligatory expenditure. I make it clear that any references to reduction of the non-obligatory expenditure that may have occurred earlier in the week were premature, as I said in my answer to the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald).

There were significant achievements in this budget. One was that other member states joined the United Kingdom in its belief that it was hazardous to push up commitment appropriations if we were not similarly providing resources with which to execute them. Another was that, as a result of conciliation, the Parliament also withdrew its request for further commitment appropriations in the structural funds.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): My hon. Friend deserves full congratulations on the striking achievement of the new budget agreement for 1986 within 10 days of the commencement of the British presidency. He chaired his meetings with success, combining proper control over the budget with the need to develop the Community budget in the future, not only in 1986. Should he not ignore the semi-hysteria and the whingeing and whining of the Official Opposition and some of our hon. Friends? Does it not result from their dislike of the foreigners involved in the Community budget process, their unwillingness to be full members of the Community and their failure to recognise that the Community budget is much more modest for most of the member states, whose total financial budget deficits are five or six times the size of the Community budget?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind words.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Minister referred to the sure instrument of the rebate, but does he not agree that now that it is hitting 1·4 per cent., under the Fontainebleau agreement, the Commission is obliged to review matters and Her Majesty's Government are committed to negotiations that could raise it to 1·6 per cent.? The Minister mentioned the breach of discipline. Of the figures that he gave, it appears that the breach is now by a multiple of four. If that is not correct, what are the figures? He said that the VAT take is reduced, but does he not agree that the actual amount of our VAT take that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to send to Brussels is much higher? Is it not around 12 to 15 per cent. before the rebate? Will he give the figure that it is before the rebate for 1986?

When does he expect to lay in the Vote Office a full memorandum on all these matters? When he does so, will he make sure that it includes figures comparable to those of the sixth report of the Scrutiny Committee HC 78-vi of 1983-84?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman asked me about the 1·4 per cent. ceiling and the negotiation of the rebate. I expressed confidence on behalf of the Government that 1·4 per cent. will be sufficient to maintain the needs and expenditure of the Community, but it is the case that the Commission has a responsibility to bring forward an ex-novo review. It has said that it is likely to do that before the end of this year. That will be a matter for debate during 1987. I repeat that we cannot move from a 1·4 per cent. ceiling without the renegotiation of the United Kingdom abatement.

As to the hon. Gentleman's question about the VAT take, to use his phrase, I acknowledge that the amount that passes over before the abatement is higher. As to the question of comparable figures, we shall not manage to give them in the figures that go in the Official Report with the statement, but I shall do my best to make sure that they are made available.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Does my hon. Friend's statement not confirm the fears expressed last year that the budgetary restraint agreement is just a sick joke? Would not directors of a public company who used the money entrusted to them in such a profligate fashion be put in prison? Is it the policy of Her Majesty's Government that this year's extraordinary overspend should be clawed back next year, as provided for specifically in the so-called binding agreement of December 1984? How on earth do my hon. Friend and his colleagues expect to avoid a major crisis in the 1987 budget?

Mr. Brooke: I appreciate that there may be disagreement between the Government and some of my hon. Friends on the precise significance of the exceptional fall in the dollar on agricultural prices, but it is a common cause among the members states involved in these matters in Brussels and Strasbourg that it is an exceptional issue.

My hon. Friend correctly referred to the Fontainebleau agreement. The United Kingdom abatement and the sureness of that instrument are as important an element in that agreement as is the reference to budget discipline. That instrument has remained wholly firm.

While every pressure is exercised on my colleagues in the Council of Agriculture Ministers to reduce their expenditure to compensate for rises elsewhere in the budget, it would be unreasonable to expect that in 1987 we shall be able to claw back the considerable extra expenditure that has flowed out as a result of the performance of the dollar.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Does the Minister of State recollect that at every stage in the process by which this House obtained control over taxation and thus over the government of the country it acted in excess of its then legal and constitutional powers? Is it not clear that, as was predictable and predicted, a directly elected assembly armed with the power to reject the budget and acting in collusion with the Commission will always be able to impose its will upon Her Majesty's Government and upon this House?

Mr. Brooke: The central issue in the court case that the Council of Ministers brought against the European Parliament for its actions last December was to establish beyond peradventure the principle that the Parliament could not exceed the powers available to it. I am delighted to say that in its judgment on July 3 the European Court of Justice entirely endorsed that view.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I congratulate my hon. Friend on his efforts overnight. Could he put an exact figure on the net contribution now compared to the budgets last autumn? Secondly, can he say why the situation is allowed to persist where there is a large discrepancy between the commitments made in the Community budget and the payments? Surely the time is long overdue to bring those two elements firmly into line?

Mr. Brooke: In answer to my hon. Friend's first question, I have to tell him that the reduction in the United Kingdom's net contribution between the budgets of last autumn and the budget approved by the European Parliament yesterday is of the order of £250 million. My hon. Friend asked about commitments and payments. As I think I said in answer to an earlier question, significant progress has been made this year in getting away from what I shall call the easy cosmetics of either Parliament or Ministers voting for increases in commitment appropriations without providing any of the resources to discharge them. As a consequence of that, we have unused commitments overhanging the budget from year to year. If hon. Members look at the figure presented this year, they will see that there has been a most satisfactory redressing of that balance.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Will the Minister note that we are sick to death of this continual and increasing overspending in the EC? There is a lot of talk about financial discipline, but does he not realise that there is no financial discipline? There never was and any such formula as he had has completely collapsed. We have noted his weasel words in refusing to answer the question about whether he will come back for further money for the EC. He has also spoken about his so-called successes. We need successes like that like we need a hole in the head.

Mr. Brooke: I have to assume from the hon. Gentleman's last remark that he sides with the Members of the British Labour party who yesterday voted against that budget because they wished to see chaos in the affairs of the Community over the next three months.

Mr. Leighton: What have we got now?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman's constituents may not be beneficiaries of some of the funds that flow from Brussels, but other hon. Members in the House would have seen that transfer of resources into their constituencies reduced if the Community had been put on a regime of provisional twelfths. I take the hon. Gentleman's point about overspending and draw to his attention the fact that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary vividly made clear the Government's view that it would be much more desirable to have a margin in this budget below the 1·4 per cent. ceiling.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): Is it not the principle of the Government that supply and demand should determine prices? How can we constantly accommodate increases in agricultural expenditure without reference to world circumstances and costs, especially bearing in mind that the common agricultural policy now puts a burden of £8 to £9 a week on every family in Britain? That is regressive taxation of the worst sort. Will the Government now refer the CAP to the European Court as being in breach of the original treaty of Rome in that it does not serve the interests of the consumer?

[Mr. Richard Shepherd]

Mr. Brooke: That seems in the first instance to be more precisely a question for my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Is it true that the representatives of the other nation states are expressing increasing resentment at the prospect of the continuance of our abatement? Can my hon. Friend reassure the House that our abatement will continue for at least as long as the system of budgetary control?

Mr. Brooke: I can assure my hon. Friend that during the fairly prolonged deliberations in which I participated in Brussels and Strasbourg, except at the level of what I shall describe as marginal joviality, there was no suggestion by any of the member states, or indeed by the European Parliament, that our abatement should be interfered with.

Policing (London)

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

12.8 pm

Mr. William Shelton: I had been speaking about neighbourhood policing in Brixton and I said that it had two legs. One leg is the community police consultative committee, about which I spoke and about which other hon. Members have spoken. The other leg is a trial system that is taking place in Brixton, the establishment of four sector working parties over which the inspector responsible for each of the four areas in Brixton presides. The working parties have two meetings a month to which are invited on a permanent basis local business men, tenants' associations, church representatives, youth club leaders, schools and so on. They are like mini police-community consultative groups and are working well.

I said that I was optimistic at the way things are working out. I say that again because my optimism is based on the efforts of the police and the excellent backup that the police are receiving from the Government. Perhaps most important, there is increasing understanding and good will from the public about the role of the police. I hope that this will increase and prosper.

12.10 pm

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham): Time and again Government Members and the Home Secretary have spoken about events in Wapping as justification for the efforts and the reorganisation which the Home Secretary hopes to bring about within the Metropolitan police. A point often ignored about the Wapping situation is that the whole of it is premeditated. That point seems to be lost on Government Members. The development at Wapping was purposely designed by the management of News International. The character and position of the building was so designed, the defences and the barbed wire and all the things around the building and the armoured vehicles were all planned in the knowledge that the police would be doing what they are now doing at Wapping as soon as the building was occupied and newspapers began to be printed there. The whole thing was, in that sense, premeditated and we should not lose sight of that.

Another point to which Government Members referred two or three times was street politics. They talked about protesters taking to the streets and called upon the Labour party to use its influence to persuade organisations not to use the street for the purpose of protests. By their very nature, street protests take place because such groups are deliberately excluded from the decision-making process. Street protests then become part of the democratic network. Under certain circumstances, many of us may have reservations and some regrets, and I certainly reject violence as an integral part of street demonstrations—it has serious limitations and is counter-productive—but Conservative Members should recognise that street politics is a necessary part of the means whereby people participate in the democratic process.

Conservative Members talk about the cost of the police force. No Labour Member complains about that. Our complaint is about the lack of accountability. The police force happens to be one part of the public sector that has the least accountability. Indeed the methods used by the police are subject to less accountability than those of the Army or the Ministry of Defence and all those other Departments which are subject to ministerial control. The Home Secretary and the Minister of State may have direct responsibility, together with the Receiver of the Metropolitan police, but their combined efforts amount to less accountability than the Ministry of Defence has over the Army; that is the basis of our complaint.

Conservative Members say that London has a great police force, and of course it has. But it also has the most expensive police force anywhere in the world. It now costs £1,000 million a year. If we add to that the cost of private police and private security in London, we must have the most expensive security system anywhere in the world. Some estimates have been made that security in London is topping £1,500 million a year and, looking at the cost of some of the private security systems, it may be much more than that.

I know no one in the Labour party who is anti-police. No one has made general criticisms that could be summarised as representing an anti-police view. Our overall belief is that the police force is as essential as the education system. It is as essential as any other part of local authority work. What we ask is that the police force be treated in the same way and be subject to the same accountability; the same process of democracy. We are not anti-police in any way.

Many comments have been made about Wapping and the two highest paid groups of workers in Britain. Fleet street is identified as one of the highest paid groups of employees anywhere in the country. But the police now top that and we make no complaint about that. The fact that a constable, with rent allowances, overtime and the other bits and pieces, is in the £20,000 a year bracket—more than that in some cases——

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): More than a Member of Parliament.

Mr. Atkinson: Yes, but Members of Parliament are underpaid.

We make no complaint about the police constable who earns about £20,000 a year. We make no complaint about police inspectors earning more than the average headmaster of a big comprehensive school. That is necessary. The fact that there are no dissenting voices on the Labour Benches will, I hope, prove to the Minister that that is the collective view of the Opposition.

We have had many reports, from White Papers to the recent plethora of reports from Scotland Yard, the Home Office, Lord Scarman and Lord Gifford. There is now a tendancy in the Government's reports towards militarisation of the police and about that we do complain. Jokes are made. It is said that the difference between the police and the armed forces is that the armed forces have fighter aircraft. That is the only piece of equipment that the police do not possess.

Mr. Leighton: They have helicopters.

Mr. Atkinson: They have helicopters, but they are not yet armed. They are fitted with lighting equipment with which they can illuminate whole areas at night and that will be part of their techniques. [Interruption.] But they do not quite have the fighter aircraft. None the less, there is a tendancy towards militarisation, and we have proof of that. The Minister shares the view, along with the Home Secretary and Sir Kenneth Newman, that in London there should be a force of about 7,000 officers who are at all times ready and on call for public disorder that may break out anywhere and that they should be sufficiently mobile to be moved about. In other words, there is a desire to emulate what happens in France, whose police reserve is highly militarised. That is the idea that is now coming through in all the reports and papers and it reflects the thinking in the leadership of the Metropolitan police.

I hope that that will not proceed. I hope that the Minister of State and the Home Secretary will resist that and that the Government will not go in that direction, but rather that they will start to look at other methods. I hope that they will not see it as their most essential work. Public disorder is not the first priority for the police. Therefore, the strategy should not be based upon the need to deal with occasions of public disorder. That should be low in their priorities.

The Government complain that local authorities in London with Labour majorities do not participate in consultative committees. But the police do not participate in local authority sub-committees. They refuse to do so. In fact, the Home Secretary's recommendation is to dissuade the police from participating in any discussions which are organised by police sub-committees set up by local authorities. There is a two-way negative attitude.

The only point that I make about that is that consultative committees and local authority police sub-committees have an entirely different function which has little to do with good relations, as the Home Secretary and the Minister claim. Their contribution towards better relationships with the police is evidenced by their statutory obligations on consultative committees and their willingness to encourage participation. Good public relations are not about that. Confidence is built by the practice on the ground. It is not possible to translate the work of consultative committees, or any committee for that matter, into better public relations. That job must of necessity be done by the police through their practices and behaviour when dealing with the public. That is the basis of the relationship and there are no short cuts.

I welcome the recognition that is now beginning to be seen, that racialism in the police must once and for all be ended. Efforts are being made, in the management of the police and in the force itself, to start to eradicate that aspect that has bedevilled their work for so long.

I should like perhaps to correct a few misunderstandings about public relations as they affect Tottenham, and Broadwater Farm. I can remember when Broadwater Farm was a green site. I and others in London then made the mistake of talking about the need to provide, above all, accommodation. At the time, not many years ago 24 per cent. of families in Tottenham lived in appalling housing conditions and would have to go through someone else's accommodation to reach the lavatory. I then said that our most important priority should be to build accommodation that had hot water and decent toilet and bathroom facilities. I also believed that people should have their own front doors. We set about that job, and Broadwater Farm was a latter-day part of that whole process of high-rise developments and deck-access planning.

Whether it is the Scarman or Gifford report, or any other, reports seem to feed off one another. For example, I do not recognise the place that I know from some of the stuff that has been written about it. Broadwater Farm is below the level of the roads round the estate. Therefore, those who say that burning vehicles and so on were rolled into the police have got their facts wrong, because they would have had to be pushed pretty hard up inclines. As I understand the theory of motion, things do not roll uphill, yet that is what is implied in some of the reports.

It is important to recognise that Broadwater Farm was deliberately designed as a self-contained community. However, it has since been described as some sort of Fagin's kitchen or snake pit that attracts all the undesirable elements, particularly from among the black community. It so happens that, because of the very nature of events in Tottenham, a large proportion of the tenants are black. Young people from the area go there to meet their friends, because it a natural meeting place. It was designed as a centre for the community. Moreover, between 50 and 60 per cent. of our young black people are unemployed, and so black youngsters tend to gravitate quite naturally towards that communal centre.

Sociologists develop all sorts of complicated theories, but the simple answer is that those young people are looking for some sort of community, and tend to gravitate towards Broadwater Farm. I hope that I have put an end to that nonsense of it being some sort of Fagin's kitchen. It is a natural meeting place, and that is why some of these things have happened.

We have all read some of the highly inaccurate and dramatised reports. Indeed, the day before yesterday, I met some Americans who said that Broadwater Farm was probably more widely known throughout the world than the problems of Harlem or of the east side of New York. It has probably received more publicity than other areas with problems, such as Hong Kong. We have had clichés by the bucketful about it.

The behaviour of the police has led to hostility between young black people and the police. The whole idea of stop and search was based on the perhaps inherent thinking of the police. I am generalising, but the police and other sections of our society tend to see black people as lesser mortals. The police like to demonstrate their superiority, so that they can exercise their authority and control over a community. That is the reason for much of the behaviour in question. The police seem to believe that the best policing can be achieved by humiliating sections of the community. Stop and search goes on on a massive scale in north London and it is a humiliating business.

In public places and on crowded thoroughfares, young people are asked to put their hands against the wall, and are then searched and subjected to the most humiliating performance. That naturally leads to hostility, especially when young black people know that it is they who will be subjected to it, and that the chance of it happening to young white people is almost non-existent.

I should like the House to understand the whole business of stop and search, and the blanket campaign of house searching. Nowhere else would the police practise the blanket searching of homes, on an almost house-to-house basis. They turn places upside down. Sometimes they smash down the door and sometimes they use a key. Sometimes they knock and ask permission to enter. But they ignore the normal decencies.

Stop and search is deliberately humiliating, but the disadvantages resulting from those house searches are far more damaging than any benefits that may accrue to the police. That is the balance that must be considered. I appeal to the Minister to tell Scotland Yard's management that house searching and stop and search are the most damaging aspects of police activity. If the police want decent public relations, they should only use these methods as a last resort. Everything else must first be tried. The police should not just go trawling for information by searching through private possessions, turning over the most personal of belongings, and damaging stuff without any apology. By doing that, they are seriously damaging public relations. Such methods should be the last resort of the police. Nothing will improve until the police understand the consequences of their actions.

That is the backdrop to the relationship between young black people and the police. The benefits of house-to-house searching and the stopping and searching of young blacks is limited. The humiliating practices that are used by the police produce sullen animosity among young black people, and make it impossible for the police to be helped by the community. The Home Secretary has revealed his innermost thoughts about police recruitment — he has spoken of the difficulties to complete ethnic recruitment that would produce a balanced force in London numbers —and he knows what the position is.
